As a child she took up ballet (ten years of it), studied the piano and had voice lessons, so there were some early ideas about show business. She attended an exclusive school, the Raven Hill Academy, and at the same time took part in amateur theatricals with the Old Academy Players Theatre in Philadelphia. As an aid to expression she chose two foreign languages to study, French and Spanish, stuck to them all through school and speaks them today. But she knew definitely that acting was in her life to stay after a visit she made to New York as a young girl. She was taken to the Russian Bear restaurant for dinner and there had her fortune read by a gypsy who told her not that she would be an actress but that she was an actress. Whenever Grace has any doubt about her ability she hurries back to the Russian Bear for further confirmation.

Her folks were not inclined to be influenced by gypsies and after Grace graduated from Stevens High School they wanted her to enter Bennington College in Vermont. But she came a cropper in her college board exams, doing badly in mathematics. That this was as fortunate a failure as has ever befallen any girl became apparent in the next two and a half years.

BY THAT TIME she had switched to the Academy of Dramatic Arts in New York, had been tagged for some model work in movie shorts by Warner Brothers, was selected to join the cast of a Broadway play by Raymond Massey, had offers from a number of summer theatres including Bucks County Playhouse in Pennsylvania, was well into radio and TV work and was already being talked about in letters from eastern talent scouts to the big Hollywood studios.

What most of the scouts stressed in their reports was that Grace not only had the features of a real beauty, but also a quality too rare on the screen—serene ladyhood. "She not only looks terrific," said one talent eagle, "she seems to be having wonderful thoughts, too."

Grace has had some nice things to think about in her life. There have been a few bad times, but not too many. There was her first appearance at Bucks County Playhouse when she was told the most dreadful fate for an ingénue is to have the critics say no more than that she is very pretty—and that's exactly how they dismissed her. There was the quick death of her second Broadway play, To Be Continued, which ran only three weeks even though the great Katherine Cornell praised her by saying, "I laughed and I cried at you on the stage." And there were and are all the meal times in which she doesn't eat well. Grace can't cook and she won't dine out alone, so when in New York or Hollywood she lives on such meager fare as milk, soda crackers, an apple or orange, unless she has a roommate who can cook or is invited out.

She has had the happy childhood and youth of a good looking, wellborn girl, some nice surprises (a European trip to England, France and Switzerland, for instance, to help her forget her failure to make Bennington) and an interesting and successful career in the legitimate theatre. Nor is her luck running badly now, what with the men she has had in her professional life to guide it. These, the directors of her various pictures, represent the very cream of the industry: Alfred Hitchcock, John Ford, Henry Hathaway, Fred Zinneman, Mark Robson and George Seaton.

Although she is poised, Grace is by no means an extrovert and her personality has an essence of shyness. When she knew she was to work with Jimmy Stewart (whom she had never met) in Rear Window she was very anxious to overcome quickly any feeling of strangeness for the sake of the picture. She didn't have to worry. In one of the earliest scenes Jimmy was called upon to kiss her thirty-seven times in three minutes. After that she felt she knew him pretty well.

HER SHYNESS, really a disinclination to talk much about herself, seems to have convinced some people that she has a lot to hide. Her name has been linked with almost every one of her leading men. There was a to-do, for instance, about her as the other woman in the marital troubles of Ray Milland last year—a charge that Grace's friends brand ridiculous.

During the filming of Mogambo she, Ava Gardner and Clark Gable were the best of friends from start to finish of production. This did not prevent rumors coupling Grace and Clark romantically. The basis for these reports in the columns of Hollywood writers were two-fold. First, there were all those hunting trips they made together. Second, there was the fact that they ate a great many of their meals as a twosome in camp.

Sounded like the real business but Grace punctured the whole story when she got back. The only times Ava didn't share a common meal with Gable and Kelly were during Frank Sinatra's visit to the camp, she said. At such times he and Ava naturally paired off a lot. And as for Clark's inviting Grace on so many of his hunting jaunts, Grace said companionship, not romance, was involved. It was her long silences Clark fell in love with. When he is hunting he wants no talk and no talk comes naturally with her.

Ava and Grace were not only co-hostesses at the company's Christmas show and dinner (December, 1952) held in the jungle, but they concocted a skit and presented it together. Frank Sinatra was master of ceremonies and even Gable got on his feet to entertain with a few stories.

RITA GAM, with whom Grace roomed in Hollywood, can testify to Grace's ability to keep her own counsel—ordinarily, that is. Last January Grace inadvertently upset a nice little alibi Rita had stacked up about a black eye she sported for a spell.

She had actually slipped in the shower and had fallen against a towel rack. Grace was present and played nurse. This took so much time that Grace was late for a luncheon interview and—without thinking—explained what had happened to Rita. A little later in the day Rita went out, met Louella Parsons, and on impulse decided that a fall in a bathtub sounded fishy as an explanation for a shiner. "A horse kicked me," she said. Louella printed it that way and thus the clash of explanations.

Both girls, because their permanent homes are in the east, consider themselves nomads when they are in Hollywood. They rent ordinary little apartments which can be had without leases and naturally try not to buy any furnishings which must either be abandoned or shipped about when they leave. The only trouble is that as girls will—they get a bit penny wise and pound foolish about this. They were short of blankets when a cold wave struck California, but rather than buy extra ones they kept stalling and hoping for warmer weather. It came, but not until they had spent night after night freezing.

Last Christmas found Grace alone in Hollywood without Christmas Day plans until one of the girls at her studio found out about it and asked her to her home. When Grace arrived she found that it was to be a big family dinner—a total of twenty-seven adults, nine children, two dogs, three cats and one parakeet.

Grace, quite used to family gatherings, fitted in perfectly. She helped feed the youngsters before the big dinner was served for the adults. As Grace said, "It was almost as good as being home."

In the opinion of Hollywood's producers Grace is a classic beauty, faultless they say, no matter how photographed. She doesn't agree. She feels that her left side is her best side and arranges her hair with this in mind. But she makes no point of it when she is before the motion picture camera—just when she is making a portrait sitting.

SHE HAS a permanent apartment in New York on 66th Street and lives with Henry, a parakeet. When she leaves New York for Hollywood Henry has to leave for the apartment of friends (hers, that is) until she can return and take care of him. She counts Henry the oddest friend she has in New York. In Hollywood her oddest friend is human—a girl who had an atom bomb shelter built in the garden of her house, but is never home.

Grace likes New York because she likes her Manhattan radio and TV work contacts, likes being near her family and because she has a great collection of shoes there, too many to take on her travels. She says she is crazy about shoes. She skis, does pastel sketching, swims and rides. All of these things, she claims, are better done around New York than anywhere else. And there is always her favorite gypsy fortune teller at the Russian Bear.

"Don't laugh," she says. "After all, most Hollywood actresses have their astrologers, don't they?" END

mitzi's miracle

One night Mitzi told him, "Peter, I need your help, I've gained fifteen pounds since my operation. And I want to lose at least twenty pounds."

"You don't need me," Pete advised her. "You'd better go see your doctor."

"I already have. All I want you to do is see that when I come in here I don't order something I shouldn't. Jack, do you have that diet list handy?"

Mr. Bean fished Mitzi's typewritten diet out of a remote pocket and waiter Chassis agreed to become a party to Mitzi's conspiracy against that old devil Obesity.

A FEW NIGHTS LATER, Mitzi and Jack came back to the Piccadilly. Mitzi had been working out in ballet routines for five hours. She was beat and hungry as a horse. But she stuck to her diet. A cup of bouillon, a piece of broiled liver, sliced tomatoes, celery, radishes and tea. All of an accident, another waiter chanced to pass with a hunk of pie a la mode for some customer's dessert. Mitzi couldn't take it. She summoned Pete.

"I'll just have one little slice of apple pie and a sliver of ice cream."

"No, you don't," Pete retorted. "You told me to keep an eye on you, and that's what I'm doing. Just an average portion is 600 calories. Now, aren't you ashamed of yourself?"

"Thanks, Peter," Mitzi replied, chastened.

"I got to thinking afterward," Mitzi recalls now, "that it was a silly bit to go absolutely to pieces at the sight of a piece of cake or some juicy tidbit. Jack and I worked out a sort of philosophy. (It's much easier to win a diet battle when someone you are with constantly is doing the same thing.)

"We figured it out this way: we looked at calorie-counting as we would look at a money problem—only in reverse. The game was to keep from putting calories into our savings accounts, which was us. For instance, if Jack turned down a bottle of beer offered by a friend, he figured that he'd 'saved' 125 calories. One day I bumped into a friend at Schwab's drugstore. She suggested we have a malted milk and I almost agreed until I looked up the calorie count of a malt in my little book. Wow! I very nearly put 500 in my bank. Instead, I had a glass of ginger ale, which totaled seventy-five. And now that I've discovered those new low-calorie drinks I can have a ball at a cocktail party. I explain in advance to the hostess and she stocks up with root beer or lime-lemon and I can have three in the space of a couple of hours at a total of only twenty-seven calories."

ANOTHER WRINKLE Mitzi and Jack figured out to make their dieting fun was the twice-a-week vegetable dinner. In a calorie-counting book they found that the average serving of most vegetables is between fifteen and twenty-five calories. So they'd go to a restaurant and order a complete vegetable dinner and stuff themselves. For instance, Mitzi's vegetable dinner, with enough substance to make anyone feel as though he'd eaten a big steak, might add up like this:

Appetizer: Bread and butter pickles, celery, little green onions. Calories: 15

Soup: Chicken consommé. Calories: None

Entree: Cabbage, broccoli, carrots, spinach, stewed tomatoes. Calories: about 175

Dessert: Practically none

Drink: Coffee or tea. TOTAL: 190 calories

"It's almost unbelievable how many calories you can save that way, but you probably won't find the vegetables steam-cooked without butter too enchanting. And, if you're going to try a vegetable dinner like this one, you must have a pretty good breakfast and lunch."

Here's a sample of what Mitzi had the day of her 190-calorie dinner:

BREAKFAST

	Calories
1 slice honeydew melon	50
Thin slice white toast	75
2 soft-boiled eggs	150
1 pat butter	50
1 cup milk	150
total	475

LUNCHEON

	Calories
1 sliced apple	75
1 baked chicken breast (6 oz.)	150
1 thin slice whole wheat toast & butter	75
Dish sliced peaches (no sugar)	75

That's a grand total of about 1040 calories, give or take a few. It's probably as healthy as any average day of food intake you'd have when you eat in a hit-or-miss style, without any thought of diet.

"One thing to remember about diet," Mitzi declares, "is that the very word usually scares off people. They want a lithe figure but it's too much trouble to add two and two to get it. An all-vegetable dinner once or twice a week is horrifying to some people, even though vegetables are often overlooked and they are very high in essential minerals. But don't take my word for it. Check with your family doctor first. It's imperative that he call all the signals if you don't want to wind up an anemic shadow of your former self.

"Your doctor will tell you the dangers of a too-prolonged or too-strict diet. He'll probably tell you he's very much against these published diets and he'll be right, if he'll take the trouble to give you one of your own. Almost every individual requires some special attention when it comes to weight reducing. The glands and other apparatus of no two people function exactly alike.

"Let me give any girls reading this interview a big word of caution: a very successful diet for someone else may have very unsuccessful results so far as your figure is concerned. That's why expert guidance is always necessary."

Mitzi's warning in this respect has specific reference to girls' figures. She may lose as much as twenty or thirty pounds and then wish she had them back if she discovers that those pleasing bustline curves disappeared with the fat. This is where exercise comes in. Almost any physical education instructor in a high school or a professional gymnasium will be glad to give you an exercise that is effective and simple to keep your muscles firm.

While it is known that physical exercise alone is a slow reducing agent, it is also a neglected fact that a lot of attention must be paid to muscle tissue during the reducing period. Otherwise the leg, arm, neck and other muscles can become seriously flabby. In Mitzi's case no routine exercise was necessary, because she works out in various types of dancing regularly. But she did take the precaution of going regularly to a well-known masseuse who has helped keep famous figures trim. Massage may seem costly, but if you're dieting for a real purpose it will be money well invested.

THE MIRACULOUS CHANGE in Mitzi was not intentional at first. She only stepped on the scales, was slightly horrified and began to diet. As she began to slim down quickly the thought occurred to her that if simple diet could do this much, then she had command of herself in other ways, too.

She began to think, "I'm in a rut. Almost everyone knows me as a pert and bouncy eighteen-year-old, and that's the way I'm treated off screen and photographed on screen. But I'm twenty-one now, and that 'pert and bouncy' bit has got to go."

How to do it? You can't issue formal announcements that you no longer want to be looked on as an eighteen-year-old. You have to make some outward changes. The place to begin is with clothes. Mitzi sought the help of Paul Rose, head of the dress department at Nancy's Stores. She showed him how the clothes she had been wearing —sizes twelve and fourteen—were almost

Mitzi Gaynor's *Mystery Diet

With slight variation, this can be your menu for a week. If you do not eat breakfast, you should start tomorrow morning. Lunch may be varied by foods with equivalent numbers of calories. Dinner might be varied by roast chicken (white meat only), fruit salad and rye toast. Steak, naturally, can take the place of liver, but must always be broiled.

big enough to turn around in. So he brought out sizes eight and ten. Mitzi was delighted to discover that the tens had to be taken in. Living in a theatrical town, Mitzi could take the plunge to extreme sophistication, stark white and stark black form-fitting gowns with low décolletage.

"It tickled me pink," Mitzi remembers, "the first night I wore one of those real gone numbers to Mocambo with Jack. People could hardly believe this was Mitzi."

Like her clothes, Mitzi's new twenty-one-year-old personality fits her well. For the first time, people have stopped trying to compare her to stars who were once famous and had one of her names. People have said to her, "I've been going to your pictures for years," although she's only been in the business for four or five years. They somehow mistook her for the former child star, Jane Withers. The older moviegoer would occasionally gaze upon Mitzi with wistful expression and exclaim, "Miss Gaynor, you've given me some of my most beautiful moments." These had identified her with Janet Gaynor. And others confused her with Mitzi Green.

No one makes that mistake now. From her smart new coiffure to the tips of her toes, Mitzi's wistful qualities are submerged, and although she's a powerhouse of energy, it doesn't spill over.

"With my lower intake of food," Mitzi says, "I stopped thinking that anyone who went to bed before midnight was a square. I found myself rolling in at around ten, which would have seemed an incredible hour a year before. Now, instead of looking for parties to go to, Jack and I find ourselves going to early movies. I learn a lot that way, not just for my profession, but in the business of being happy. Funny thing, I never realized just how much you can get out of a simple motion picture when it comes to developing a general philosophy and a good feeling about life in general. I used to go to movies to daydream. Now I go to live and learn. That may not be putting it across with a vast amount of intelligence, but I hope you know what I mean."

It's Guy Lombardo's line: "When some women say they've turned 35, it's probably a U-turn."
Earl Wilson in
The New York Post

It's possible people do understand. Already those who have seen a lot of stars come and go are comparing Mitzi with Carole Lombard for fire and punch and with Jean Harlow for her sweetness and almost childlike heart.

In the midst of all of Hollywood's frantic activity a gradual change has come over Mitzi Gaynor—one which seems amazingly abrupt to those who have seen her only occasionally. The actual physical change took only four months, during which she lost a little more than five pounds a month. The change to a well-balanced actress from a happy little ingénue, from a slightly scatterbrained teenager to a charming young woman, took a little longer, but less than a year.

Not only that, but shortly after you read this, Mitzi may be honeymooning in Paris as Mrs. Jack Bean. Oh, yes, Jack Bean went on the diet too, lost fifteen pounds and won the heart of just about the most enchanting of Hollywood's bachelor girls.

As for you who read this, if you think hard enough and have enough will power, maybe something equally as delightful can happen to you. END

"You like Jackie Gleason?" he inquired. I said he was a very funny man.

"I mean his music." he said. I didn't know he played music. "He doesn't. He arranges it," said Bob. "Now, that's what I mean. Listen—there's a man with real talent. I met him in Detroit last trip and he's out here now on vacation. I've been hanging around. Maybe I can learn something."

"What do you need to know?" I wondered.

"Oh, nothing," said Bob, "and everything. I'm having a ball, all right. Look, I'm making great dough, getting great parts. I'd rather be where I am, doing what I'm doing than anything. I'm on top of the world. I've got great people all around me. I couldn't be fatter—only, it's just the bushwa. I don't want people to think I'm a phony."

Who was thinking?

"Maybe nobody," admitted Bob, "and maybe everybody. I don't know. All I know is that I've got to keep hold of the wheel. I've got to keep control and I've got to improve. Got to lift, lift, lift. Get some class. Do you know Clark Gable?

"Well, I saw him the other night in New York. Now there's a really great guy. They don't call him 'The King' for nothing. I used to hang around the caddy shack at the club when I was a kid hoping for a chance to pack his bag. Sometimes I got it. If I didn't, I followed him around. He was always swell to me, always my idol. Still is. So when I saw him in Twenty-One I went right up. He'd been in Europe for a long time but I might have seen him yesterday. He said some pretty nice things about me, said he was proud of me—stuff like that. I should have felt my feet leaving the ground. But I didn't. I just felt embarrassed—like a peanut—and scared. Why? Oh, I don't know, all this swoon guy stuff and everything—"

"Gable went through it," I pointed out.

"Sure he did," brightened Bob. "And so did Bob Taylor, Ty Power, Jimmy Stewart, Cary Grant. They all did. But they managed to keep people's respect—and now look at them. That's what I've got to do. Earn respect."

So Bob Wagner is worried. Not about the things that usually worry a young star in Hollywood. Not about money, not about girls. Not about his option, either. But still worried because, "It's all come too fast. I didn't count on it this way. Don't I want to be a star? Sure I do. I always did more than anything in the world, ever since I ran into those great people around the club—Gable, Alan Ladd, Randy Scott and the rest. I always said, 'That's the business for me,' and I sure enough meant it. But I'm not a star. I'm a long way from being a star."

"You were in Prince Valiant," I reminded him.

"I had the title role," corrected Bob. Then he took on the pained expression of a father trying to point out a fact to a small child. "But look, it takes two to tango. It takes directors, writers, technicians, other actors who know ten times as much as I do—a hundred people—to make a picture great. Mine have been great, but not because of me. Got to move. Girls have started sleeping on the steps of my apartment. Why? When I went to the opening of How To Marry a Millionaire in New York a few weeks ago four cops had to usher me across Times Square. Cops—imagine! I wanted to drop through the pavement. What's the big attraction? Not really me, not my talent. Up in New Haven 2400 girls hung around the lobby three hours before the picture opened! And down in Florida on location—the things that went on were fantastic. Why?"

"Wait a minute," I interrupted. "I know plenty of young actors who'd think that was swell."

"It is. It's wonderful. I love it," admitted Bob. "I like fans. I'm a fan myself—the greatest. Listen—I was sitting in the bar at the Sherry-Netherland Hotel right by the window—and every ten minutes a gang of kids came up outside. I got up every time and went outside until they had what they wanted. I had an awful time getting one drink down. I was flattered; it made me feel humble. But—well, I hope they all go to see my pictures. See what I mean? I don't want to be a red hot pure publicity flash in the pan. I want to elevate, man, elevate, grow and rate all this!"

IT HAPPENED TO ME

In 1947 I was stationed at the Submarine Base in New London, Connecticut. On my last leave before going overseas I went to New York, hoping to have the time of my life. But when I arrived, I found that my wallet was missing. Like millions of servicemen without money, I ended up at the U.S.O. and was met by a charming hostess. She was so understanding and sympathetic that I poured out my heart to her. At the end of a wonderful evening, she offered to lend me $25. Thanking her for her kindness, I asked where I could find her to repay my debt. She made the imprint of her lips on a piece of paper and signed it, "Marlene Dietrich." I'll be grateful to her for the rest of my life.

Charles A. Dwyer

"Have a cigarette," I suggested. "That is, if it won't stunt your growth." Bob laughed, lit it and relaxed on the couch and I felt like a psychiatrist with Bob talking it out. But I think it was good for him.

Robert John Wagner isn't like the average run of Cinderella boy who collects fast fame in Hollywood. What's hit him isn't a natural development from his beginnings at all. He hasn't struggled up from nothing. He hasn't even a show business background. Of course, that "born with a silver spoon" malarkey is just that. It gives Bob a pain to read that he's a rich man's son. He isn't. His folks are just comfortable middle class people. But it's true that because of his conservative bringing up he belongs in the limelight about as much as, say, a steel salesman. That's what his dad, R. J., Sr., is and that's what Bob undoubtedly would have been if the Wagners hadn't decided to transplant the family home and business to southern California when their only son was still a pup.

Even if he tried, Bob Wagner couldn't pull away from the legitimate slant to everything he does. What put the acting bug in his noggin in the first place was not a crowd of starry-eyed kids from the Studio Club or the Hollywood-and-Vine extra set living off their cuffs to hang on in Hollywood and have a good time. The idols Bob shagged balls for around the Bel-Air Club weren't Johnny-Come-Latelys or fly-by-night promoters. They wouldn't belong to Bel-Air if they were. They were the cream of the crop, seriously and successfully wrapped up in one of the most fascinating games the world has ever known. And what lodged inside Bob Wagner's handsome head was not only that fascination but also respect for the people he identified with it. They were deadly serious and intelligent about their business. And from the start that's what Bob was determined to be, too.

The whole thing has been R. J.'s own special show. Nobody bucked him at home. The Wagner family always gave Junior his head and helped when necessary. It was his own pal-type dad who skeptically but loyally promoted Bob's first look at a movie camera with a club friend, Director Bill Wellman, to start him off. The understanding pop lent Bob, all in all, about $4000 to get started, every cent of which Bob has just paid back. Still, to Bob Wagner the whole thing has been a unique personal challenge. It's no lark. It's his adopted profession and life's work, and that's exactly how he looks at it. Now he's got to make it important, dignified and real, or in his book he has failed. And beneath the pretty profile and peach bloom cheeks of Bob Wagner's good looks there's stuff as sturdy as the product his dad still sells. That's why the hey-hey and hoorah that's swept down on him is disturbing. He's convinced it is destined to goof out and leave him flat if he doesn't fill in behind the blown-up fame—and fast.

"Right now it's like stepping from one puddle of water to another," Bob sized up his career. "You lift a foot out of one pool and it closes behind you. There's no place left there. The newcomers are already filling it. You've got to make a place for yourself in the one ahead. Right now I'm between puddles."

He's right. There's no standing still and no going back in Hollywood. Someday, Bob believes, all this avalanche of popularity will roll on past him, as it has rolled past every other young star sensation before him—and what then?

"A bunch of us here in Hollywood all hit about the same time," observed Bob. "Tony Curtis, Aldo Ray, Rock Hudson and some others. We're all in the same boat. The joy ride doesn't go on forever. I've been a lot luckier than most. Oh, I haven't done as many pictures as, say, Tony, has—but what breaks I've had! The people I've worked with! The top productions I've lucked into—With A Song In My Heart, Stars And Stripes Forever, Titanic, 12-Mile Reef—in CinemaScope—and now Prince Valiant. Why, no other guy I've named has had breaks like that. And if I get Broken Lance—cross your fingers will you?" He shook his head in wonder. Then Bob rattled off some of the actors he has worked with. "Don't you think," asked Bob hopefully, "that some of that talent could maybe rub off?" I thought a lot of it already had. But he shook his head. "Not unless I mature," he said. "That's why I've got to lift out of this kid level. Got to switch on some dignity and duck the foolishness."

R. J. Wagner is pretty serious about this. At his studio, he has already laid down the law against gag pictures and layouts. He won't make eyes at girls for sweet publicity, or fake silly shots. He gives a flat "No" to ideas like, "How My Girls Should Act on A Date," "My Ten Rules For Popularity" and such. He's concerned about the wolf peg that's being hung on him—as it has been hung on every movie dreamboat in his spot before. Bob dropped a new stack of records on the spindle to soothe the savage beast before he went into that.

"From what people read," he said, "you'd think I spent all my spare time chasing girls and partying around. Why, I haven't taken a girl out to a big Hollywood deal since I took Mona Freeman to the première of The Robe. Parties—I just don't care for parties, never have. When I do go I stop in early and leave early. Somebody asks me why I'm leaving and I say, 'Got to get up early and vote.'" Bob grinned. "Now, I like girls all right. I've got girls stashed away that I see all the time, swell girls—you wouldn't know them—but I don't see them in public if I can help it. Have you ever been 'a romance item?'" asked Wagner.

That is part of the routine Bob's stuck with. "It's okay," allowed Bob, "if it were true. But it isn't and then it's embarrassing to get tied up in print, not only for me but for the girl. I took out this girl, Josephine Abercrombie, in New York. A wonderfully nice girl. (Her folks run the big Abercrombie & Fitch store.) What do you know? Next morning somebody says I'm trying to marry an heiress! Marry her? I just met her! Things like that happen and what's the result? I add up like a jerk. So I just have to watch it and now and then get unhappy about it."

Not long ago, Bob recounted, he was paired off in a personal appearance junket with a starlet who shall be nameless here. When he climbed aboard the plane, there was a press agent by the girl's side putting a ring on her third finger. "An old family heirloom," he explained. "Let's get a picture." Bob can think fast. "Uh-uh," he declined. "Either the ring gets off the plane or I do." And he started for the door. Well, the same stunt was tried again. Both times he had to get tough about it, although he hates to be that way.

It's no secret, although Bob didn't say so, that he blew his stack more than he ever had before when that romance fiction about him and Terry Moore began hitting the newsstands while they were making 12-Mile Reef in Florida. Terry and Bob have been thrown together plenty during the course of two careers that began to roll about the same time in the same place. Both are young and attractive and red hot in popularity. So what can you expect, by all the past, present and future formulas of Hollywood ballyhoo? But Bob just has other ideas about that sort of thing. He likes Terry, but he doesn't like being pictured as her love captive—not for a minute. There was more than one long distance call back to Hollywood from Florida and the message was, "Try to stop this—please!"

That's the difference between Bob Wagner and the usual young Hollywood shooting star. He won't use just everything for fuel to jet propel himself. He wants to rate the ride.

"I don't want to sound like a square or a snob," said Bob earnestly. "I don't think I am. But look, it's only good sense. You can't build a business on baloney. If you lose your honesty, if you ditch what you believe in, then it comes across on the screen. You've got to be somebody or you don't look and act like somebody. It's as simple as that. But really to be somebody I've got a lot to learn. And now's the time for me to buckle down."

To Bob Wagner his studio is his college. After prep school he had planned to take a course in business administration at Claremont Men's College. Acting jobs stopped that, but he's taking it just the same—right where he works. Bob's on intimate terms with everyone, from the Skourases to

C'EST SI BON

No international tension here—for Ginger and Jacques, Franco-American relations couldn't be better!

Married for over a year, Ginger and Jacques have just made their first co-starring film.

■ Over a year ago when Ginger Rogers, then forty-two, and Jacques de Bergerac, then twenty-six, were married in Palm Springs, Hollywood guessed the marriage would last as long as Ginger wanted it to.

Ginger is one of those lovely, forceful actresses who stomps through life demanding to see the manager. She usually gets what she wants.

Before Evelyn Keyes introduced her to de Bergerac in Paris two years ago she had wanted three men: Jack Culpepper, a vaudevillian, Lew Ayres, an actor, and Jack Briggs, a Marine. Her desire was short-lived. She divorced each of them.

With de Bergerac, however, she says it's different. She expects this marriage to be her last. Ginger is going all-out to make her handsome, six-foot, two-inch husband a big-name star. It was largely through her intervention that MGM put de Bergerac under contract last year. The studio tried hard with the husky Frenchman, teaching him how to act and how to speak English, but the final screen tests were turned down.

Jacques tried other Hollywood studios. Unless his wife came with him, there were just no takers.

A few months ago, Ginger was offered a British picture entitled Life Line, the story of an American actress and a Frenchman.

Ginger not only accepted the role, "but I told the producer that Jacques was a natural for the Frenchman's role. I'm sure Jacques has what it takes to be a star. I simply know it." She bought interest in the production.

Life Line has been finished and moviegoers will have the opportunity to determine whether de Bergerac is really a good actor or whether love has clouded Ginger's judgment. She has been in love many times but it has not been known to fog her financial vision. She is one of the wealthiest actresses in the business.

Jacques gets nettled when interviewers suggest that his wife is sponsoring his career. He says he cannot understand why people in America make such a fuss about the age difference between Ginger and him.

"In France," he says, "when a man and his wife love each other nobody asks when they were born."

As for Ginger, she has never looked more radiant nor complained less.

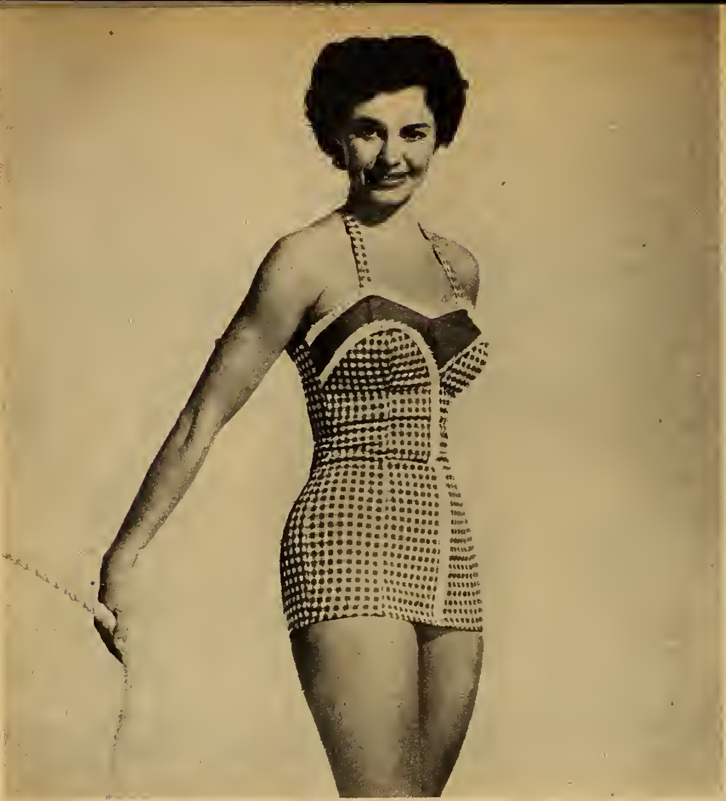
During the filming of Life Line, the couple had to stay in a small country hotel in Middlesex where the beds were too small for them and the service was not what Miss Rogers is accustomed to. She remained cheerful.

Even when her furs were stolen she remained composed.

"Furs," she said, "are not vitally important. They can be replaced."

And with that she clutched her husband's arm, turned, and looked into his eyes as if to say, "But you. my dear, cannot."

FOUR FOR THE SHOW



Cyd Charisse models a smart, elasticized sheath swim suit of bright red and white checks. The news is in its Celanese Celaperm fabric that prevents colors from fading. The sweetheart bodice with grosgrain ruffle trim is side-boned (wear it with or without straps). Also blue or black checks with white. About $11. See Cyd next in MGM's Brigadoon.

Debbie Reynolds wears a lastex swim suit that features the popular horseshoe neckline. The shirred front has magic adaptability to all figure types. This suit can also be worn strapless. Colors: Royal blue, black or brown. About $9. Debbie keeps her hair soft and lovely with a U. S. Holland hair dry swim cap. See Debbie in MGM's Athena.

■ Exciting beach news of 1954 includes the glamorous Sea Nymph swim suits by Jordan that have been awarded the Modern Screen Fashion Star Medal. These well-loved suits for sunny places everywhere feature sleek lines, easy cut, finest fabrics, luscious colors and expert workmanship. Lovely MGM stars Cyd Charisse, Debbie Reynolds, Elaine Stewart and Ann Miller pose in Sea Nymph swim suits for Modern Screen's readers.

Facing page: Elaine Stewart and Ann Miller play twins under the sun in their identical faille lastex swim suits. The bodice has a soft feminine fold-down cuff, center tie—the hip-line has false flap pocket trim (the suit bodice is side-boned for strapless wear). Black, red, brown, yellow, royal blue or sky blue. About $9. Elaine Stewart is appearing in MGM's CinemaScope production Brigadoon and Ann Miller can be seen in MGM's Technicolor film Athena.

■ The key to body beauty is yours with any one of Maidenform's brassieres. Maidenform received the 1954 Modern Screen Fashion Star Medal for outstanding merit in design, construction, fabrics and styling of brassieres for every figure type. We chose the famous Etude strapless style because it so beautifully adapts itself to all types of clothes. This bra gently moulds and controls and is as comfortable as skin itself, for the wiring is safely and prettily covered, the body contacts padded with foam rubber, the cups form-stitched and the back band made of elastic. Modern Screen likes to think of the Etude strapless as summer's favorite all-occasion bra. We feature it in white broadcloth. It costs about $3.50. We show it on this page with a white nylon net summer formal skirt which doubles with every dressy separates top. We add silvery slippers and fabulous rhinestone and sapphire costume jewelry for glitter.

All the beautiful costume jewelry—copies of real pieces—shown on this and the facing page is by Capri.

(Continued from page 65) the studio bootblack. Back east he trails through the business offices and buddies with the secretaries. He's at home in every department connected with making pictures, selling, distributing or showing them. Away from work his best friends are not kids his age interested only in their weekly checks and in having a ball. They're older people who can teach him the thousand things he's determined to know—people like Directors Walter Lang, Sammy Fuller, Eddie Dimytryk, Henry Hathaway, Mary and Richard Sale, the writers. He keeps an inquisitive pipeline open to every corner of the lot. Bob bought 100 shares of TCF stock last year and although it has almost doubled in price by now he wouldn't sell it if it hit the skies. He brought out a loose leaf file and riffled through it as we talked. "Stories," said Bob, "I read a lot. Some of these the studio has bought. You never can tell when there might be a part for a guy like me. Take Prince Valiant, for instance—"

Bob got that one strictly by his own initiative. He took the idea of the dashing medieval character right out of a comic strip he clipped and brought it into the office of producer Robert Jacks, Darryl Zanuck's son-in-law. Jacks liked the idea and promised to look into it. "When you do," suggested Bob, "give me a chance at the wig, will you?" Bob Jacks said he'd do. And, of course, Wagner wore the wig—for the best part he's had so far. What's more, the job he did there has already cinched him for another swashbuckling title role in Lord Vanity, the Shellabarger novel.

"The roughest time for me is between pictures—like right now," sighed Bob. "Look at me—jumpy as a witch. Can't settle down. I've lost nine pounds. You know, I really go off my nut when I'm not working. It's such a great kick to start a picture. I'm really living then. But you hit such a pace! When it's over, I can't cool down."

Bob used to cool down pasting a golf ball around the Bel-Air links. He'd still like to, but that is mostly a vain hope these days. "My mother gave me a beautiful golf set for Christmas," he said. "New rocket shaft Walter Hagen clubs, a terrific bag, black leather with red lining—that's my favorite color combination—but you know I haven't had a chance to break it in yet. My game's gone to pot. Dad beat me down in La Jolla and the boys at Bel-Air are going to take all my money when I get there. I just don't have time any more to practice. I get as far as the locker room, the telephone rings, and I'm back on the hook. It's a layout—or an interview."

"Like this."

Bob grinned. "Like this. And it's swell with me. Don't get me wrong. I'm lucky you're here. But what can I tell you? I'm such a dull character. All work and no play."

"You're not kidding me," I told him. "With you there's strictly no difference." That's what makes Bobby run. He's just plain crazy about his job.

"Come on," he fidgeted. "Let's get out of here. Take a tour around the lot, hey? Got to look after my interests."

So WE TOOK a tour around the lot. That is, it was a tour for me. For Bob Wagner it was just the daily and often all-day round, but he wouldn't trade it for a trip to the moon.

He couldn't take a step without somebody's hailing him. "Hey, Lover-Boy!" shouted a guy from the catwalk around the cutters' building. "Love her yourself!" yelled back Bob, "Everything under control?"

"Better come up and check."

He moseyed into the make-up department with all those mirrors, hair dryers and barbers' chairs. "See my Broken Lance test?" he asked the head make-up man anxiously, and got a nod. "How'd you like it?"

"Too dark."

"It's the photography, not the make-up," decided Bob. "Let's go in here." He pushed open a heavy door. Inside the dubbing stage hell was popping on a giant screen, as G.I.'s got drilled by machine guns. From the controls a chorus of voices greeted, "Hi, Bob," and went on with the slaughter for Hell And High Water. "Great reel," Bob told them after the lights flashed up. "Knocks you out of your seat."

"Thank you, Mister Wagner," bowed one in mock servility. "Yes, Mister Wagner. Then it's okay to go ahead?" But you could tell they loved the guy. Bob grinned.

"What a crew!"

At the scoring stage a huge symphony orchestra thundered music as a tense Demetrius scene unreeled. The orchestra stopped midscore and everybody laughed. I didn't see why. "Piano forgot to come in," explained Bob.

"You lead orchestras, too?" I asked him. He laughed.

That's how it went all over the big plant—wardrobe, camera shop, make-up, script, a couple of dressingrooms and a few sound stages. Nothing exactly new to me but through Bob Wagner's eyes it did indeed seem wonderful, fabulous, fantastic and great. Those eyes were shining as we sat down in the cafe for a Coke.

"You know," said Bob, "sometimes this seems like a crazy town and a crazier world. Here I am just an ordinary guy, twenty-four years old, with all this luck and all this fuss. I'll go home now to my apartment, $125 a month, furnished with some things my folks left me when they moved—all I need. But I'm looking for another one, bigger and custom furnished with a whole new deal. For a while I thought about a house. Almost went for a made-over stable on a big place in Beverly Hills. But $39,500! Wow! I couldn't swing that. Actually, why should I want a house? Other day I tried to buy a horse named "Steel" in one of my pictures, but they wouldn't sell him. What would I do with a horse? Can't ride it. My bum eardrum hurts when I bounce. Just pet it, I guess."

"I spend a lot of money on clothes. This coat now, custom tailored, and these slacks by Hoffman-Tarzia. I don't really have to have clothes like this. Cars have cost me a lot, too. Lost money on trades—my Cadillac, MG, Ford, Mercury. I cracked up a couple. When I eat out, which is all the time, it's at Romanoff's or Chasens. Expensive. I came back from Florida broke. I've got a business manager now who's holding me down. What I mean is, sometimes it all seems crazy. Me, in a seventy per cent income tax bracket!

"I'm just the same guy I always was," Bob soliloquized. "But people say I'm a star when I'm nothing of the sort. They expect me to act differently, be different. Kids write letters and people ask me questions, as if anybody cared. 'Are you in love?' 'When are you going to get married?' "

"Well, when are you?"

"Someday, I guess. But not for a long, long while with what I've got to do. Right now I'm as free as the birds. But the point is: You can get a cockeyed slant on things from the spot I'm in if you don't watch out.

"But then," reflected Bob, "I come on this lot and I walk around and see what's here, what it's really all about. Big things going on all around. The greatest talent, brains and energy making important entertainment for millions of people all over the world. And I'm a part of it!

"That's the really wonderful thing that's happened to me. That's what I've got to prove I'm up to. Say," he choked it off, "can I give you a lift to your car? Got to dress, eat and catch a show."

We climbed into Bob's new Mercury, with all the gadgets, black finish outside, red leather inside. Bob gunned it confidently with a last loving look at the place he'd rather be than anywhere else, despite all you might hear to the contrary. He didn't seem so worried any more. "So long," he waved when we reached the gate. "Let's have a drink sometime and maybe another talk."

The gateman took my pass. "Been with Bob Wagner? A mighty fine boy," he said. "Going to be a big man around here one of these days."

I nodded. Why not? It's not exactly impossible. END just the facts, ma'am!

(Continued from page 59) private life. 'All I've tried to do is entertain the public and grab a little happiness. Naturally, I haven't any plans for marriage now. There are still nine months to wait before my divorce becomes final. I've been going with Dorothy Towne and I may marry her in the future.' "

Mr. Humphrey's reliability as a reporter is not to be questioned. Yet it is impossible to completely verify Jack's romantic plans. No man can be completely certain that he's going to wed any girl in nine days, let alone nine months. The facts, however, would seem to confirm that the romance with Dorothy is definitely on. A photographer who took pictures of them dancing together had this to say: "The only two people in Hollywood who never smiled for the camera in my recent experience have been Marilyn Monroe and Jack Webb. A few months back Marilyn began to smile. Now she's Mrs. DiMaggio. Every time I run into Webb he's smiling, so I draw my own conclusions."

Now a quote offered by Jack Webb to Erskine Johnson of the Los Angeles Daily News, in answer to the charge that he's too temperamental. Said Jack: "Sure, I've blown up on the set. I don't like to be distracted. It happens to everyone in our business. But I don't feel I'm difficult to get along with. I've had the same cameraman and most of the same crew for sixty pictures. I really don't take myself seriously."

And he doesn't, although the same attitude does not apply to his work. Sleuthing for Modern Screen, I waited for the formidable Webb in a corner office on the third floor of the Animation building on what the Walt Disney lot is pleased to call Dopey Street. Exactly seven minutes later, the highest rated actor in TV movies walked in, apologized, and said, "Holy cow, we're not so busy we have to be impolite." That was a good beginning. As a rule Hollywood actors never beg your pardon unless they are an hour behind schedule. I warmed to this guy immediately.

I asked him: "Do you mind all these imitations of you, like the records, the nightclub character and such?"

"Why should I?" he asked. "I'll be frank with you. I personally don't care for the Jones record, for instance. There's some vulgarity in it. It doesn't stick with the spirit of the program, which I'd think must be in any real satire. But it's all right, I guess. Imitation's the sincerest form of flattery. Of course, they could imitate you right out of the business, but it's never worked out that way. Take the first good imitation—the record by Stan Freberg. If I couldn't laugh at that I'd be in a sad way."

Although he is sometimes referred to as an actor with a crew haircut, Jack Webb's almost jet black hair is just plain short, not collegiate. Also, he is younger than he appears on the screen. Joe Friday would appear to be forty, smack on the button. Webb is thirty-three years old. He differs from Friday in other ways. His face is much more mobile, his smile more frequent, his justly admired voice freer and less measured.

And on that point I questioned Mr. Webb again. "I don't mean to put you on the defensive all the time, but your critics and Dragnet's charge that this voice business is an over-stylized device."

Webb rose to the needling, grabbed the hook nicely. "I'll answer that. In the first place we don't make Dragnet for the critics. In the second, third and several other places, we haven't had any demand for a change of pace or tempo from the public. When we do, we'll start making some changes. The public's my boss—period."

That's unusual. Movie-makers' attitudes in the past have been that the public consists largely of morons who darned well will take what they're handed. Webb says, "Not too long ago the public told us to relax a little. Nobody else could have told us unless it would be the Los Angeles Police Department. If in one day's letters I receive as many as fifteen urging one particular reform, and if there are not many dissenters, then there's a good chance that we may make the change. Last season, you may remember, we made our first pass at humor. It was real quiet humor, the key we thought fitted us best."

A secretary came in with a script, put it in front of Webb and then handed him a postcard. He turned it over to me, grinning. It was from a girl in the Middle West who expressed the hope that Friday and fiancée would marry so that she, the writer, could baby-sit for them. "That one's a bit premature," Webb observed, "but a helpful soul, don't you think?"

Turning serious again I brought up the subject, carefully, that has been tossed around among the gossips. Namely that Jack Webb considers himself heaven's gift to TV and that his opinions and only his are worth anything. His response was not that of a badgered witness.

"Look, Dragnet's my responsibility. If they don't like it that way I'm the guy to kick. In fact, I guess I'm the guy to kick for almost anything they don't like. I'm the director and I help with the writing."

It might even be said with full candor that Webb is "the works." Webb is Dragnet and Dragnet is Webb. That is the way he feels about it. "It was a fair little show to begin with. Nothing terribly ambitious. But now I can feel for Dr. Frankenstein. The show's the monster and I'm the slave. It stuns me a little, what's happened. But there's a difference. The good doctor had a pretty wet time after his creation hit its stride. Me, I sort of like it."

There is little doubt that Jack Webb thoroughly enjoys what he is doing, a strong contrast to most actors who, upon reaching a position in which the public indirectly pays them around $5,000 a week, declare that they hate every second of the time spent exposing themsleves to the cameras. This again puts Webb in a class with men like Alan Ladd and Clark Gable, who actually enjoy acting. It also removes Webb from the class of actors whose small talent has rapidly expanded their hat size.

Still, Jack's friends wish he could slow up a little. A few sob sisters credit the fact that Dragnet all but consumed Jack's life for the breakup of his marriage to Julie London Webb last year. This is untrue. The better informed—Webb among them—think he thrives on a fourteen-hour working day, no hobbies and many outside interests.

"It isn't actually as bad as they say," Webb contends. "I like to visit friends, have a couple of beers and bat the breeze, and I am interested in a lot of things besides Dragnet and show business." Two of those include his four-year-old daughter, Stacy, whom he likes to have visit him at the studio, and his almost-two-year-old daughter, Lisa. They are interested in him, too, and so are a lot of other kids. You can't fool children. They don't always go for actors who are publicized as their favorites. But one kid said, "Joe Friday—Mr. Webb—he's real. I went up to him once when he was busy talking to some important people. He walked away from them, gave me his autograph and talked to me a long while. He didn't have to."

Jack Webb does a lot of things he doesn't have to do. One of them is to really worry about the personal welfare of 150 or more people who directly earn their living through Mark VII Productions. They have to eat. They have kids and mortgages on their homes, too.

Webb doesn't make a big point of this, except to say: "Like some other actor-producers I'm responsible to a lot of people besides myself. So maybe I worry a little and look glum sometimes. That doesn't mean I'm taking myself too seriously or thinking I'm a crusader. How pompous could I get? We're entertainers. If a mission sets in along the way, then let's get it accomplished, and in this case part of that mission is a better understanding of the men who serve on the police force. Take the average policeman. His pay isn't much. Down here on Main Street a policeman breaks up a barroom brawl and some woman tears the sleeve off his uniform. He's got to pay for that, and on a salary most of us in Hollywood think we couldn't live on. So, we've got no soapbox, but I've wanted to point a program at just that situation. But do you think the Los Angeles Police Department would let us? Absolutely not. They don't want favors. Not collectively or individually."

It's too bad that Jack Webb couldn't be put in charge of a campaign to dramatize the needs of the courageous and quiet men who enforce our laws silently day in and day out without complaint. Indirectly, he already does that, but if flattered on the subject he'll only scowl a little and say, "It makes us (he habitually includes his whole crew in speaking of the show) damn happy that most policemen like us and people approve of Joe Friday."

Delving into Jack's private life requires a dissolve to a not-too-posh section of Los Angeles where a somewhat frail and asthmatic child was raised by his mother and maternal grandmother because his parents were divorced. Forced by ill health and semi-poverty into rather sedentary pursuits, he became absorbed with painting. Later he turned to a scholarly interest in jazz and jam sessions, a fact which is significant in view of his plan to film a series for TV called Peter Kelly's Blues. Mr. Kelly will be not unlike the late Bix Beiderbecke who led a brief, intense life during the Hoagy Carmichael college day era.

But that's a little ahead of the story. Jack Webb had to forego a college education to support his family—the two women who during the worst of his asthma had carried him up hills and stairways. He became a clothing salesman, then switched to a rather aimless and bitter pursuit of acting because of the necessity for more money.

In 1947 Jack married Julie London, after being pleasurably staggered by a pin-up picture of her printed in a magazine during the war. After V-J day they were married. Both took hard the failure of their marriage some three years later. Jack, unlike most of the male favorites in the entertainment world, has refused to discuss the matter with anyone although he is constantly pressed to make public statements.

This writer, who served a little time as a police reporter, tried, then gave up, figuring that Jack Webb is one man who really means it when he passes the word that he doesn't want his private life or the lives of those around him invaded. Well, you can't blame him. The memories harbored by the big home in Encino are not too happy. Folks out that way miss him, though. Like over at Love's Barbeque Restaurant. He used to drop in there now and then for their really famous barbecued beef sandwiches with deep oven baked beans. So did a lot of other stars of both television and the cinema. But Jack Webb's autographed picture is the only one they framed and hung on the wall.

"I don't know, though," one of the waitresses said recently. "We're remodeling and if he doesn't get in here pretty soon, we may take him down." She said it affectionately, though, and I promised to remind Mr. Webb next time I saw him. I'm sure he doesn't intentionally neglect any of his old cronies, but now he lives way across town in an old-style bungalow kitty-corner from the old Bette Davis home on Franklin Avenue. He lives quietly with his mother and only a few of the closer neighbors know that the fellow who drives up in that sleek white Cadillac convertible is the Joe Friday they see on their television sets.

HE'S A PRETTY average sort of guy whose talent has caught fire in a big way. People will say a lot of things about him simply because he keeps his mouth shut and tends his own affairs in the gaudy, drum-beating world of show business. In trying to show Jack Webb as he really is, you can't find a better tag line than the quote pried out of him by Hal Humphrey, from whom we swiped a few colorful lines earlier in this yarn.

To wit: "I'm no angel, but I still can look at myself in the mirror when I shave."
—Jack Webb. END

towards the sun

(Continued from page 45) when I began to feel uncomfortable and decided I had better go up for air. Then I realized that the roof of the cave had been sloping down all the time and I was deeper than I ordinarily dive. It might take me longer than I thought to get my breath—too long, maybe!

Don't let anyone tell you that a man can't sweat under water. I was panicky getting out of there. My clearest memory is of that split second when I turned around to swim out of the cave. Around and behind me was murk and deep shadow. Ahead, through the opening, was sunlight streaming down from above—streaming down like the light that used to fall on the altar of the church where I served as an acolyte.

I don't know how I reached the surface again. As I floated there and slowly regained my composure I knew again that for me there could never be any doubt. The difference between being in the church and out of it was like the difference between being in the sunshine which now warmed me and being in that cave—that cold cavern—below.

I have friends who don't look to God, or to any spiritual force for that matter, and it is to them that I wish I could present this picture of faith. Because He and His meaning are so necessary to me as to be an inalienable part of my existence.

I did not need to be frightened in a far-off ocean to learn this—only to realize it again. It has come to me at times when there was no fear; just the opposite, in fact. Only a few winters ago I was skiing at Winter Park, Colorado, all alone on the great white expanse of the mountainside, when a feeling of indescribable exhilaration overcame me. I was alone and yet I had a positive sensation that I had never in my life before been so close to Someone. These things are too personal to be explained, I know. Yet from the attempts others have made to explain them to me I know that they happen to all of us. We are all equally favored—if we but care to respond.

MAYBE I AM fortunate in that I had a warm and satisfying relationship with my faith, the Episcopalian, right from the start. There are times in the lives of all small boys when any church service is too long to sit through. That time was over quickly for me, perhaps, because of a rather dramatic episode in my childhood.

I was only five years old when I suffered a severe attack of appendicitis. Surgery was followed by peritonitis and then nephritis. I can remember lying on my hospital cot, quite conscious although I was in a state of crisis.

A nurse had come to the bed and was leaning over me when she asked, "How long has he been like this?"

There was a reply, some hurried movements and then the beginning of emergency treatment that seemed to involve everything from slapping my face and administering injections, to piling me into warm blankets and even surrounding me with infra-red lamps. I had gone into a stage preliminary to a death coma.

But while I was aware of the fact that the doctors and the nurses were fighting for my life with all the medical skill at their command, I knew also that my parents had been summoned, and our priest, and that they were praying for me. What came through to me then as the telling force, the most powerful force, were their prayers. This impression I cannot forget. It may well have been behind my decision, later on, when I was in high school, to become an acolyte at our church—Christ's Episcopal of Whitefish Bay in Milwaukee.

I was studying music at this time and one of my favorite ways of spending a weekday afternoon was to enter the church quietly when no one was about and softly play the electric organ. I'm not telling about this as an illustration of my piety. I have an idea that it was my secret desire to be a performer that was being satisfied here. Even so, I like to know that I got the satisfaction from my church.

Our church was not a large one and ordinarily no one ever entered it during a weekday afternoon so my musical sessions were rarely interrupted. But one day, as I was playing, a man and woman came in and sat down quietly as if to pray. I didn't know what to do and finally left the organ and approached them.

"Would you rather I didn't play?" I asked.

They looked at me in surprise. "Of course not," said the woman. "Please go on," the man told me.

From their manner I knew they had accepted my music as a part of the atmosphere of the church, like its vaulted ceiling and stained glass windows. I felt that perhaps I should be a part of it.

Ever since, music has appealed to me as an important and impressive part of any service, and perhaps the most impressive part of it is the way it internationalizes man. On my trip abroad I visited churches whose pastors I could not understand because of difference in language—or even difference in dialect when my own language was spoken. But all of the difference was wiped out and it was like being back in my own church when the organist sat down and the melody and surge of an inspiring hymn rolled out. When I went to Westminster Abbey in London, where of course I understood the sermon, I still felt like a tourist until the music started. At that moment I became a worshiper.

ONE TENDS to think of faith as a phenomenon stemming only from the church. Personally I have never believed that a man must be in front of the altar or even technically within the church to be assured of sanctification. I really feel that God can be found anywhere and by any name. A man seeking God can find Him if he doesn't worry so much about where to find Him as how. The great truths about Him, it seems to me, are not confined to any special place.

But for most people I do think that membership in a definite denomination and attendance at formal services are the most rewarding of spiritual relationships. The rituals involved, so often criticized as only pageantry, are important because they symbolize man's hunger for salvation. They help create an emotional appeal and I can see nothing wrong in this. The most human thing about people is emotion. A church whose spire points to the sky, whose altar glows with warm radiance, whose priest stirs the heart as well as the intellect with his message, is in my opinion playing its proper inspirational role in the lives of its membership.

I remember visiting the Moody Bible Institute in Chicago one Sunday. As I entered the church I noticed that many of the men walking in with me were derelicts of the most dejected type. They were so badly dressed they looked like so many tramps. But most depressing was the lost look on their faces, eyes staring out at a world which had no meaning for them.

Not three quarters of an hour later I had witnessed a virtual transfiguration of all these men. They had heard in the ensuing time a message of inspiration from a man as old as any of them, but with a heart that overflowed with the happiness he had found in his calling as a minister. And he made it plain that this was the only difference between him and the other men; he had no more worldly goods, no better health, probably. Having narrowed down this difference he proceeded to eliminate it altogether by calling for volunteers to join him as Christians.

They began to stand up and their faces shone with hope. You forgot how they were dressed outwardly in the wonder of how they had changed inwardly. This happened in a church. Men had entered with hunger in their stomachs but it had been proved that their souls and hearts were even hungrier. This could happen only in a church.

As I have mentioned before, the mood of devotion and closeness to my faith comes as often to me on a lonely mountain as it does when I am sitting in my pew. Nevertheless, I am a church member. In Hollywood I attend the Episcopalian Church of St. Mary of the Angels. The reason for my regular attendance is that I go not only to worship but to re-orient myself to the world in which I live.

Within the atmosphere of my church I am struck by realizations about myself that would not come to me otherwise. I can review my attitudes and actions with a clarity which I attain, I think, because I am released from the ordinary tensions of the day at such a time. It is possible, for instance, to harbor an intolerant view of someone or to have offended a friend without knowing that one has been guilty of a serious social breach. Then one takes time out to meditate quietly and the truth dawns.

My faith is a direct source of strength to me, of course. The first screen test I made for a Hollywood studio was not a good one and I earned a negative report. I pretended it didn't matter but fooled no one—certainly not myself. The future of my acting career looked black and my heart felt like someone had hung weights on it. The feeling persisted until I decided one afternoon to go to church.

There was no service, no other person; just me brooding in my seat. As always, I felt the flow of His spirit and against it my negative thinking could not persist. When I left I knew that nothing had happened that wasn't for the best. Not long afterward my earlier test came to the attention of 20th Century-Fox, my present studio, and this time I won out. But even if this had not come about my heart and my courage would not have failed me again.

As a young husband and a new father I am not too crazy about all the traveling an actor has to do; it seems I am always being separated from those I love and sent into lonely exile. I was only two days married when I had to leave my wife and go on location in Norfolk, Virginia. This was four years ago, during the filming of Princess Of The Nile in which I worked with Debra Paget and Michael Rennie and it was at Christmas time, too.

I can see myself now, wandering through the streets of Norfolk alone, not knowing what to do. And then one day I got an idea and entered the old Saint Paul's Episcopal Church where I met the Rev. Moultrie Guerry. We had a long talk, he sensed my loneliness and took me home with him to dinner. I met Mrs. Guerry, his twenty-year-old son, Moultrie, Jr., and his daughter, Sally. In the warmth of this family gathering I felt almost as if I were at home with my own folks and my wife.

Two years later I was again pulled away from those I loved by my work—and again at the worst possible time. This time I had been a father for only a week when I had to leave on that trip to Malta I spoke about before. The birth of our son, Christopher, made us a nice little family of three but I soon broke this up by going to Europe and staying there for four months. What peace of mind I had when I took off I had obtained from my prayers for the welfare of Barbara and Kit. The fact that I could continue to pray for them while I was away, in full confidence that my prayers were being heard, was my remaining and only consolation.

I'm afraid, as I read what I have written up to now, that I have sounded like a preacher myself. Well, there could be reason for this since I once planned to enter the ministry.

When World War II ended I was a high school senior and still an acolyte. One Sunday a young visiting priest officiated at our services in church. I assisted him at the altar and he thanked me afterward. "It's nice to have an acolyte help you," he said. "The last service I conducted I conducted alone. It was The Service of the Dead at Iwo Jima."

The war was still fresh in my mind. I had even contemplated enlisting as soon as I had graduated. With his words I suddenly got a new conception of priesthood—the romance of it as well as the spiritual dedication of it.

After I left school, however, I knew my talents better and thought I might make an actor. But, as you can see, the preaching urge has not died out entirely! END

Piper Laurie and accordionist D. Contino.

THIS TIME FOR REAL?

Piper and Dick have weathered a lot to see whether or not this is love.

■ One of Hollywood's best kept secrets has been the years-old bond of affection between actress Piper Laurie and singer Dick Contino.

You've read about Piper and her other romances, producer Leonard Goldstein, actor Dick Anderson, hotel heir David Schine, crooner Vic Damone and movie executive Charles Simonelli; but until recently there has been no public mention of the young singing accordionist.

Contino, in a case that made national headlines a few years ago, was sentenced to jail for evading the draft. Studio executives—not Piper—believed that any connection between them, however remote, might affect her career adversely.

Contino was released and promptly volunteered for military service and the Army shipped him to Korea.

He was returned to California and honorably discharged in January. When he got back to Hollywood the first girl he phoned was Piper Laurie.

"We had a lot to talk over so we went riding around town, and then the next time I took her to Mocambo and the camera boys took our pictures, and well—it was just wonderful seeing and being with her again."

Piper and Dick had met three years before "the incident," as he calls it.

"I asked a movie magazine editor for her phone number," he remembers. "She was very nice and gave me a date. We saw quite a bit of each other.

"This is a funny kind of town, and when you're on top the way I was (Contino used to average $5,000 a week as a night club performer) everyone is your pal. The minute something happens all your pals walk out.

"But all during the trouble Piper stood by me. When things were darkest she wrote me letters, gave me encouragement. She has a lot of character. She's been over to Korea twice in her spare time just to entertain the troops. I saw her over there about a year ago, and it was just like the sun coming out of the clouds."

While Contino was overseas, Piper often went out with producer Leonard Goldstein, of whom she says, "He's as old as my father, but he's a friend—not a romantic interest. The columnists insist on coupling us, so I don't argue. But Leonard is a man with whom I discuss my problems."

With Dick Contino she discusses marriage, love and the pursuit of happiness.

Piper is proud of her friendship with Dick and doesn't care who knows about it. If Dick made a mistake, certainly he's paid for it.

Says Contino, "Piper is one girl in a million, and I know it. Sure, we've discussed marriage. But we both know that I've got to re-establish myself in show business, that I've got to work like a dog, that I've got to be accepted again by the American public. (Contino started his comeback at the Mocambo on March 2.)

"Piper's got her own career to think of, and neither of us is ready for a wedding. At least I'm not—not for several years.

"There's one thing I can't say strongly enough.

"This girl stood by me when the going was toughest. If she wanted it she could have my right arm. That's how much I think of her.

"Maybe she'll fall in love and marry someone else. But she'll always have a friend in me. She is the finest girl I've ever met."

It seems that Piper Laurie feels much the same way about Dick Contino. Which is why you will be reading about the beautiful redhead and her handsome accordionist.

This looks like a real romance, the first real romance in Piper Laurie's twenty-two years.

TV TALK

(Continued from page 16) She's chaperoned by her young-looking mother now (she was all alone in Hollywood). Mama speaks hardly any English. She cooks for Zizi, advises her about her career, and takes care of her wardrobe. Zizi's clothes fall into two categories—plain, dark dresses and skirts and sweaters for work and gorgeous Dior gowns for public appearances. She buys only shoes in this country. Everything else she wears comes from her home town, Paris . . . Jean Carroll may turn up on other TV shows with her funny routines, but she'll never appear on Ed Sullivan's program again. He still gets livid at her last performance. Seems she sneaked in a little blue material when Ed wasn't looking. And that's one thing Old Stone Face won't put up with . . . When the news that Jackie Cooper and Hildy Parks were getting a divorce hit the papers, it sure surprised a lot of people—but not for any of the usual reasons. Most people didn't even know they were married! Jackie is now living in Barry Nelson's big one-room penthouse apartment in Greenwich Village. Hildy is seen around a lot with the famous television columnist John Crosby. They've been going together pretty steadily for a year now. But John, though separated from his wife, is still married . . . That rapport that you feel between Lucy and Ricky Ricardo and Ethel and Fred Mertz on I Love Lucy is for real. Lucy and Desi are very good friends with Vivian Vance and Bill Frawley, and the jokes fly as fast on the set as they do on the screen . . . Lots of TV people are beginning to get annoyed with Robert Montgomery because he spends so much time in the White House. Montgomery can do wonders with the President's morale before he goes on TV. He soothes Ike's nerves and fixes everything so that Ike doesn't have to worry. He works so hard for the President that he sometimes spends five days a week in Washington. How does he still do his TV show? Well, some people near the show claim it's much less confusing and better since the boss cut down on his working hours . . . Don't pay attention to the rumors that Sid Caesar and Imogene Coca don't get along. They have their troubles, as who doesn't? But they are devoted friends, and they're going to miss each other when they go their separate ways next fall . . . Walter Cronkite wanted that job on The Morning Show very badly. Imagine wanting to be at work long before seven A.M.! But Walter moved to New York months before it went on the air so he'd be available for all the auditions. He left his pretty red-headed wife and two little girls in Washington. They're still there, too. Walter is very social, very well liked, and his friends range from senators to Gypsy Rose Lee . . . For some reason, no one expects to like Sloan Simpson, but everyone who meets her ends up loving her . . . Another lady who is universally admired—on and off television—is Arlene Francis. If a popularity vote were taken in the trade, Arlene would win it hands down. She is just what she seems to be on television—friendly, charming, witty and very competent. When she talks about things on Home, you can bet she knows what she's talking about. When she bought a house in New York City and decided to do it over, she took care of everything herself—even hiring the plumbers and the roofers. The only difference between Arlene on TV and in private life is that 1) she looks younger in person and 2) she chews gum all the time she's off the screen—vigorously.

Grace is supposed to have pined so deeply for Clark after their romance cooled that, 'tis said, she threw herself headlong into an unfortunate romance with another handsome actor after she returned to Hollywood.

"Grace is only a kid," Clark said, "but what a nice one! I used to go on safaris with two white hunters and the natives while we were working in Africa. One day Grace asked if she could go along. After that she made many trips with us.

"I said to her one day, 'Why do you do this? These natives smell to high heaven; they've never had a bath. The safari is dangerous and uncomfortable for a girl raised in a city as you were with all the luxuries and conveniences.'

"And Grace would answer me impishly, 'I expect to get married some day and have children and I want to tell my children—and later my grandchildren—Mommy went on a safari with Clark Gable! How can I know what such an adventure is like if I don't have the actual experience? It's purely an adventure in research,' she'd laugh."

Clark went on, "You know Grace comes of a very fine family. Sometimes I was surprised that her parents let her travel so many miles to Africa without someone to look after her. But in many ways she's a rugged individualist, a girl determined to lead her own life and a good actress."

"Did you and Grace ever bring back any game from your trips?" I asked.

"Only small game," Clark said, and I smiled at what could have been a quip.

"We saw many lions and elephants, majestic and beautiful in their own realm, and well, I never had the heart to shoot one of the magnificent beasts.

"One day we came on a herd of twelve elephants and we were so close it would have been easy to kill one or two. But it would have been too easy, just wanton destruction with all the element of sport left out. So we left them alone."

"Clark, these sound like exciting adventures to share with a woman," I pressed. "Were you in love with Grace?"

He threw up his hands. "Oh, Louella—you'll never change! Don't you know that I am incurably romantic, that I love all the beautiful women who cross my path? Grace is a wonderful, wonderful girl and the man who gets her will be very lucky indeed."

It was pretty obvious, however, that King Gable won't be this lucky man.

"Then you left Africa and went to Paris and all the papers started hinting that you were going to marry the beautiful French model, Suzanne Dadolle," I prompted, beginning to feel, I'll admit, a bit like a district attorney.

At the mention of Suzanne's name, Clark spoke briskly. "There was never any engagement," he said. "Miss Dadolle and I never spoke of marriage. We dined together, went to the nightclubs and theatres, had fun. She is very beautiful. I enjoyed being with her—and I got a kick out of the way she made me speak French. Improved my French greatly!"

This charming rogue! How can the lovely ladies resist him? The answer is, most of them don't.

You may have noticed that Clark had far less to say about Suzanne than about Grace—which could be because he resents the interviews given out by Mlle. Dadolle to the French press saying that she and Clark were to be married. The gal even talked about how much she was going to love living on his ranch in Encino with "all the cows and chickens."

It isn't any secret around Paris that if Clark had ever asked, "Will you marry me?" Suzanne would have said yes so fast and loudly it would have been heard all the way from Gay Paree to Hollywood.

No, everything considered, Mr. Gable is not of a mind to discuss Mlle. Dadolle at any great length. She put him in the uncomfortable position any man hates of having to deny a lady's word.

Although I am well aware that Clark is making frequent trips to Arizona ('tis said (a) to look over ranch property, (b) to settle a lawsuit), I'm sure that there is a far stronger attraction there. Not a ranch. A widow.

I mean the wealthy heiress to the Jones sausage fortune, Mrs. Betty Chisholm, a charming woman in her late thirties and one of Arizona's most delightful hostesses.

Her husband was killed in an automobile accident three years ago and since that time Mrs. Chisholm has divided her time between her large ranch where she loves the outdoor life and her beautiful town home near Tucson.

Not exactly the type of exotic beauty who has always intrigued Clark in the past, she is a woman of great charm and tact and understanding.

Methinks Clark believes few people are aware of his interest in the Arizona lady. As of the moment, I decided to switch our talk from the femmes to Clark's plans for now and the future.

I'd really given him a bit of a going over about his romances and I didn't want to frighten him off—for the moment.

"Why did you decide to end your long contract with MGM so suddenly?" I asked. It was a sudden change of subject but a topic I was really curious about.

My guest stretched his long legs, shrugged his shoulders.

He said, "It wasn't the sudden decision it might appear. I gave it much thought. And what I thought is—twenty-three years is a long time to spend in one place.

"I think you know, Louella, that I haven't liked some of the stories I was getting.

"And, to be even more frank, there is a more personal reason. I'm fifty-four years old. I've worked hard, very hard, for almost a quarter of a century. I'm in a financial position where it's time for me to stop and think things over and perhaps let many of my life's experiences sink in.

"I suppose you might say the time has come to slow down, take inventory, and see where I'm going.

"I don't mean for a minute that I'm planning to give up acting. I'm an actor and I'm going to make other pictures. But I'm going to make the ones I want where I want to make them, and when.

"Let's put it this way about me," he went on, "I'm a little tired. As of the moment, I don't want to do anything except what I want to do. That means travel here or there, or remain put. It means playing golf, seeing old friends. And it also means dashing off somewhere if I want to—without explanations. It means thinking not too seriously about anything—and thinking seriously about everything. Maybe that sounds mixed up. But it's the way I feel."

To me, who has known him so well, it's perfectly understandable.

The King has dwelt on the heights for so long under the constant high pressure of perhaps the greatest career ever enjoyed by a male star that it is a vital and a necessary thing for him to pause temporarily, to slow down for the moment from the dizzy pace of the great fame that has been his for so many spinning years.

Clark's present frame of mind recalls the beginning of a poem by Robert Service which I once read:

"An angel was tired of Heaven
As he lounged in the Golden Street,
His halo was tilted sideways
And his harp lay mute at his feet."

The King has never pretended to wear a halo. But as of right now his crown is tilted sideways and his career is quiet at his feet.

It is a long road from the Olympian heights he has dwelt on for twenty-five years back to The Last Mile on the Los Angeles stage where I first saw the tall, thin fellow with the too-big ears.

It was the play that first brought him to the attention of the movie scouts and set him on the road to stardom—but it wasn't as easy as it reads here.

Gable created one riot in his first picture, The Painted Desert. He wasn't the pretty-boy type of hero popular in those days. And he took an awful beating about his ears.

But the young Gable was not easily discouraged. When he left his home town in Cadiz, Ohio, and joined a stock company he had made up his mind that nothing was going to stand in the way of his being an actor. He always had this goal even when he was forced to take jobs on the waterfronts or in the oil fields to help finance himself.

But everybody knows the life story of Clark Gable. It's as well known, perhaps even better known, than the life of the President of the United States.

And his love life down through the years has been equally exposed to the public gaze, even the great tragedy of losing the woman he loved with all his heart, Carole Lombard.

Clark had mentioned during our conversation that he is not selling his ranch in Encino, saying, "My roots are there and the happiest days of my life were spent in the house where Carole and I lived for three wonderfully happy years."

Clark never feels any hesitancy in mentioning Carole to me for in the old days we had been a happy foursome—Carole and Clark and Dr. Harry Martin and I. Our ranch was close to the Gables' and the memory of those happy days we had shared came back to both of us as we talked.

As I have said many times, Carole was the one real love of Clark's life. She spent all her time planning little surprises for him. She was a girl who would rather give than receive.

She was high-hearted and gay and very beautiful and luxury-loving. Yet when she gave her heart to Clark she went all the way, even to changing her way of life to share the things that interested him, outdoor life, hunting trips, skeet shooting, ranching, roughing it.

Clark was her man. If they had little arguments they made them up quickly and the fun of kissing and making up and forgiving and forgetting was what helped make their marriage a good one.

No matter what Clark did, it was all right with Carole. She, too, had had other loves in her life—she had been married, not too long nor too happily to William Powell, and there had been her much publicized romance with the tragic Russ Colombo.

But Clark was Carole's world.

I mention in detail their happy life together because I firmly believe that it was the memory of the great love he bore Carole that made impossible Clark's chances of happiness with Lady Sylvia Ashley Fairbanks (to give most of her names), his last attempt at matrimony.

Where Carole had given, Sylvia, very spoiled by Douglas Fairbanks, Sr., before his death, asked or demanded. And they made the fatal mistake of living in the same house where Clark had known such happiness with Carole.

Sylvia, pampered and petted by Fairbanks and other husbands and loves in her life, expected the same attention from Clark. Her attitude was a great contrast to Carole's constant thought of him and everything he wanted.

The last (and he says final) Mrs. Gable started redecorating the ranch house and changing it to her taste and her taste was very expensive. When the big bills started coming in, plus the fact that Gable hated Sylvia's ultra-feminine changes, the storms which eventually blew up their marriage began.

That the English beauty was desperately in love with Clark cannot be denied. But she didn't know how to handle him from the very moment of their elopement to Alisal Ranch in Santa Barbara (which really electrified Hollywood) to the moment he ordered her belongings moved from his ranch.

Sylvia grieved deeply when she lost Gable. All the women who have lost him have grieved—and have never forgotten him. She literally went into retirement for weeks, sobbing her heart out and refusing to see any of her friends.

The same thing happened when Clark and his first wife, drama coach Josephine Dillon (a woman years older than he) parted; and again when his marriage with wealthy Texas heiress Rita Hangham came to an end. Rita, too, was older than Clark, but she was an attractive woman with social graces and she taught Gable much about gracious living.

Rita, like Carole later, worshipped Clark and her home was run to please him although she had a grown son and daughter. I knew Rita and Clark well in those days—and though it may surprise you—I think Clark really tried to make a go of this marriage.

Perhaps the real trouble was that he was too young a man to be married to a woman much older and too young to be the step-parent of an adult son and daughter.

When they both realized their marriage could not go on, Rita was disconsolate and Clark was blue.

I was the first person he told that he and Rita would separate as soon as a financial settlement could be made.

Despite her devotion, Rita was a tough bargainer and some months went by after he left his home before the divorce was arranged.

After Rita's divorce, Clark married Carole, and I repeat, it is the memory of this one complete and whole love in his life that has colored Clark's reaction to all women ever since. Carole set an almost impossible standard.

Not that there haven't been "romances." There have been interludes, I believe, when Clark has imagined that he had found true love again, but the interludes did not last long.

His most serious love affair after Carole's death was with glittering, sophisticated woman of the world, Dolly O'Brien, the fabulous blonde and wealthy darling of continental café society who completely charmed Clark with her wit, her life, her clothes and jewels.

There was a time when he might have married Dolly. That's how seriously he fell. She was the first to realize it would never work out for them.

"His world is not my world," Dolly once said. "Clark could not be happy for long in my world any more than I could be happy in his."

Even before Dolly there was a girl in his life who became a celebrity of sorts as "the girl Gable always comes back to"—lovely, appealing, sympathetic Virginia Grey. The young actress loved The King very much. To this day she speaks from the heart when she talks about Clark. "He is the finest and most wonderful man I have ever known," Virginia will tell you without hesitation.

STILL ANOTHER interesting "thrill" in Gable's life was gay, vivid, blue-eyed Kay Williams with whom Clark shared many laughs and had lots of fun. Kay amused him as perhaps no other belle has ever done. She used to put on the most outré outfits to spend a day roughing it with him—bathing suits or cocktail dresses or anything silly—to make Clark laugh.

Perhaps they had too many laughs for the serious job of building a foundation for a steady life together. They parted with a laugh and perhaps a bit of the song, "Thanks For The Memories" about the whole adventure.

Heaven knows Kay had little to laugh about in her subsequent marriage to and parting from millionaire Adolph Spreckels. After a stormy marriage of several years and with two lovely children to bless their union, the headlines were recently black with Kay's charges that Adolph had beaten her unmercifully.

Once during a violent spat in their married life, Adolph said, "She never got Clark Gable out of her system," but Kay heatedly denied that a chance meeting with The King at a social affair had meant anything to her other than saying hello to an old friend.

With the exception of Josephine Dillon, who was almost grey, and Rita Langham, who was a brunette, almost all the women in Clark's life have been fascinating blondes.

"Clark," I prodded us back to the present (we were now sipping ice cold drinks—it was so very hot for a day in February), "seems to me you're always falling for blondes. I think it can safely be said that you're a gentleman who prefers blondes."

He laughed. "Thanks for the gentleman. But I could just as easily fall for a brunette or a redhead. I think it's just accidental that many of the women I have most admired have been on the blonde side. I can assure you, however, my mind is open about the color of a lovely lady's hair. Seems I have a talent for admiring charming women."

"And whether you get married again or not," I predicted, "if I know you, you will continue to exercise that talent in the future."

"I hope so," he laughed. "I hope the time never comes when I fail to admire a beautiful woman."

P.S. My butler of twenty-two years, Collins, who is a friend of The King from way back, met me in the hall after Clark's departure.

"I think he looks a little heavier, don't you?" I asked.

"No, absolutely not!" protested one of Clark's greatest fans. "He looks thinner and better all the time. That's one gentleman men admire just as much as the ladies do," he philosophized.

Thought you'd like to know, Clark. END

"Look," said the actor. "You mind your business and I'll mind mine."

It is by such incidents that Burt Lancaster has made a reputation as a rude, opinionated, stubborn actor. Actually, he has always been honest if not tactful.

Hal Wallis, who gave Burt his first movie contract, likes to tell the story of his first meeting with Lancaster.

"We were in New York," Wallis recalls, "and as we were walking down Broadway together, he stopped me and pointed to a theatre marquee. 'Have you seen that picture?' he asked. I nodded and confessed that I had not only seen it, I had produced it.

"It didn't stop Burt.

"'That picture,' he said, 'really stinks.'"

Today when Lancaster recalls such performances he grins sheepishly.

"I'm not like that any more," he says. And he isn't. "I've learned that a man can be honest without being hurtfully blunt. It's not important to be well-liked. But it is important for a man to be at peace with himself. A man with inner security does not go around hurting people."

To show how much Lancaster has improved, note his relationship with fan magazines. Burt used to have no patience with fan magazine writers.

In fact, he gave orders that he wouldn't be bothered by a coterie of frustrated reporters who insisted upon prying into the most personal recesses of his private life and the lives of his family.

That was the Lancaster of old. Just before he left for Mexico to make Vera Cruz with Gary Cooper, Burt called his publicity man.

"Look," he said, "a bunch of magazine writers have been after me for months. I've been too busy to see them. Why don't we have them all in for food and drinks—one mass interview?"

The publicity man was delighted.

"That's great!" he exclaimed. "Only I want you to know they're going to ask some real dillies."

"Let 'em ask away," Lancaster said. "I'm waiting."

Burt, surprisingly at ease, met them in his new office on the Key West Studio. Here are some of the questions they popped and the answers Lancaster popped back.

Q: And how is the new little Lancaster feeling?

A: Well, that's a tough one. You see, the child isn't due until June.

Q: I suppose you like having children, don't you?

A: My wife does.

Q: Is it true that you do a lot of work around the kitchen?

A: Not any more than I can help. But I do like to cook.

Q: Do you have any passion?

A: I beg your pardon?

Q: I mean do you have any strange passions? Do you ever buy a dozen shirts just for the thrill of buying them?

A: No.

Q: Where are your wife and children?

A: Right now they're in Mexico.

Q: Are your four children going to school down there?

A: They're enrolled in the American School in Mexico City.

Q: Why do you keep working so hard? Haven't you made twenty pictures in six years?

A: I don't consider it hard work. A man must stay busy. You just can't be idle. At least I can't.

Q: Is it true that you drive your children to school each day?

A: Not every day. When I can, I do.

Q: What do you think of your last two pictures, His Majesty O'Keefe and Bronco Apache?

A: I think you'll like them.

Q: Do you think you're handsome? Is that why you became an actor?

A: I became an actor because it's something I always wanted to be. I've been in carnivals, circuses, on the stage. I've been in show business a long time.

Q: Do you get along with your wife? Do you quarrel frequently?

A: Norma and I get along pretty well.

Q: But aren't you difficult to live with?

A: I don't think so.

Q: But you have the reputation of being difficult.

A: I've learned and I've changed. At least I believe I have.

Q: Are you very wealthy?

A: I'm not starving.

Q: How much money did you save last year?

A: I honestly don't know. You'd have to ask the accountant. How about knocking off and having a little food?

After the interview, the writers said that never before had Burt Lancaster been so cooperative.

"Imagine!" squealed one. "An actor buying food for the press. It's hard to believe, isn't it?" Whereupon one cynic suggested the possibility that Lancaster's reformation was diplomatic expediency brought on by the fact that he now has his own producing company which has a twelve-million-dollar release deal with United Artists.

Lancaster's new behavior, however, is no attempt to protect his production investment. It's simply that for the first time in his adult life, Burt is genuinely happy.

"I always wanted to be an actor," he explains, "and to act in good pictures, to get parts with guts and dimension.

"I worked in Come Back, Little Sheba and From Here To Eternity and Bronco Apache. All good pictures. So I'm sort of fulfilled.

"Of course when I first came out to Hollywood, I was scared. Scared stiff. And I did a lot of things and said a lot of things that rubbed people the wrong way.

"I guess I was compensating for my insecurity."

Lancaster doesn't like to talk about it, but he was insecure about more things than his career. His marriage, his background and his children. There is no understanding Lancaster or the many facets of his nature unless you have some inkling of his background, of his youth, of his wife, and of his family. He is a moody, complex, enigmatic young man who only recently decided to abandon his rebellion.

Burt Lancaster was brought up in New York City, on the periphery of Harlem. In order to keep him out of the streets, his mother used to have him play on the fire escape of the tenement in which the family lived.

One time Burt fell two stories and broke his nose. He remembers "the eight times I was run over when I started playing in the streets and the library on 110th Street where I did most of my reading as a kid and the movies I used to go to on Saturday mornings. I used to stay all day until one of my older brothers came and got me and after that, Mother used to beat the hell out of me. Then she'd compensate by taking me in her arms."

Lancaster's childhood was the youth of poverty. And one of the results of poverty is that it turns young men bitter and ambitious at the same time. Somehow Burt managed to retain his individualism, a stubborn individualism which eventually brought him to swordspoints with almost everyone he met.

A friend who was at New York University with him says he made himself unpopular with his professors. "He quit college, you know, and took a job with a circus for three dollars a week and board. All of us expected him to break his neck but look at him today! Burt has a way of fooling people.

"He's not as foolhardy and reckless as he leads people to believe."

One of the shrewdest cookies Lancaster fooled was the late Mark Hellinger, a producer at Universal-International. When Hellinger was making Brute Force with Burt, someone asked, "How's Lancaster doing?"

Hellinger shook his head. "This kid," he muttered, "has made one picture out here, and already he knows more than anyone on the lot.

"Two more pictures and he'll land flat on his can. He's a frustrated Freudian, a body in search of a brain, Mr. Know-It-All from the Big Town."

What Hellinger could not understand about Lancaster was his strange individualism. Burt has his own ideas about everything and he believes in trial-and-error.

When he was under contract to Hal Wallis, he became convinced that Wallis was a purely commercial producer; so he borrowed enough money to buy up his own acting contract. He went to work at U-I in All My Sons. It laid an egg. Then he starred in a melodramatic saga of smuggled penicillin entitled Kiss The Blood Off My Hands. The picture almost kissed him off for good. But Burt is resilient. He bounced right back again.

He was the same way in the Army, a renegade from convention. And the Army, as most people know, is not quite the place to exercise individualism. But by exercising it, Burt got married; and this is probably the best move he has made in his entire thirty-nine years.

Some biographies, inaccurate and imaginative, have described Lancaster's wife, Norma Anderson, as "the former actress, dancer and singer."

The truth is that Norma Anderson was a stenographer in disguise when Burt first met her. She was disguised as a dancer with a USO troupe in Italy. Norma had worked at a typewriter in the USO booking office in New York. She was talked into substituting for a sick member of a USO dancing troupe and she went on the overseas trip for a lark.

In Montecatini where Pfc. Lancaster was stationed in 1944, she caught sight of her future husband shuffling along a dirt road and asked a surprised colonel to get her a date with him. Burt doesn't like to talk about how he and Norma fell in love. But the whole affair is melodramatic. Tall, handsome enlisted man meets tall, beautiful blonde. The next morning the enlisted man runs to the USO bivouac.

"I'm sorry," he's told. "The whole troupe flew north to Caserta." The enlisted man goes AWOL. He must find his love. The M.P.'s must find him. Lancaster makes it to Caserta and finds Norma. They have thirty precious minutes together when the M.P.'s arrive and take Lancaster back to Montecatini.

This time Norma goes AWOL. She goes back to Montecatini, and the lovers escape to Pisa where they get married. But the M.P.'s are not far behind.

The honeymoon lasts three days. Then the lovers are caught and Norma is returned to her USO troupe. Her husband is bounced into the jug. Norma is returned to New York City where she works as a stenographer. Burt is returned to his Special Services unit.

BURT LANDED in New York on Labor Day. Not long after, a baby was on the way. In his own mind he didn't know what to do or where to turn.

He thought of becoming a manager for a concert bureau, but a producer ran into him in an office building elevator and offered him a job in a Broadway play, The Sound Of Hunting. In desperation he took it.

The play was a flop, but Hal Wallis thought Burt showed a good deal of potential and gave him a Hollywood contract. Mark Hellinger borrowed Lancaster for The Killers when Warner Brothers asked too much on a loanout for Wayne Morris.

It was then that rumors of Burt's rude behavior began to spread through the movie colony. What the movie colony did not realize was that Burt was scared, heartsick, and perennially worried.

His oldest son Jimmy, now eight, had just been born with a foot deviation. Every two weeks, Jimmy would have his plaster of Paris casts broken, and new ones put on. This went on for eight months. At night Jimmy would scream with fear thinking that the doctors were trying to get to his feet beneath the covers. Norma and Burt would rush into the little boy's room. Seeing his frantic little face break out in a sweat, each time their hearts would break and they would die a little. Slowly Jimmy withdrew from the unpleasant world of reality into a more comfortable and private world of make-believe.

Jimmy began to feel that he was different because he couldn't play as other children did. He used to hide and when company came, he retreated to a corner of the room and said nothing. The child's unhappiness ate deeply into Burt. He heard his son called names. He could see the boy's initiative being stifled.

Finally he took the child to a psychologist. On an intelligence test, he made a score of 142—which puts him in the potential genius class. The boy was enrolled in a private school where the teachers specialize in caring for emotionally disturbed children. It took time, but today Jimmy Lancaster is a well-adjusted child.

Bright, good-looking, sociable and musically adept, he is one of the most promising young students in the American School at Mexico City.

The Lancasters' second child, Billy, now five, was stricken by polio when he was three.

When Burt took his family to Italy where he was making The Crimson Pirate, a doctor told the Lancasters that they were oversolicitous about Billy.

"When he falls, let him pick himself up," the doctor said. "In that way the leg muscles will get stronger. He will be able to throw away the crutches."

It takes strength and determination to watch your child try to pull himself to the curb after he has fallen in the street—and not to help him. But Burt and Norma knew they had to let Billy fend for himself.

They cried as they watched him. But Billy finally made it. No crutches today, no brace. And in a year or so, the doctors say he will no longer show any trace of paralysis.

Susan Elizabeth—the family calls her Susiebet—has had no trouble. But Joanna, now two and a half, was born with a foot deviation. This time the doctors advised that the feet be let alone, and they have since straightened themselves.

The fifth child is expected late in June, and the Lancasters are praying for a normal delivery and a healthy baby.

In the last five years, Lancaster's medical bills have averaged $10,000 a year. But strangely enough, Burt has gradually become happier and made a better adjustment.

He has reached the point of believing in the importance of all human and personal relationships. He has seen what a smile and a story at bedtime means to a child. He knows how much a word of encouragement from a doctor means to him and what a little reassurance does for his wife.

Because of this recognition he has adopted a new set of values. Actors who work with him swear by Burt. He gives youngsters a chance. He lets veterans experiment with their own bits of business—acting nomenclature for technique. He is kind, patient, and understanding.

He no longer fights with directors and writers. He is kind to reporters.

In the Lancaster household there is pervasive love born of suffering and mutual sacrifice and a wordless, nameless togetherness that only Norma and Burt can truly understand.

Burt Lancaster, delivered from the tortures of his soul, is a man of love. In strange, unfathomable ways, love turns darkness into light, fury into peace and anger into kindness.

As an artist and as a man Burt Lancaster has grown and is growing with his children. END

"We were having dinner at Frascati's," he recalls, "and I just leaned across the table and said, 'I love you very much, and I wish you'd marry me.' She smiled and said yes. And that's how it happened. Nothing planned or premeditated.

"The proposal just popped out of me. I didn't have a ring or anything. Later I went out and ordered one, nothing very tremendous—a square-cut diamond, three carats. It was being made up and took quite a while. And because Pat wasn't wearing a ring, I could get away with my denials.

"Anyway, after I proposed and Pat accepted me, I flew to New York to get her father's consent. I don't mind telling you I was pretty nervous. I thought Mr. Kennedy might object to having an actor in his family. After all, his son is a United States Senator and all of that. But he was wonderful. I asked his permission and he gave us his blessing."

The Kennedy family is Catholic. Pete belongs to the Church of England, but he says any children they may have will be brought up in the Catholic faith.

"We are trying to keep our wedding as small as possible. We don't want one of those tremendous affairs. Just the family. The only one in my family is my mother and she'll come on to New York. But Pat has a rather large family, so I guess that will add up."

Asked if he planned to abandon acting and go into business, Lawford said, "Not at all. After the honeymoon, Pat and I are going back to the coast. That's where we intend to make our home. I have no intention of giving up my career. I'm an actor by profession and that's how I intend to earn my living."

Pete has always said that he would never marry an actress.

"Two acting temperaments in one family don't work," he has often explained. "And I don't have to marry an actress to prove that!"

SOME WOMEN may be downhearted at Pete's removal from the eligible bachelor roster, but there is at least one who is extremely happy about it. That is Pete's mother, Lady May Lawford.

"When Peter confided to me," she says, "that he and Pat were going to get married, I can't tell you how relieved I was. I've been afraid for so long that the boy might get into his car and whiz off to Las Vegas and marry just anyone. I guess every mother has those fears. But after all, Peter is such a nice boy, and there have been so many girls who've laid traps for him.

"You'd be surprised if I mentioned their names. They would telephone him at eight in the morning and come around at nine. They'd send him letters and telegrams and gifts. They really tried to spoil him. And if I must say so, it's a tribute to his strength of character that he's kept his head about him.

"He's a conservative young man, and I should have known that when the time came for him to marry, he would pick a fine and beautiful girl like Patricia Kennedy.

"And she's a bright young woman, too. Oh, yes. She really gave Peter a merry chase. He had to work to get that young lady all right. She made him step. And I believe that's what a man likes. The thrill of the hunt is in the chase, not in the final capture."

Emphatically, she explained that Peter

3 quick tricks to eye beauty

❷ Next, use short, light upward strokes of the Maybelline Eyebrow Pencil, to form beautiful, expressive brows. Taper lightly at outer end. Soften effect with fingertip.

❸ Apply smooth Maybelline Mascara from base to tips of lashes, brushing upward. (Hold a few seconds to set "up-swoop.") For an extra touch of mysterious eye beauty, blend a bit of Maybelline Eye Shadow on upper lid.

The world's smartest women depend on Maybelline soft eye make-up for heart-stirring beauty. Today, let Maybelline magic bring out the unsuspected loveliness of your eyes!

is not an adopted son. Then she continued, "The thing to remember about Peter is that he had a very happy youth.

"My husband, the late Sir Sydney, came from a fairly wealthy family. His brother owned the estate next to Balmoral in Scotland. We always had at least three in service when Peter was a little boy, and he has been accustomed to the best.

"He's been very discriminating in his choice of friends. He's chosen people of his own calibre. Girls he's liked have always turned out to be well-bred girls from good families. There's certainly nothing wrong in that.

"Before we came to America we had lost practically all of our money. When England went off the gold standard, my husband thought it would be prudent to take his belongings out of the country. He deposited them in Greece and Czechoslovakia. When the war came the Germans marched into those countries and all our holdings were confiscated. We came to America with very little money, and one of Peter's first jobs in Florida was working as a parking lot attendant. But he was always discriminating in his choice of friends. He said he would never marry an actress and that he would never marry before he was thirty."

It is generally supposed that Peter Lawford made his motion picture debut in Hollywood. Actually he began to work in British motion picture studios when he was seven.

His first role was at Elstree in Ole Bill. At one time he was advertised as England's Jackie Coogan. When Parliament passed a law limiting screen work for children under fourteen, Lawford's parents took him to Paris where he worked in a few films and then temporarily lost the use of his right arm.

While playing with a group of French playmates, he crashed through a glass window, almost severing his right arm. The doctors recommended immediate amputation but neither the boy nor his family would consent and gradually the arm healed.

Pete's first Hollywood job was ushering at a Westwood movie house. In his time off he hounded the casting offices and got bit parts in Mrs. Miniver and White Cliffs Of Dover.

A British subject and the sole support of his two parents, he was exempted from United States military service.

In 1943, he signed a contract with MGM and promptly began to win recognition as a competent actor and as a perennial escort.

How fair or how well-founded this reputation was is a matter of argument. One of Pete's friends says, "When Lawford was under contract to MGM it was part of his job to escort all the actresses on the contract list. If Lana Turner wanted someone to go dancing with her, it was Pete. If the publicity department needed a new romance for Ava Gardner, it was Pete. If Liz Taylor needed a boy friend, it was Pete.

"He took out every actress on the lot, and I heard it said that he was using them for publicity. No one ever thought it might be the other way around.

"He came out here with no dough, and everything he has he's earned. He saw what happened to his father who once had money and lost it, and he doesn't want that to happen to him.

"Anyway, now that he's going to marry Pat Kennedy, all that talk is a thing of the past.

"He deserves a little married happiness."

Even his former dates wish Peter Lawford that. END

doctor's wife

(Continued from page 48) "In between I learned that I was going to have a baby. Also I had to organize my household and furnish a new home. So I haven't had much time for interviews."

As soon as Ann finished The Student Prince, the blackout was lifted and she invited Modern Screen into her home.

"I never realized how many decisions a wife has to make. Not necessarily big decisions but little ones like which newspapers to order and which milkman to use and how many telephone extensions we need and where can we possibly store all the wedding presents."

Ann confessed, "I've had a minor crisis or two. I guess you heard about the firewood. That one really taught me an important lesson."

The firewood incident started because Jim and Ann love to sit in front of an open fireplace. They take an awful ribbing from their friends because they consider this more fun than going to Ciro's or Mocambo or even attending a première.

In spite of a summertime marriage, the McNultys used more than a cord of firewood in their first two months together.

"As soon as I noticed our supply was getting low," Ann explains, "I felt it was part of my job to replenish it just as I buy the other household goods.

"Only with firewood I didn't know where. I should have asked Jim's advice but I preferred to do it the hard way.

"I looked in the classified section of the phone book and got the names of several fuel companies. Then I called. When the salesman asked what kind of wood I wanted and what lengths I hung up to do some more research.

"Sort of casually I asked a few friends what kind of logs burned best, and Joe Lilley simplified the problem by offering to give me all the logs I wanted. He'd just finished thinning out some of his trees.

"This seemed like a wonderfully generous gift because I'd found out that wood costs from $50 to $60 a cord out here. So naturally I accepted Joe's offer for free."

"But you'll have to send someone out to pick it up," Joe had added.

This started Ann on a new tangent.

She called truckers and asked how much they charge to haul a cord of wood. Some of them misunderstood her and gave outlandish quotations for hauling commercial logs.

Finally Jim discovered her problem. Gallantly, he took charge of the matter.

"And he did it so easily," Ann recalls. "He got Uncle Pat to help him and they rented a half-ton trailer and after Mass one Sunday they drove out to Joe's and loaded the trailer and drove back. Really, they made my feeling of failure complete.

"But it did teach me a lesson: it's a good idea to let your husband share some of the household problems. I learned that there is no sharp line of demarcation between the wife's department and the husband's.

"That's why people get married—to help each other."

Ann and Jim are living by this principle: share all the decisions.

"Although we bought our house before we were married," Ann says, "it really didn't seem to belong to us until we started living in it. But we both agreed that this was the house we wanted."

The McNultys chose an eleven-room Connecticut-style farmhouse.

They liked it because it was located on a quiet, dead-end street. It's surrounded by full-grown walnut and sycamore trees, and it has plenty of room for an expanding family. The second floor is still unfurnished. Ann commented that the colonial staircase in the front hall leads to "nothing except the future."

Because Ann and Jim intend to live a lifetime in their farmhouse, they've decided to furnish it slowly and carefully. After almost a year the house is still far from complete, a fact that bothers no one.

"When we moved in, we had nothing but our bedroom furniture and four marvelous kitchen appliances."

She and Jim literally started housekeeping from bedroom to kitchen and back again. All the other rooms were empty.

For her bright, cheery kitchen, Ann chose the newest and best equipment: an electric stove, an eight-cubic-foot Bendix refrigerator, an eighteen-cubic-foot Bendix freezer. And for her laundry, a Bendix Duomatic, a marvelous piece of machinery that washes and dries the clothes in one continuous operation.

"When you're working an eleven-hour day at the studio," Ann says, "you need all the mechanical aid you can buy."

Ann and Jim could handle the ordering of the kitchen equipment easily. For the rest of the house they decided to use the services of Mitchell Numier, a decorator.

Numier is known in California for his custom-made provincial furniture. Ann has liked his designs for years but she made sure that Jim saw and approved several Numier-furnished homes.

Once Jim gave the go-ahead, Ann commissioned the designer to make dining-room furniture, the marble-topped living-room tables and all the well-cushioned and carefully quilted chairs and couches.

The day the silvery bleached walnut dining table was delivered with its six grey velvet chairs, Ann declared a holiday.

She unpacked the fine Irish linen table cloth her aunts Molly and Mag had sent from Dublin. She fixed Jim's favorite menu of roast beef, salad with cheese dressing, and snowballs for dessert (snowballs in the McNulty household consist of vanilla ice cream, frozen strawberries and shredded coconut) and then invited Aunt Cissy and Uncle Pat to share in the festivities.

Now the arrival of each new lamp or ashtray is an excuse for a celebration.

Dennis Day and his wife came over the night the pink wing chairs were placed in the den. Jeanne Crain and Paul Brinkman were dinner guests when the Hawaiian printed draperies and twin couches made their livingroom debut.

Ann and Jim had nothing to do with what is probably the most arresting feature of the McNulty house. Some years ago in Chicago Ann was introduced to a Mr. and Mrs. Dalton just before she sang on a Sacred Heart charity program.

Over the years they became extremely fond of her and whenever Ann was in Chicago she made it a point to see them.

At the time of her wedding she naturally expected some word from her old friends, but she didn't hear from them. Last Thanksgiving, however, she received by air express a beautiful statue of the Blessed Mother intended for an outdoor grotto. It was the Daltons' wedding gift.

Uncle Pat met the plane on which it arrived. He supervised its mounting on a concrete base, and it was he who prepared the grotto at the far end of the McNulty garden. He planted the primroses and the jasmine and laid the flagstone walk.

This lovely shrine, half-hidden by roses and bougainvilla, is where Ann Blyth retreats for a few peaceful hours of thought and meditation. It is here, far from the tension of life in the studio, that she prays.

It is here that she and her handsome husband give thanks for all their many blessings now and forever after. END

IN RITA'S FOOTSTEPS?

Will Rita's ex make Gene Tierney his next?

■ About Aly Khan, Gene Tierney says, "There is no formal engagement between us." But she has lingered with Aly in Europe (and in international headlines) for a year.

Aly is as cagey as Gene about their plans. He has shown singular devotion to her; he has showered her with gifts. And, more to the point for a busy man, he writes her long letters.

Gene met Aly while she was making a picture in South America. He asked her for a date, but they didn't go out together until they met again in Paris. Since then, Gene hasn't been seen with anyone else.

Now, Gene is in Hollywood and Aly is on a trip to South America, Pakistan and Egypt.

"When Aly finishes his trip he will come to Hollywood and remain here most of the time while I am making The Egyptian," Gene said.

She always has liked European men. She went to school in Switzerland and her former husband, designer Oleg Cassini, is at least partly Italian.

"But with Aly," she says, "there are too many problems, too many serious phases of life to be figured out for both of us, to rush into a marriage without long thought and speculation."

While she thinks it out, Aly has hung her with diamonds. On her right hand she wears a magnificent emerald-cut stone. She has a bracelet and earrings of perfectly matched white diamonds, all breathtakingly beautiful.

Aly's father, the Aga Khan, received his weight in diamonds at his jubilee last year; this year it was platinum. Aly gets his income from horses. He breeds them in Ireland, France and South America. He will in all probability inherit his father's title. Will Gene take over Rita Hayworth's?

they're all crazy!

(Continued from page 35) the least intimidated, the fastest with the kind of sass that infuriated her. "Being such a bright boy," she says sourly, "he was also a smart aleck."

It had to be Ken who "borrowed" Jane's cars for wild, midnight rides. As soon as everyone in the house was safely asleep, Ken and little brother Wally would push the car as far as the gate, where its engine couldn't be heard, and light out for Riverside to see Kenny's girl.

"I remember the last time real well," Wally says. "It was while Jane was making The Outlaw, and she had just bought herself this new Pontiac convertible. Kenny was going into the Navy the next day, so naturally he had to see Lois that night. The only way to do it was to take Jane's car. Boy, it was raining buckets that night, but we put the top of the convertible down anyhow and set out to see how fast a Pontiac would travel—pretty darned fast."

The next morning Jane took one look at her bedraggled, mud-spattered gem and blew her ebony top. "Who had my car out last night?" she demanded in clarion outrage.

"Kenny," answered Wally, concentrating on his breakfast.

Daughter started looking for a club. "Where is he?"

"Probably on his way to San Diego by now. He spent the night with Lois' folks in Riverside."

"Then who drove my car home?"

"I did," Wally replied with his usual aplomb. He was all of twelve years old.

If you suggested to the four beautiful girls who married the Russell boys that Ken was the family character, you'd meet with a chorus of protests; they insist that he's just a normal, healthy boy. It's Jamie who's a character.

Jamie adores his wife Pam. So much so that he insists upon her staying in bed mornings while he fixes the baby's bottle and gets breakfast.

"Of course," Pam says thoughtfully, "I'd have to be as deaf as a post to get any more sleep. Jamie is slamming things around in the kitchen and roaring at the top of his lungs about no-good women who lie abed, letting their husbands and children go hungry."

"Dramatic to his fingertips," is Jane's evaluation of Jamie, who had a small role in her currently successful Gentlemen Prefer Blondes. "He never stops acting." His favorite portrayal is a death scene and, as he is certain to have his biggest audience then, his favorite time for emoting is during a meal. The larger the gathering, the better are the chances that Jamie will suddenly fall to the floor at their feet. He has been poisoned—or he is strangling. He clutches his throat, gasps, writhes, groans and finally expires, while the family ignores him entirely or Mother Russell acknowledges his performance by saying, "Get up off the floor, Jamie, and eat your food."

It should not be inferred that the rest of the family ignores Jamie because they disapprove. They're just hungry. If he chooses some other moment to entertain them, they all watch with lively interest—because what the Russells enjoy most is each other. Working and playing together is their idea of heaven. Tom, Kenneth and Wally, complete with families, took off on a construction job a couple of years ago, and while it lasted they had a ball because they were together. Then they pooled their resources to buy an alfalfa ranch; they didn't expect to make a fortune growing alfalfa, but a ranch was something they could work together. It turned out to be a bad investment—the alkali in the soil being strong enough to burn up their crop within two years and something burning down Kenny's ranchhouse to the foundations the very first year—but it was worth a try. Now they are home again. Tom and Kenny have joined Jamie at the corner gas station, and Wally is self-employed as a landscape artist. Maybe they haven't made a lot of material progress, but they're happy as clams. After all, they're all together.

Jane, The Old One, remains as much a part of her crazy family as if she didn't have twenty-four other activities for the hours of the day. Sometimes the boys or their wives read the stories written about her moodiness or her temperament, and they raise their eyebrows at each other. She always was sort of horsy about some things, like kid brothers staying out of her room, and they're glad to know that she hasn't changed. But they also know something that the writers don't: that behind the fierce noises Jane makes is an enormous sense of responsibility.

"Once, when Jane was still a small girl," Ma Russell remembers, "her teacher came to see me. She asked me so many questions about what kind of child Jane was and what she did at home, that I really had to stop and think. Finally, I said, 'Well, mostly, she helps me with her brothers.'"

It explained quite a bit to the baffled teacher, who had been unable to persuade little Jane to do her own lessons. Not that she was a problem child—but every time the teacher looked up, it was to see Jane at one of the other work tables, explaining to a more backward classmate, "No, no, honey. Do it this way."

At times that sense of responsibility manifested itself in inspiration, at other times it ended up as ludicrous, but it was always protective, as Kenny can testify.

He was fifteen or so when tragedy smote him. The ever-loving eye of his Lois was caught by another handsome lad, Ken took exception to the competition, and a fierce quarrel ensued. The usually ebullient Kenny was crushed; he moped around the house like a kicked puppy until his condition came to Jane's attention.

She heard his lovelorn story, then commanded, "Sit down. I'm going to dictate a letter, and I want you to mail it to Lois."

"It was a horrible letter," Ken says with a grin. "Imagine me asking Lois who she thought she was, telling her to get down off her pedestal, saying that breaking up with her wasn't hurting me a bit. The day I mailed that, I knew for sure that Lois would never speak to me again!" Jane knew better, and she was right—Lois had no more than read the letter than she was on a bus for Los Angeles, smitten all over again with her high-handed Lothario.

Time passed, and sailor Kenny came home on leave from the Orient. He and Lois agreed that fighting with each other was more fun than doing anything else with a couple of other people, so they decided to be married at once. Arrangements for the wedding were duly made. "But Daughter thought of one detail that everyone else overlooked," chortles Ken. "The night before I got married, she sat me down and told me the facts of life—without mincing any words, either! I can tell you, I was shocked. I don't know how she thought I could have been in the Navy for two years without finding out about things like that, but she had to be sure. She didn't think we'd have a very good foundation for marriage if I still believed in the birds and bees!"

JANE'S FEELING for her little brothers hasn't changed an iota, but her position in Hollywood has somewhat altered their acceptance. Though Jamie has a degree in cinematography and is deeply interested both in acting and directing, he refuses a professional boost from her. "If I can't make it without Daughter's help, I'll keep on filling gas tanks. People never believe you have any real talent if you get a break through your relatives." Similarly, Wally, whose fine singing voice seems destined to land him in musicals, would rather stick to spirituals in the chapel than accept a helping hand. Stubborn guys, the Russells.

The Old One is mildly grieved and largely exasperated by their attitude. "None of them will tell me when they need something. I have to make Ma tell me—and then go home and try to talk my old man out of it!"

They love Jane good, but they haven't always loved her career; it got them too many knots on the head. Imagine what it must have been like to be Jane Russell's brother at the time that she was exploited as the sexpot of the century in The Outlaw. It got to be a pretty bruising experience, especially since all four boys were in service at the time and servicemen are notably indelicate on the subject of sexpots.

"I always tried to keep quiet about her being my sister," said Wally, who was with a Navy jet squadron, "but you can only keep your mouth shut so long." His thin, dark face, closely resembling that of his sister, reflected distaste at a remembered experience.

His outfit was at chow one day when one of their number came back from a leave in Los Angeles. Naturally, the other guys asked him about his adventures and he told them what he had done: he had met the most talked-about girl in America, Jane Russell.

"Is that a fact, now?" asked a quiet crew member by the name of Russell.

It was a fact, said the guy, lying in his teeth. They had gone dancing at Ciro's and, what's more, Jane Russell picked up the tab for the evening's entertainment.

"Say," interpolated Wally, "I like to dance. Maybe you'll introduce us sometime when we're down there?"

Everything would have been gingerpeachy if it had stopped right there but of course it couldn't. At the urging of his fellow crewmen, the imaginative gent began to tell them how he made love to Jane Russell—and Jane's little brother lost his temper. How could you ever explain to a bunch of G.I.'s that any resemblance between Jane and the publicity on her picture was strictly hogwash? You couldn't, so you took your lumps and hoped you raised a few on the other guy. It happened to all four of her brothers time and again, and they never figured a way out of the quandary. Establishing their identity right off was a mistake, they found. To some of the men it smacked of boasting, to most it placed that particular Russell in the freak category.

"I remember being on a new ship once," contributed Jamie, "and word got around that Jane Russell's brother was standing watch at Station Two. I'll bet every man aboard sauntered up to look at me before my watch was over. What an uncomfortable four hours that was!"

If being identified as Jane's brother was bad, hearing crude comments on her physical attributes and bawdy speculation on her virtue was intolerable. The Russell boys were engaged in two wars during those years—for Democracy and for Daughter.

JANE KNOWS what they went through, since her family is anything but secretive, and it is a contributing factor to her sensitivity about publicity. After thirteen years, though, the public has accepted the fact that Jane Russell is a decent girl, albeit a slightly salty, strikingly beautiful and undeniably voluptuous one. And her family is pretty well adjusted to the fact that portraying sultry sirens on the screen is merely what she does for a living. It hasn't changed her a bit.

They present a solid front to the world, the Russells; they are for one another, and no mistake about it. In the bosom of the family, however, they admit to some imperfections. When one is in the wrong, the others unhesitatingly say, 'Now, look, thus-and-so is wrong. Let's sit down and talk it over and straighten things out.' And they talk it out, whether the problem is that one of their wives has left in a momentary snit or something less intimate.

Jane's career does not make her an exception to this family rule. While The Big Rainbow was in production, too many things happened at once. She was upset by the unfortunate publicity about The French Line. Her contract with Howard Hughes expired, and she was faced with a big decision. Torn between her loyalty to the man who had made her a star and her desire for more freedom, she had to make up her mind about signing a new contract. There were the numerous charities on behalf of which she had personal appearances to make. The picture called for strenuous effort on her part at a time when she was physically exhausted. There were tensions of so personal a nature that she discussed them with no one. And, estimated Edith Lynch of the RKO publicity department, about forty calls a day from friends who needed help of one kind or another. Understandably, Jane cracked up, and the studio sent her off to the desert for a badly needed rest.

The day she returned to town, Ma Russell called. "The boys want you to have dinner with them tonight in the Eagle's Nest," she said.

Jane was pleased; she hungers for her family after a few days' absence. But when she got to the Eagle's Nest, which is a new addition to the chapel, she found that this was a different kind of family gathering indeed. Ma Russell had cooked dinner and departed. The four wives were not present; the ten kids and the dogs were also conspicuous by their absence.

"I didn't know whether to laugh or cry," said Jane. "My brothers were all so serious that I expected a gag any minute—but they weren't kidding."

They weren't. They reminded her that she had collapsed while making her last three pictures and delivered themselves of an ultimatum: either her husband or her agent had to do something about her treadmill or the Russell boys were going to step in. They didn't know exactly what they could do, but there were four of them and they ought to think of something. They had to; otherwise her health might be permanently injured.

Built by the Russell boys, their family chapel is as light, airy and modern as themselves.

"What they didn't know was that I was getting the same thing from Robert every day when I got home from the studio. He was giving me what-for up one side and down the other, hammering at me because I was doing too much."

Jane shrugged. "What can I give up? Making pictures? Personal appearances? Charity work? The chapel? My home and children? My friends? There's nothing I can stop doing—but Robert promised to find me a secretary, and that will take part of the load off. Personal problems, given time and the Lord's help, solve themselves. There was nothing the boys could do—I felt fine again—but it meant a lot, talking it out with them, knowing they were behind me like always."

IN HOLLYWOOD there is considerable double-talk about the conflict between Jane's husband, Robert Waterfield, and her family. She can't be happy, they say, torn between the two camps. Jane bit off a short, choice expletive at the suggestion. "There isn't any conflict, because Robert is so much like my father. They both came from small families and they just didn't have our feeling for large ones.

"My father was an executive. When he came home at night, he was tired and had things on his mind. He couldn't relax with the boys boiling all over the house so I kept them away from him in a separate wing. Robert is the same way. It isn't that he dislikes my family; he just doesn't like any large, noisy gathering of people. He always goes to family reunions with me—and a real one runs into hundreds of relatives, all shouters. Then I see him getting nervous and his mouth getting tight, and I know he's going to come over with some polite excuse for getting out. So I laugh and say, 'It's all right, honey. You go on, and I'll meet you at home later.' That many people all at once just drive him crazy.

"He's like my father in another way: he's very practical. When the boys turn up with some new project, Robert isn't interested in whether it will be fun. He wants to know whether it will work. I wouldn't have anything if Robert hadn't taken over my business affairs. A nickel I can understand—that will buy a popsicle—but on a thousand dollars I draw a blank, so I leave it to my husband.

"Robert accepts it that all Russells are a little crazy, and the family understands that he's a different kind of person. He's like my father—they've all said so—and I just stand as a buffer between him and them as I did in the old days."

THE TALL, dark, handsome and impractical Russell boys married girls as unlike as women can be, yet they get along beautifully and not one would have a husband other than her own. They're all so right for each other. Shy, sensitive Tom has his quiet, intelligent Nola. Curly-haired, fast-talking Kenny finally won his proud-eyed Lois ten years ago. For extrovert Jamie there could be no one but gamin, out-going Pamela with freckles on her pert nose. And the lean good looks of Wally are complemented by the fragile blonde loveliness of his Mary Lou, who knows that the baby of the family may well end up the biggest man of them all. Each of the girls has said to another at some time, "I couldn't live with that husband of yours for two minutes," but they all live together in an incredible kind of loving harmony.

The home of Pam and Jamie is likely to be the community gathering place during the day, and bedlam is the keynote. Kids romp, dogs bark, husbands bellow, while the girls count their blessings for marrying Russells. The children are common property; whoever notices a damp bottom first changes a diaper, and noses are mopped with impartial thoroughness. As the boys work different shifts at the filling station, at least one of them is always at home for a meal. Tom's wife is serving Jamie, Kenny's wife is attempting to spoon food into the mouth of Wally's young one, saying, "I wonder if she's coming down with something. She won't take her food."

"Maybe," one of the other girls calls, "it's because I just fed her ten minutes ago. It's Pandora who hasn't eaten yet."

Wally, sitting quietly on a couch, muses aloud. "There's one particular word that Jane used to describe me. I can't think of it right now. You know—it means that if you put me in the middle of a bunch of strangers, I'd be able to handle myself all right."

"What she probably said," Pam flashes at him, "is that you're the only one of the boys who could pass for normal."

Wally grins back at her. "Your old man sure couldn't!"

The secret, of course, lies in an awareness of God that is as much a part of every one of them as their hearts, their eyes, their limbs. Much has been written about the religious aspect of the Russells' life; practically none of it true. The children did build with their own hands a chapel like no other in the world. Designed for modern times, it does away with must and medieval gloom, letting in the sunlight, which is all to the good. Their faith in God is like that, too—sunny and joyous and unafraid. No constraint, no pomp, no sanctimonious poppycock. Ma Russell's acreage teems with people lively as crickets, who live with the Lord every minute and admit that it's fun.

"Look," explains one of the wives, "the Lord made all things, and if He didn't have a sense of humor, He wouldn't have made these comedians we married!"

"It was on account of the Lord that we started hollering at Ma while we were still kids," Wally says. "Every time we'd go out to have some fun, she'd sick the Lord on us. You can't get much of a kick out of stealing a watermelon from the field next door when you know you're going to go right home and pray about it. So we'd holler at her, 'Ma, stop sicking the Lord on us!'"

MOTHER RUSSELL doesn't mind the shouting. "The thing to remember is what's behind it," she frequently says in her

PROFESSIONAL HUSBAND

Dick Egan is a 1954 discovery.

■ In the world of show business, gossip is quick to start. Jane Russell and Richard Egan have been seen together two or three times and they look so strikingly handsome and happy together that the rumor mills have begun to grind. Jane is seldom seen with Bob Waterfield, her real-life husband. He likes to stay home.

Jane is a girl with a heart (as cowboy actors say) bigger than all outdoors. Richard replaced Bob Mitchum as Jane's husband in The Big Rainbow. Mr. Mitchum had bowed out in one of his periodic arguments with big boss Howard Hughes. Jane and everyone else was hunting for a film husband.

She saw Mr. Egan in Split Second and talked him up and into the part. The rushes were so good that those who interview Miss Russell these days go away with a story about Richard.

Handsome, virile Egan is from San Francisco, a graduate of the university there. He emerged from the war a captain. His brother, Father Will Egan, advised him not to try acting until he learned the trade. So Richard enrolled at Stanford and spent three years earning a Master's degree. In 1949 a talent scout from Warner Bros. got him a screen test. Universal gave him a one-year contract.

His first public notice was as Joan Crawford's husband in The Damned Don't Cry. He could make a career of playing plausible husbands to electric big stars, but Richard's future is bigger than that.

He is a judo expert, too. It turns out that Mr. Waterfield is not concerned about his wife's enthusiasm. The judo won't be necessary.

quiet, absent way. "A whispered word will cut if there is meanness behind it. Even while the children are shouting, there's only love in their hearts."

Jane is one of the shouters, practically chief among the crazy Russells. Their faith is her faith, their love her love, and you can almost watch the tension drain out of her when she's with them an hour or two. The girls her brothers married like it best when Jane comes home unexpectedly, when the boys are gone and they can visit with her. She's one of them, no more and no less, feeding kids, curling hair, relaxing in woman-talk. They enjoy seeing her pictures, but every wife of them believes that her husband is every bit as remarkable as his famous sister.

And what's it like to be married to a remarkable character? The girls have a story they love to tell to illustrate it. After one of Jane's infrequent trips to New York, she and a friend were visiting the family and discussing the plays they had seen in the East. Freshest in their minds was A Streetcar Named Desire.

"That character Marlon Brando played was horrible," shuddered Jane's refined friend. "Just horrible!"

The Russell wives were mightily interested, never having seen a horrible man, and they were beside themselves with impatience until the play was made into a movie. They descended upon it en masse and emerged terribly disappointed.

"Why," said Nola, "he wasn't horrible at all. He's just like one of the Russell boys!"

"I thought he was charming," added Mary Lou. "I never felt more at home with an actor on the screen. It was like being in our own livingroom."

"I can just see Kenny knocking the dishes off the table like Brando did," chimed in Lois, "and saying something like, 'Okay, I cleared my side. You clear yours.'"

"Or Jamie," agreed Pam, "yanking everything off, tablecloth and all, and then rolling on the floor because he thought he was so funny!"

That's what it's like, and they think it's just wonderful. END

only her husband knows

It was close, but the honor finally went to Esther Williams. She has recovered by now, but when Esther got the news, she was hurt. Fortunately, she is blessed with an irrepressible sense of humor.

"At least," she said, "they voted me an actress. That's something." Esther explained that in 1953 she not only worked at home as a mother and housewife, but that she was on location with a picture, and that for nine months of that year she was pregnant.

Despite all this she had managed to take part in more than fifty interviews and picture layouts. She said she had done the best she could with the time she had.

"I'm sorry," one member snapped when she heard Esther's explanation. "That just won't do. Look at Virginia Mayo. She worked in pictures last year and had a baby and she always made time for the press."

Modern Screen, having carefully researched Esther Williams and her activities, refuses to brand this wholesome girl as "uncooperative."

She is more warm-hearted, more generous and kind than a dozen other actresses. She is blessed with enough modesty to prevent her from talking about the good she does.

This is why we turn you over to her husband, Ben Gage.

"Esther," he says, "is no angel. Stick a pin in her and she bleeds. Hurt her and she cries. She also gets sick, gets excited, eats food and buys dresses. In other words, she's normal and she's human. But she's not typical.

"The overwhelming love in her heart, especially for children, is not typical. It's unusual and wonderful and it colors our whole life.

"When we were married it was Esther's idea to adopt a French war orphan, to pay a monthly allowance for a little girl's support. The child has grown up and no longer needs our support. But Esther ordered the allowance transferred to the support of an Italian war orphan.

"Before we were married we decided that we wanted lots of children. Esther was one of five, and her family life was the happiest.

"After we were married, Esther announced one day that she was with child. We were both overjoyed. But after five and a half months she lost the baby. We don't know exactly what was wrong.

"That set us both to thinking about handicapped children, babies who came into the world with some sort of physical deficiency. Esther began to think about what she could do for such babies. That's how she became interested in the Nursery School for the Visually Handicapped.

"Esther has not only contributed a swimming pool in part, but whenever she has any spare time she's down at the nursery teaching those little kids who don't see so well how to swim.

"All our three children, thank God, are physically perfect, and looking after three healthy kids is job enough for any woman, but Esther always finds time for those handicapped little guys.

"She just happens to be a kind-hearted girl. I could point out many things—her generosity to her family, jobs she's gotten for other swimmers, how thoughtful she is about the help—and they all add up to one word, cooperative, the opposite of what the Hollywood Women's Press Club said.

"Esther has said many times that her home—I guess that includes me and the kids—comes first. After that comes her career.

"And she's just not talking either. In Esther's book, human relationships are the most important things in life. She hates to hurt people and so far as I know she's never premeditatedly hurt anyone.

"We run a restaurant and a screen door factory. We employ quite a few people, and I don't think you can find anyone who'll say Esther hasn't given them a fair shuffle.

"I don't want to be in the position of defending a girl who is so guiltless that she has nothing to defend. I just mention these facts so that her fans can better understand Esther.

"But isn't there the possibility, just the possibility, mind you, that a wee bit of jealousy might have been responsible for Esther's having been named most uncooperative?"

The jealousy theory is widely held in Hollywood. For many years Esther and Ben Gage have been sniped at for no apparent reason.

You've read rumors to the effect that their marriage was coming apart at the seams, that a divorce was inevitable, and all the rest of the dirge.

"It so happens," Esther says, "that every time these rumors begin, I get pregnant. Then the columnists get embarrassed."

Why should people be jealous of Esther and Ben? They have everything: a comfortable home, beautiful children, a great future, a profitable career, and their love for each other. These are virtues enough to make them a target.

Ben was with Esther on location in Florida making Easy to Love. Someone asked, "What in heaven's name does Esther see in that lug? Does he ever work? What does he do?"

The answer is that Ben Gage does work. He manages the Trails Restaurant and the Willgay Manufacturing Company. Although he doesn't earn what Esther earns, neither does he use his wife to further his own schemes.

Esther's personal life was not particularly happy until Ben came along. She was unhappy with her first husband, not only because they had different philosophies, but because her family didn't like the young medical student. Esther has always loved her family and could not tolerate the near-estrangement.

When Ben Gage came along, her loneliness ended, they were married and have been happy ever since.

Ben was in show business for fifteen years before he met Esther. He was never too successful, probably because he is not hyper-ambitious. Ben believes in living and letting live. This sort of middle-of-the-way philosophy is not the route to stardom.

He is content to let Esther be the star in the family. Sensibly, he realizes that he cannot equal her achievements. Why try to compete?

He loves being with Esther and his family, making them happy, working around the house. The Hollywood gossips don't bother him one bit.

Of course he was disturbed when his wife was voted the most uncooperative actress of 1953. There have been too many reporters and photographers around his house all year long for him to believe any such judgment. He just scoffs at rumors concerning him and his life with Esther.

"I don't pay them any attention," he explains. "Why should I? I'm tired of denying that Esther and I are fighting or quarreling or whatever they're saying. I know all about Esther, and she knows all about me. We don't have to be told about each other by the newspapers."

Several of the reporters who cast votes against Esther will tell you privately that she is driving, ambitious, and money-mad. They will tell you about the real estate investment she made in Twenty-Nine Palms, California, her deal with Cole of California bathing suits, her plan to organize an Aquacade, and many of her other business deals. But they can't tell you all about them.

Several years ago Esther bought some desert property in Twenty-Nine Palms and had her brother David supervise the construction of half a dozen small homes. She didn't do this to make a big profit or to speculate on land values.

David was sick, out of work, and had been ordered down to the desert. Esther thought it would be nice to give him something to do, so she invested her hard-earned money in the project. Her other brother, Stanton, died of an intestinal virus when he was only sixteen—she frequently refers to him as "the most talented of the group"—and she cannot stand to have any of her own family be unhappy.

She backed a filling station in Santa Monica, but when someone told her the neighboring filling stations couldn't compete with her prestige as a movie star, she quickly sold out.

Esther was offered $50,000 a week to break in her Aquacade at Las Vegas.

This money-mad girl said, "That's a lot of money, but an Aquacade is a wholesome kind of act, and while Las Vegas is a wonderful city, still there's something about all that gambling—I don't want to sound prudish, but I'd rather take the Aquacade out on tour all over the country."

None of the charges leveled against Esther since she went to work in pictures ten years ago—that she's self-centered, uncooperative, ruthless—will hold water.

As her husband says, "Esther isn't perfect." But Hollywood has yet to produce her equal as a mother, housewife, and actress.

As for being wholesome, morally upright, civic-minded, considerate, cooperative, and friendly, Esther Jane Williams will take a backseat to no one. END going . . . going . . . gone!

Dale and Jackie were married on May 19, 1951. Dale's studio associates seemed to be genuinely pleased.

"Marriage is just what this boy needs," one actor said. "He'll hit the top in no time. Dale is pretty unusual for a Hollywood actor. Not a phony bone in his body.

"Know where he lives? Out in Reseda on a G.I. tract. Pays $52 a month for rent. And no marriage will make him move into any of those swanky joints in Beverly Hills.

"I hope Jackie realizes that she's got a real man in Dale." That Dale was a real he-man, Jackie soon recognized. He was crazy about fights, baseball, softball, dogs and, of course, horses.

When he wasn't indulging his passion for these activities, he was hunting or driving to and from Oklahoma City. He worked at the studio, of course, and they worked him long and hard because the young movie-goers liked him.

Dale seemed to pride himself in retaining a fierce independence. Around the studio he referred to his wife as a "fine filly" and, in the words of one perceptive actress, "He gave the impression that nothing, neither marriage nor contracts, would stop him from doing whatever he felt like doing. Marriage changes a man's outlook. It gives him new duties, new responsibilities. Not Dale. He seemed to strut around as if to say, 'See, nobody can rein me in. I'm a free soul.' "

Out in Reseda, living in the stucco bungalow, Jackie was confused and unhappy. Away from her friends and family, young and inexperienced, her career abandoned, she was eager and experimental. But she was alone most of the time. Even when Dale was at home, he was so continually involved with horses and picture-making and sports and business deals that there was little time for family life.

"Occasionally," Jackie says, "he told me that he loved me. And maybe he did. I just doubt it. Because if he really loved me then he would have tried to work at our marriage.

"I told him that marriage wasn't merely a convenience, that it was a companionship two people had to build together, that the sum of mutual experiences is what made it rich and full and good. But somehow, I couldn't get through to him.

"After a while, I began studying myself. 'Maybe I'm at fault,' I thought. 'Maybe there's something lacking in me.'

"I went to a doctor. Then I went to a psychiatrist. Then I went to a marriage

Love—I Spelled It Sex

I liked her kisses but I couldn't believe that she was so simon pure that she didn't understand I wasn't the marrying kind.

All I wanted out of life was a good time and to be my own boss. Girls like Kate were my kind, lots of good times with no strings attached. It wasn't until a bad car wreck put my brother's kids under my care that I began to have any doubts . . . began to think that maybe Sheila was right.

Don't miss "Love, I Spelled It Sex," the story of a man who knew exactly what he wanted out of life . . . who thought people with responsibilities didn't have any fun.

counselor. The doctor and the psychiatrist said there was nothing wrong with me. I didn't need treatment or anything. The marriage counselor suggested bringing Dale along for conferences. He didn't want to go but I insisted until he went with me. "Nothing helped.

"In many ways he's a wonderful man. I just don't think marriage is for him, not a give-and-take marriage anyway. Maybe he needs a wife who will be grateful for any scrap of attention. I'm not like that.

"Dale wants a family, but he doesn't know how to live a married life. He says he wants to be married, but I guess he doesn't want to be married to me."

BEFORE HE LEFT for Mexico where he has just put the finishing touches on Sitting Bull, Dale was asked for his version.

Jackie had been awarded separate maintenance of $850 a month for the support of herself and their sixteen-month-old daughter, Rochelle. All Dale would say was, "she asked for a divorce, an' I told her if that's what she wanted, it was okay with me. I've got nothin' to say. The marriage just didn't work."

The reason it didn't, according to Kit Carson, Dale's stand-in and close buddy, is that "the two of 'em weren't right mates fer each other.

"Dale got married because he wanted a home, a wife and a family. I think he still wants all those things but he's a man who's stuck with his nature just like Jackie's a woman who's stuck with hers."

By nature, temperament and background the Robertsons are opposites.

Dale is blunt, honest, stoic, inhibited, proud and unemotional. He has never worn his heart on his sleeve. He had an unhappy first marriage which ended in divorce; he had a rough time getting a break in Hollywood; he was shot up pretty badly during World War II, but he told Jackie very little of all these experiences.

When she tried to thaw him out, when she tried to understand the workings of his mind, to discuss the past and the future, he seemed to rebel. It was as though she were invading his privacy and overstepping the rights of a wife.

"He treated her," says one of her friends, "as if she were a reporter. And you know how he treats them. Won't talk to them.

"Of course, I'm Jackie's friend and I'm taking her side. But honestly, Dale just wasn't cut out to be a good husband. Either that, or he married the wrong girl.

"If you love your wife, then you want to spend as much time with her as possible. And with your little daughter.

"Jackie's very young. Dale is her senior by ten years, at least. During the first year of their marriage he should have been more solicitous.

"Instead he was indifferent. Maybe he thinks it's unmanly to be in love, a sign of weakness or something. But he really ran the household. And I can tell you this: Jackie really tried to be a good wife. I never heard her complain about anything. And she had good reason.

"Most of their friends were his friends. Practically everything they did, he wanted to do. Dale's business manager put Jackie on an allowance of $25 a week for spending money. I think Dale got $35 a week. Any time something had to be bought, Jackie had to check with the business manager. It was always his career, his welfare that came first.

"Other girls who are married to actors load up with clothes and big cars and a big house right after the marriage. Not Jackie. Out of her marriage she got a wonderful little baby and a lot of heartache."

DALE ROBERTSON has never been affectionate or demonstrative. You can tell this in his movie-acting. He would rather act like Gene Autry than Charles Boyer.

His young wife was surprised by this. She believed that gradually Dale would learn to relax, to bare his emotions, to talk to her, to show spontaneous affection.

She had no idea that his desire to become a successful businessman was an obsession. Last year when he told her he intended to invest in the Everlast Laboratories, a company which produces a rubber compound that protects automobile tires from puncture, Jackie said, "Do what you think best, but aren't you afraid you're spreading yourself too thin?"

Jackie says now, "I thought he was doing enough, working at the studio and training his horses. And I pointed out that he was putting too many kettles in the fire. He did what he liked. And I certainly hope he succeeds."

A director who has worked with Dale says, "I have the impression that this fellow is ashamed of being an actor. He tells you that he's in the game for one reason, money. Maybe. Only I don't think so.

"I think he likes acting. I think he likes the whole business. If he doesn't why did he go to night school at the university downtown and take courses in motion picture production? Why has he written three or four scripts?

"My own feeling is that he likes the glamour and the adoration. Secretly, he even likes all the interviews he's constantly yelling about. Only he won't admit it.

"He's got a serious conflict and I guess that's why he's a tough man to live with.

"Maybe you don't understand what I mean. Take a man like Fred Astaire. He's been retiring from this racket for the last ten years. According to him, every picture he makes is his last. But he keeps coming back. Why? He doesn't need the money. He's loaded.

"The reason is that he loves to make motion pictures, and so does Dale Robertson. Don't let him kid you."

DALE KEEPS SAYING over and over again that he's pulling out of Hollywood as soon as his contract expires; and while Jackie agreed to go and live with him wherever he wanted to settle, she first wanted to be sure that Dale really loved her and wanted her.

"From the beginning," she says, "I had the feeling that he regretted our marriage, that he knew in his heart that he had made a mistake and that he was too kind to tell me. I suggested this possibility to him and he said no, that he really cared for me.

"In the months that followed, I prayed that he would prove it by his behavior. I thought that after the separation he would see how bad it was for us to be apart. But no change. Still the same busy, distant, indifferent man.

"When our baby was born he was very happy. I thought that his being a father would change him. He loves our little girl. I know he does but there's very little demonstration of it.

"I've tried everything in the book to make a success of our marriage. Dale is the son of divorced parents, and I didn't want our child to grow up that way. But there is no use in two people's living together if they can't get along.

"I want to say now that I'm not pregnant as the gossip columnists have reported and that there was no third party involved in the failure of our marriage. No other woman—nothing like that.

"I think I could have coped with that, but when a man has fallen out of love with his wife—then it's just hopeless.

"As a matter of fact, as I look back on it all, it was hopeless to begin with. He just didn't love me." END marilyn and joe

(Continued from page 41) Joe phoned his bride and told her to meet him in San Francisco and Marilyn slipped out of Hollywood just as quietly as she'd slipped in. A day later she and her husband and Lefty O'Doul were aboard a Pan American Clipper bound for Honolulu.

The free-for-all had begun.

When the visiting trio arrived at the Honolulu Airport they were mobbed by an estimated 2,000 fans most of whom wanted to become Marilyn's close friends.

Hula dancers greeted the celebrities, the Hawaii Visitors Bureau officials draped them with leis and four special policemen helped Marilyn fight her way to the Pan-American passenger lounge.

"They kept grabbing at my hair," she said nervously. "Did you see them, Joe? They kept grabbing at my hair." Joe, expecting a little peace and quiet in Honolulu, shrugged his shoulders, said nothing.

The police formed a protective cordon across the narrow hallway leading to the lounge while Joe and Marilyn each drank a glass of Hawaiian pineapple juice.

The newlyweds then said they were ready to talk to the anxious reporters and photographers. They were most cooperative, Marilyn posing for pictures and Joe explaining that "we're just on our way to Tokyo. We expect to get our visas tomorrow and then take off tomorrow night."

"Do you plan to swim at Waikiki?" they were asked.

"I don't think we'll have time," Joe said. He looked at Lefty O'Doul.

"They want to spend a little time staying away from all you fellows," O'Doul said with his big Irish grin. "After all, they're lovebirds on a honeymoon." Everyone laughed and a police official called out that there would be no need for control squads and road blocks at Waikiki.

Marilyn and Joe were ushered into a powder blue convertible driven by Louis Benjamin, the owner of a bar called The Log Cabin. Di Maggio had met Benjamin during World War II, and it was "Benny" who whisked them off to the Royal Hawaiian Hotel.

The following night the Di Maggios and O'Doul were headed for Tokyo for what Joe was assured would be "a quiet time." This illusion was dispelled when the plane put down on the runway at Haneda International Airport.

THE MOVIE FANS were so pushing, so numerous, so avid, that Marilyn and Joe had to scramble back into the plane. When the fans refused to disperse, the newlyweds escaped through the baggage hatch and ran to the Immigration Office.

It was even worse at the Imperial Hotel where more than 200 police were called out to maintain order. The Imperial has dozens of labyrinthine passageways. Practically all of these were blocked by Japanese fans shouting, "Malyn. Malyn Monloe." The newspapers had made the serious error of announcing the Di Maggios' hotel.

As Marilyn stepped into the lobby, the fans began to press. Plate glass broke; revolving doors stuck; two sight-seers fell into a fish pond.

Marilyn and Joe finally got to their room. O'Doul sent word to the press that the couple would be down in ten minutes. Marilyn, who is late to everything, including her own wedding, was about two hours late this time. The newsmen, realizing what she'd been through—the long trip, the milling crowds, the constant pressure—greeted her affably when she slithered into the Treasure Room.

She was given the seat of honor. O'Doul hovered protectively. Joe, almost unnoticed, leaned against a corner of the room where only four resolute baseball reporters began to question him. Marilyn, however, faced a battery of eighty-five. She smiled as the camera bulbs began popping.

"Excuse, please, but do you sleep naked?"

The actress grinned. "No comment."

"Have you ever seen your husband play in a baseball game?"

"No," the actress answered. "I met my husband after he had retired from active baseball."

"What do you plan to do in Japan?"

"Even though I'm on my honeymoon I understand I'll have the chance to tour the Korean front, to entertain our troops. I'm going for at least three or four days."

"Your husband, Joe Di Maggio, no object?"

Marilyn shook her head. "No, it's all right with him. We've discussed it."

"What kind of fur piece is that you are wearing?"

"Fox," the blonde quipped, "and not the 20th Century kind."

"About 20th Century-Fox, please, you are now under suspension? Why?"

"Well, I read the script of the new movie and I didn't care for it. That doesn't mean I don't like musicals—I like good musicals."

"When you go to Korea will you wear ermine bathing suit like Terry Moore?"

Marilyn said no, she would wear a plain cocktail dress.

"Is your husband going to Korea with you?"

"No, he is staying behind with Mr. O'Doul to coach your baseball players."

"Do you agree with Kinsey Report, Miss Monroe?"

"No, I do not."

"You plan to give up career?"

Marilyn thought for a moment. "No, I don't, but my marriage comes before my career. I'd like to have a family."

"Is it true you really want six children?"

It was here that Joe Di Maggio broke in. "Hey," he called out. "You should ask me that question."

JOE AND MARILYN had very little time to themselves in Japan. One Sunday they drove out to Kawana, a fishing village, but photographers were spotted all over the place, and again the newlyweds had to pose for snapshots and answer questions.

When Joe flew south to coach with Lefty O'Doul, Mrs. O'Doul flew in to accompany Marilyn on her rounds.

The actress dropped in at the Tokyo Army Hospital, cheered several sick G.I.'s, and then worked out her Korea entertainment routine.

BROTHER, CAN YOU SPARE A DIME?

On my way to work one morning I stopped in a drugstore for coffee and found Jerry Lewis sitting next to me. He smiled and said good morning. When I finished breakfast the waiter refused my ten-dollar bill, saying that it was too early to change it. Jerry spoke up promptly. "Things are bad all over," he said—and paid my check!

Pvt. Albert Guastefeste of Uniondale, Long Island, a music instructor at Camp Zama, was chosen to be Marilyn's piano accompanist, and he ran through four numbers with the actress, "Diamonds Are A Girl's Best Friend" and "Bye, Bye, Baby" from Gentlemen Prefer Blondes. Also "Let's Do It Again" and "Somebody Loves Me."

Marilyn was asked if she wanted to do a solo or entertain as part of a ten-man package show which had been performing in Okinawa. Marilyn said she'd prefer being part of the troupe.

She was flown to Korea on February 16, dressed in drab combat boots, pants, and shirt (two buttons opened at the top). She carried a little make-up bag and a purple dress cut low. She described it as "a cocktail party dress or something like that. After all, I hadn't expected this. I didn't bring the right clothes."

But the 13,000 Marines who watched Marilyn sing had no gripes at all. They swarmed over the stage, snapping their cameras left and right. After she finished her act, Marilyn said, "I've never seen so many men in my life. I'm just sorry Joe couldn't come along but previous commitments wouldn't permit a change in schedule."

Said one Marine officer, "You were swell, absolutely swell. We've had them all but this crowd by far outdraws the best ever."

Marilyn had been flown by helicopter from Seoul to the 1st Marine Division, "and while I was scared, I tried not to show it."

Before she started her act on the Korean front, Marilyn announced that she could neither sing nor dance very well, but all she had to do was breathe and she evoked tremendous cheers from the 1st Marine and 3rd and 7th Army Divisions. The 40th Division, which consists of many California regiments, really broke the record.

While the troupe's preliminary acts were in progress at the 40th Division theatre, 10,000 soldiers pushed and elbowed forward in an effort to get closer to the stage.

WHEN IT LOOKED as if they would break through the military police line, Marilyn was told to be "ready for anything" while the regimental commander, Colonel John Kelly, went out front and temporarily halted the show.

"You're here to have a good time," he shouted. "And there's no sense in anyone's getting hurt."

When the show resumed and Marilyn came out front wearing the tight purple dress "that does a little more for me," the crowd surged forward and thousands of soldiers attempted to climb on the backs of their buddies.

In three days, Marilyn performed ten times for an estimated 50,000 men. When she finally finished at Taegu, Korea, she was dead tired but happy.

"You know," she told an officer, "I never felt like a movie star before—really in my heart—before I came to Korea. This is the high point of everything.

"Now I'm flying back to the most important thing in my life—Joe. And I want to start a family. A family comes before a career."

Back in Japan with Di Maggio, Marilyn told her husband, "I'm so glad I went to Korea, Joe. I'll never, never forget that experience so long as I live."

A man of few words, Joe took his wife in his arms and nodded understandingly. But he must have wondered how much longer he would have to share his bride with the world. END

The flower girls had their petals crushed.

LETTER FROM TOKYO

Tokyo, Japan, Far East

Dear Mr. Charles D. Saxon,

Every month I'm enjoying your magazine 4,000 miles apart here. Since the war at Korea many Hollywood stars are visited here. But we never expected Marilyn Monroe's coming. My English is limited, but I'll try to explain our feelings.

Lefty O'Doul, the San Diego baseball manager, came in on the same plane with the smiling DiMaggios. Lefty is one of Japan's biggest baseball idols, but he got lost in today's shuffle. He coached DiMaggio to marry Monroe such sensational, but this fact never known any reporter in the United States.

During the wait for the plane, thousands of people broke through police lines a couple of times. Japanese movie actresses were mobbed by schoolgirls and the flower girls had their petals crushed and some were stolen wallets by pickpockets among this mob. Over an hour after their plane landed, the DiMaggios got into a waiting convertible and drove down eight miles of highway, lined with tens of thousands of eager fans, to the Imperial Hotel in downtown Tokyo—where they were confronted with another vast multitude.

Although the trip to Tokyo was baseball business, Joe DiMaggio went relatively unnoticed in a far corner of the room where his audience consisted of a small handful of baseball reporters, while Marilyn Monroe talked to the press.

Q. What is your opinion about your famous "Monroe walk?"
A. I had been walking since I was six months old and couldn't stopped yet. It naturally come to me.
Q. Is it true you didn't wear any underwear clothes, whether or not?
A. I'm planning to buy a Japanese kimono and I'm wearing underclothes like this lace slip.
Q. What is your first impression of Japan?
A. I hardly to tell that answer because I just arrived here only yesterday, but I heard about Japan from my husband. I really never expected before such many cameramens waited here.
Q. Who is your closest best friend?
A. Miss Jane Russell and Miss Betty Grable.
Q. Who is your respectable people who are engaged in motion picture field?
A. Ingrid Bergman, Charles Laughton, Humphrey Bogart, Marlon Brando.
Q. You think your husband is a millionaire?
A. No, I don't think so. I guess he is empty.

Sincerely yours,
Yoko Hazama

Now...enjoy sweet treats and protect your teeth from cavities

New white Ipana with WD-9 inhibits tooth-decay acids*

Now you can eat the sweet things you like—and need for quick energy, a balanced diet—and stop worrying about unnecessary cavities.

Many foods, including sweets, form tooth-decay acids. But now, with new white Ipana containing acid-inhibitor WD-9, you can guard your teeth against these acids.

For WD-9 in Ipana's exclusive new formula is one of the most effective ingredients known to prevent the formation of tooth-decay acids. Acid-inhibitor WD-9 is an active anti-enzyme and bacteria destroyer.

To get the best results from new Ipana with acid-inhibitor WD-9, use it regularly after eating. Thus it acts before tooth-decay acids can do their damage.

Brushing with new Ipana after eating really works. A 2-year clinical test with hundreds who ate all the sweet things they wanted proved that brushing this way can prevent most tooth decay.

So remember, while no dentifrice can stop all cavities—you can protect teeth from sweet foods by brushing with new Ipana containing WD-9.

Don't cut down sweets ... do cut down cavities with new Ipana®

New minty flavor encourages children to brush teeth. No strong, medicinal taste in new Ipana with WD-9. And it makes your mouth so fresh and clean that even one brushing can stop most unpleasant mouth odor all day long.

Academy Award winners: Audrey Hepburn: best actress; William Holden: best actor; Donna Reed: best supporting Audrey Hepburn, still in Ondine make-up, was rushed to New York's Center Theatre by a police escort to receive Oscar from Jean Hersholt.

Bill Holden (with wife Brenda Marshall) took Oscar with brief "Thank you," sorry that time didn't allow him to make acceptance speech.

Donna Reed and Frank Sinatra won supporting Oscars for work in From Here To Eternity, which also took honors for direction, editing.

Mitzi Gaynor arrived with Jack Bean, joined m.c. Donald O'Connor to sing "The Moon is Blue"; Cecil B. DeMille followed Mitzi and Jack in.

Marge and Gower Champion presented awards for the best art direction in color and black-and-white to The Robe and Julius Caesar.

Donna Reed (with proud husband Tony Owen) burst into tears in press room, said she didn't remember running down aisle to receive award.

THE NEW MARILYN MONROE . . . PAT NERNEY SAYS HE'LL MARRY JANE POWELL SOON . . . HOLLYWOOD'S BEST CATCH: JACK WEBB . . . LOUELLA LOVES LANA

LOUELLA PARSONS' GOOD NEWS

THE BIGGEST CATCH in Hollywood today is not Clark Gable nor Bing Crosby.

It's old man Friday himself—Jack Webb, I mean—who will soon become a movie star in his famed Dragnet after selling the rights to Warner Brothers for a hot million dollars.

Now that the rumor is out that Jack is cooling with his former flame, Dorothy Towne, all the eligible glamour girls are on the prowl for this dark, moody and rich young man.

I ran into Jack at Chasen's a few nights ago and he was anything but moody. To the contrary, he was very funny about his reactions to becoming a movie star after years on radio and TV.

"Guess I went kinda nuts about being on the screen," he said after dropping by my table for a chat. "First thing I did was to buy Stanley Kramer's former house which has two swimming pools and a couple of projection rooms.

"Then I went and ordered a new wardrobe—everything from sweaters to tails—that would be the envy of the Duke of Windsor.

"The same week, I bought a pastel car—just like the ones driven by the movie stars!"

actress; Frank Sinatra: best supporting actor; From Here To Eternity: best film; "Secret Love": best song

Frank Sinatra brought Frank, Jr., and Nancy, made them promise not to be disappointed if he didn't win. "Don't you be, either," they advised, then presented him with St. Genesius medal with Oscar engraved on back.

Liz Taylor and Michael Wilding started the ceremonies by presenting 4 awards for short subjects to Walt Disney, giving him a grand total of 18 Oscars, 3 Special Academy Awards and one Irving Thalberg Award.

Lana Turner (almost unnoticed by fans in the balcony who didn't recognize her dark hair) and Lex Barker presented the cinematography (photography to you) awards; one went to Burnett Guffey (left) for Eternity.

Clark Gable brought Grace Kelly. Other pairs at this 26th Academy Award were Corinne Calvet and John Anderson; John Wayne and Pilar Palette; Carole Lee and Alana Ladd (using Mom and Dad's tickets).

I laughed, "These are the facts?"

Jack nodded. "These are the facts, ma'am."

"And how do you like all your movie star trappings now," I asked.

"Hate 'em, just hate 'em," said Jack. "Can't stand that huge house. I've only owned it a few months and I'm putting it on the market to sell.

"Hate all those clothes, too. But I'm stuck with them. Just for spite, I'm wearing my oldest suit.

"And that car is parked in the garage gathering dust and rust while I drive my old three-year-old job."

Jack sighed, "Guess I'm not cut out to be a bona fide movie star."

We'll see about that, Mr. Dragnet.

AFTERTHOUGHTS on the fabulously beautiful wedding of Joan Benny and Seth Baker:

What a laugh I got when Jack Benny whispered in my ear the real reason for the long wait before he and Joanie came down the aisle—even after the orchestra had struck up "Here Comes The Bride."

"Of all things, at a time like this, Joan says she's just got to go to the powder room!" gasped Jack.

Never have I seen such delightful young people circling in one room. Among the bridesmaids I thought Sandra Wilhoit, the tall blonde daughter of Gracie Allen and George Burns, was exceptionally beautiful.

The sentimental atmosphere seemed to have affected many estranged couples.

Even though Freddie Karger was leading the orchestra he couldn't take his eyes off Jane Wyman—and I don't wonder. She looked radiantly beautiful in an off the shoulder, bouffant pink dress.

Finally, Johnny Green took pity on Freddie and offered to play the piano so Karger could dance with his wife.

Bob Taylor left early for an amusing reason. He walked right out of the Crystal Room and into the cocktail lounge at the hotel and sent a note to Barbara Stanwyck asking her to join him! She did—and they talked until closing time.

Frank Sinatra was there and so was Nancy—but they just said, "Hi," as they passed one another.

One of the loveliest gowns in the room was worn by Piper Laurie who is soooo in love with Dick Contino—and he with her. However, the course of this true love is not running smoothly because of a serious difference in their religious faiths.

Getting back to Piper's dress, it was a décolleté ecru chiffon with big crush roses of the same material over one shoulder. With her vivid red hair, it was a lovely effect.

The best dancer in the room was Anita Louise, wife of Buddy Adler who has won so many honors for producing From Here To Eternity. Anita danced every dance and I don't know how her feet held up. I know. I tried to do the same thing!

No mother-of-the-bride was ever so thoughtful of her guests, more sentimental, or more tired than Mary Benny. What a wonderful hostess she was!

Tony Martin was out of town, so Cyd Charisse came with the Johnny Greens. Cyd was breathtaking in a flame colored chiffon, but I continue to be surprised at the way certain cameramen fail to recognize her and pass her up for lesser celebrities. Cyd never cares.

Dean Martin showed up. Jerry Lewis didn't.

Joan Caulfield dropped a piece of wedding cake on her beautiful gown but she laughed, "I always like to take a piece of wedding cake home to sleep on. But this is the first time I've worn it home."

It will be a long time before there's another social event as beautiful and heartwarming as Mary and Jack's wedding for their beloved daughter.

When Marilyn Monroe come to my house to discuss her appearance on my radio show, the bride furnished me a couple of surprises.

Not formerly the neat type, Marilyn looked very chic in a black skirt, white printed blouse, and a wide belt. And every hair was in place.

Her old man, Mr. DiMaggio, likes her all spruced up, I take it.

The second surprise came as we were discussing the script. Marilyn rewrote some of it and her ideas were splendid. Don't sell this girl short. She knows her business.

Marilyn was still hopped up over her trip to Korea even though she had caught a dreadful cold.

"Joe is flying home tonight," she told me proudly. "I can hardly wait for his plane to arrive."

By way of proving this, she hopped up every five minutes, went to the telephone, and checked the airport on the time of arrival.

Marilyn used to be late for everything.

But not where Joe is concerned. She tore out of my house to be at the airport ahead of time when her Joe flew in.

Love is wonderful.

Dean Martin and Jerry Lewis have been having terrible fights and it's obvious that somebody has been giving one of the boys, or both, very bad advice.

Jerry admitted to me that they went to it hammer and tongs, on location in Phoenix making The Big Top. But, over the telephone, he said:

"It was rough going for us for awhile. But I wish all marriages were as steady as our partnership is now. We won't break up."

Several years ago, it was noised around that the wives of Dean and Jerry didn't hit it off socially. My spies, however, report that the ladies aren't the cause of the present hassle.

As I get it, Dean was very unhappy about his small role in The Big Top and insisted on a rewrite. Someone is telling Dean that he is getting the worst of it in the Martin and Lewis teaming.

Don't think for a minute that I'm putting all the blame on Dean. Jerry has been in a bit of a battling mood himself lately. Not long ago he and his pal, Tony Curtis, had a big blow-up and didn't speak for several months.

Let's hope nothing serious comes between Martin and Lewis. No matter what they may think, neither would be so good without the other.

The strange and temperamental behavior of a certain big league star (feminine) is due to her almost neurotic belief that she has cancer.

The amazing thing about this is that the doctors say she has no malignancy.

But she broods and broods to the point where it may eventually wreck her health—and her career.

Jane Powell says she and Pat Nerney did not get married in Mexico City where he met her on her return from the Rio festival. "We have no wedding plans," says Jane.

That isn't what Pat is saying. "We'll marry as soon as Jane's divorce is final," says the good-looking Nerney, formerly married to Mona Freeman.

I'm betting Pat's right.

Personal opinions: Julia Adams is the only brunette Donald O'Connor has ever fallen for—and as this is written Don's fallen! . . . If such a thing is possible, Mitzi Gaynor's eyelashes are too thick. A wag said, "Mitzi's eyes are bordered in mink!" . . . I've said it before and I'm going to say it again: Doris Day is too plainly dressed in public. She wears high necks and long sleeves when the other girls are bare as far as they dare. . . Saw Liz Taylor shopping with her baby in a Beverly Hills toy shop. Liz was wearing a blue slacks suit—and on her slacks look good—which is more than I can say for all movie queens. Most men don't like them, but Liz told me, "Mike thinks they're cute and very American." . . . Jeff Chandler's developing an "I-Want-To-Be-alone" complex almost as conspicuous as Greta Garbo's. He stags everywhere. . . . Speaking of recluses, what's happened to Dale Robertson—practically invisible since his rift with his wife? . . . The biggest feud in town is still Mrs. Rory Calhoun and Nora Flynn Haymes. . . . Never in her life has Jeanne Crain been more beautiful—and Joan Crawford's 46th-birthday party was given at New York's The Harwyn. Danny Kaye and press agent O'Shea were among the guests.

Joan's former husband, Franchot Tone, arrived to congratulate her; they saw each other often in New York, but it's not serious, they maintain.

"Young Skin" Problems?

In the teens, "Young Skin" no longer means the baby-soft complexion you were born with.

All at once, it seems, everything "goes wrong." Excess oil oozes out, in spite of frequent scrubbings. Yet, at the same time, skin grows too sluggish to throw off its daily accumulation of dead cells. These dried flakes cover and choke pore-openings. Then—enlarged pores and blackheads may appear.

Today—skin doctors say that excess oil and dead skin must be cleared off. Now specially for "Young Skin" problems, Pond's brings you a greaseless Treatment based on this medical theory. Hundreds of girls have tested it. They say it really works!

Quick-working "Young Skin" Treatment

Reduces large pores
Clears off oiliness
Leaves skin soft!

Pond's "Young Skin" Treatment—used every day—keeps your skin looking fresh and clear! And it takes only 1 minute! Just cover face deeply, except eyes, with greaseless Pond's Vanishing Cream. Leave on 1 full minute. The Cream's "keratolytic" action dissolves away choking oil and dead skin debris . . . frees tiny skin glands to function normally. After 1 minute, wipe off, rinse with cold water. Now see how tingling fresh your skin feels, how much smoother and cleaner it looks!

Heavy make-up doesn't flatter "Young Skin"

For a delicate, natural powder base—use a film of Pond's Vanishing Cream. Not greasy. Holds powder!

she's always been beautiful. . . . Pretty cute and sweet of Frank Sinatra to have as his Academy Award guests his lovely thirteen-year-old daughter, Nancy, and ten-year-old Frankie, Jr.

The "feud" Lana Turner Barker and I have been carrying on over her dark hair (I said in print that I didn't like it and Lana told another writer she didn't care who liked it or who didn't, she did) came to an end when I arrived at her cocktail party.

It was the first formal event Lana and Lex had staged since their marriage and it was a charming affair.

When I walked in, Lana said, "Look, Louella. I've put light streaks in front just for you!"

When you get right down to it, I'd like Lana's looks if she dyed her hair purple. I just like Lana.

A prediction: Debbie Reynolds will be the biggest little star in Hollywood after you see her in Susan Slept Here. Debbie really reaches the heights as a polished comedienne in that picture.

May I add with justifiable pride that the very amusing picture was produced by Harriet Parsons, a young woman very close to my heart. And wait until you see Dick Powell as her beau.

I love this movie—and I think you will, too.

Take a bow, Miss Stanwyck. Vic Damone says Barbara is the best dancer in Hollywood.

"And notice what a wonderfully graceful walk she has," opined Vic who usually dates only the younger girls, "probably the most beautiful walk of any actress, including professional dancers, in Hollywood."

Linda Christian Power and Tyrone Power heatedly denied that they had a battle at dinner in a nightspot. The story went that Linda blew her top when Ty started to tell a story and yelled so all could hear:

"Good heavens! Are you going to tell that same old, old, old story all over again?"

The whole thing hands me a chuckle. Whether Linda yelled at Ty or not, many wives who have listened to the "same old, old, old story" hundreds of times can certainly sympathize with her.

THE LETTER BOX: From Pine Bluff, Arkansas, "L. G." asks my aid in getting her married to Bing Crosby! My dear, almost every eligible female from six to sixty has the same idea.

Mrs. Anne Heller, Lansdowne, Pa., writes: "Marlon Brando is superb in Julius Caesar. People who take cracks at his temperament must be jealous."

Oh, now come, come, come, "J.M.," Astoria, New York, requesting: "Please send me the name, make, model and size of the bra worn by Janet Leigh in Walking My Baby Back Home."

"N.W.," of Sanford, Florida, is through with "vain Vittorio Gassman" after the shameful way he treated Shelley Winters. "Shelley did her part. I don't blame her for screaming when she arrived in Rome."

The last letter this month—and the best—comes from Margo Danieje, who sends me a personal close-up of the stars she saw in Buenos Aires during the South American film festival. Margo writes:

"Everywhere Fred MacMurray and June Haver went they were loved and greeted by cries, 'MacMurray and La Monjita!' (meaning June, the little nun).

"Wendell Corey has such gracious manners and he is so well dressed.

"Irene Dunne was the hardest to recognize. She went to church the most often.

"Edward G. Robinson delighted all by looking so much like himself on the screen—even to riding in an open car, smoking a big, fat cigar just like Little Caesar.

"Ann Miller is so glamorous and wears such gorgeous clothes the crowds wondered why she is not a greater star in the U.S.A.

"We were surprised that Jeanette MacDonald's hair is carrot-color. But she has a dazzling smile.

"Joan Fontaine was very much the lady both in her looks and action. She wore the least make-up.

"South American fans do not forget. So is it any wonder that the crowds cheered themselves almost into a frenzy when small, dainty-looking and so young Mary Pickford stepped from her car blowing kisses?"

Thank you so very much, Margo, for your intimate observations about our traveling Hollywoodians.

Mona Freeman and Bob Neal have been dining together regularly at Ciro's. Mona, who has been dating a great deal, may be settling down.

Coming home from the Brazilian Film Festival, June and Fred denied elopement rumors.

CAN LOVE FIND THE WAY?

Love has ended loneliness for June Haver and Fred MacMurray. But it has created new problems, even harder to solve.

BY ALICE HOFFMANN

■ Six months ago June Haver twenty-seven, and Fred MacMurray forty-five, were unhappy—really unhappy. June, unable to adjust to the life of a novitiate and complete her orders to become a nun, had returned to Hollywood from a Roman Catholic convent at Xavier, Kansas.

Fred had recently lost his wife Lillian. They had been married seventeen years, and theirs was one of the most successful marriages in Hollywood.

Without Lillian the husky film actor felt lost. He had two adopted children to bring up, Susan fourteen, and Robert ten. And he just didn't know what to do.

For weeks June and Fred moped around town trying to adjust their individual lives.

June bleached her hair, bought a new wardrobe and started dating an old family friend, Joe Campbell.

Fred couldn't bring himself even to dine with another woman, so fresh in his heart and mind was the memory of his lovely Lillian.

But time heals all wounds, and eventually Fred and June found themselves at Ned Marin's Gay Nineties party.

"I'm glad I went," he says now. "Because I met June there and I got to know her well. And somehow she succeeded in turning the shadows into sunshine."

Early this year Fred and June began going around together. Very sedately, very quietly. But in Hollywood secrets are impossible to keep, and it wasn't very long before both of them admitted to strong affection. (Continued on page 14)

Hardworking Mrs. Marilyn Bridgman of Watermill, New York has discovered that only Jergens Lotion gives her hands the care they need. She says:

"I scour 4500 pots and pans a year...but I'm proud of my pretty hands!"

Detergents are wonderful—but they could have ruined Marilyn's pretty hands. Yet her hands are soft and lovely still. Why?

Jergens Lotion! This famous formula has been continuously improved for fifty years to help heal chapped red hands instantly!

No other lotion works faster, or penetrates deeper than Jergens Lotion. It never leaves a sticky film (as many others do).

Contains two softening ingredients doctors have used for years. Yet, you pay less for Jergens, the world's favorite hand care.

Use Jergens Lotion—avoid detergent hands

She smiled and from the way she smiled anyone could see that she was. But all she would say was, "I'm not dating anyone else." Her love for Fred was implicit.

Fred, the handsome giant (six feet, three, 196 pounds) from Beaver Dam, Wisconsin, was reluctant, too, to discuss his private life in public.

"All I'm going to say is that June is a fine girl. I consider it a privilege to have her as a friend."

"She's more than a friend," he was pressed, "isn't she?"

MacMurray grinned. "Okay, she's a good friend."

Obviously, Fred didn't want to admit last February that he was falling in love with June, and she with him. MacMurray is shy, modest and conservative.

OVER THE YEARS he has rarely made an impetuous move. He is not the type of man to elope with a beautiful girl. Nor has he ever worn his heart on his sleeve.

He is a man who judges, measures and weighs all his actions. June is the same kind of young woman.

So when Fred asked June to accompany him to the Brazilian and Argentine Film Festivals in March, most of Hollywood knew that this was the trial-and-test period before the engagement announcement.

With twenty-five other film stars June and Fred took off for South America. June had no trousseau with her, and Fred had no marriage ring in his cash pocket.

They spent three hectic weeks in Rio de Janeiro and Buenos Aires. They got to know each other better, to see each other under a very special set of circumstances. And they liked what they saw. Despite all the South American attractions, they had eyes only for each other. One actress who returned to Hollywood before the others, remarked, "Fred and June are real gone. Bet they're married before the year is out."

The wire services didn't wait for the year to report that June Haver and Fred MacMurray planned to elope to Kingston, Jamaica, and to get married on March 20.

The Miami Daily News had said in a copyrighted yarn that Joan Fontaine had revealed the romantic nuptial plans upon arriving from Panama.

It is true that Joan had flown up with June and Fred as far as Panama, but it is not true that she told a representative from Pan-American Airlines that "they got off at the Canal Zone. Then they're going to Kingston, Jamaica, to get married."

According to Miss Fontaine, this is what happened.

"My plane landed at Miami at six-forty-five A.M. You know how it is when a plane lands. Much talk. Much hustle and bustle.

"June and Fred had gotten off in Panama. They both wanted to rest.

"Some fellow from the airlines came up to us at Miami and started to check his manifest. 'Where,' he asked, 'are Miss Haver and Mr. MacMurray? Where are Mr. and Mrs. Flynn?'

"As I say, there was much yacking. We explained that June and Fred had gotten off in Panama that morning. So had Errol and Pat Flynn. The Flynns have a home in Jamaica. I think Errol keeps his yacht there. Someone said that the Flynns had taken a plane for Kingston, Jamaica.

"Somehow, June and Fred were mistaken for Errol and Pat. The Miami newspapers were phoned, and the story went out that they were eloping to Jamaica.

"If I had known that they had such plans, which apparently they didn't, I never would have told anyone."

The local newsmen talked to MacMurray at El Panama Hotel where he and June were staying.

"You and Miss Haver planning to get married?" a reporter asked.

"It could happen," Fred said good-naturedly.

"Could it happen here?" another reporter asked. "There was an inquiry a little while ago at the District Court in Ancon. Someone wanted to know about the possibility of your getting a marriage license in the Canal Zone."

"I can tell you this," Fred said. "We're not going to get married in Panama."

"Where do you plan to go from here?"

"On Saturday night," Fred said, "we're catching a plane for Hollywood."

IN PANAMA, June said nothing to reporters. She let Fred do all the talking, but back in Hollywood many were sure that June would not get married until she received a Papal Dispensation annulling her 1947 marriage to trumpet player Jimmy Zito. June is a devout Catholic convert. Fred MacMurray is a church-going Presbyterian. His grandfather was a Presbyterian minister.

How can these two reconcile their religious differences?

No matter how strong his love for June, Fred probably has no intention of converting from the Presbyterian church to the Catholic Church. He has brought up his two children in the Presbyterian faith and he believes strongly in most of its precepts.

He has absolutely no objections to June's beliefs and he admires her for her devotion to them.

Without the Papal Dispensation, June would be committing a sin in the eyes of the Catholic Church if she married Fred. That's why a wedding isn't likely until she gets the Dispensation.

But anything can happen and the lovers might be married as you read these very words. But it isn't likely.

Aside from their religions, Fred and June have so much in common that they should be able to make a lasting marriage. They both come from midwestern homes. Both have musical backgrounds. Both have been in show business most of their lives. And both have been married.

Gal reporter asked Lionel Barrymore if he finds acting as much fun as he used to. He snorted, "Look, I'm 75 years old. NOTHING is as much fun as it used to be!"

Mike Connolly in The Hollywood Reporter

June knows the value of a dollar, and Fred has many dollars. In twenty years, he has starred in about seventy-five films. He owns an 860-acre ranch, one of the finest herds of cattle in the West, a knitting mill, an apartment hotel, an oil company, four apartment houses and one of the most beautifully furnished homes (Early American) in Brentwood.

He is unassuming, unspoiled and one of the most likeable actors in Hollywood.

He has insisted over and over again, "I can't act. I'm just lucky."

In the seventeen years of his marriage, never once was he touched by a whiff of scandal. While Lillian was sick, more than one girl made a play for Fred. He didn't even look.

He never goes to see any of his own movies until they're playing in small neighborhood theatres where he can go in unrecognized. When people ask him if he's Fred MacMurray, he grins and says, "Everyone says there's a resemblance."

Right now, Fred is considered the best catch in Hollywood. And everyone is glad that June Haver appears to have caught him. For June also rates best. END

Are you in the know?

Should a college candidate plan to make—

☐ Hay while the sun shines ☐ A summer conquest

Headed for the ivy halls next autumn? Better start hoarding some greenery now (unless your Dad has that Midas touch!). Get a summer job. Maybe toting trays at a resort. Or salesclerking. Or working in an office, or hospital. Helps you get those college "extras" without a whimper from Pop's wallet. On certain days, job-holding's no chore when you choose the napkin that holds its shape. Kotex gives chafe-free softness: made to stay soft while wearing!

If not asked to the Big Dance, try a —

☐ Trip to Grandma's ☐ Gay fray ☐ Crying towel

Let the lucky bid-winners have their day—there's always another dance just around the corner, mourner! Meantime, round up all the Uninviteds (you're not the only one); stage a gay fray that night. Have music, ample samples (refreshment-wise). How about a home permanent party? And to banish calendar blues . . . be confident with Kotex. You get extra absorbency, for extra protection; poise!

To remedy fuzzy forearms, use—

☐ A razor ☐ A lightener ☐ Sandpaper

Wait! You're in for stubble trouble if you mow down forearm fuzz with a razor. Instead, why not bleach it—with a good hair lightener? (Then, long time no see!) You can foil unsightly outlines, too, at "that" time—thanks to Kotex. The secret? It's those flat, pressed ends. Try Regular, Junior, Super Kotex to learn which size best suits you.

HAS THE CLINICAL PROOF!

(Proof that Brings New Hope to Millions for LIFETIME PROTECTION AGAINST TOOTH DECAY)

5 QUICK FACTS FROM THE READER'S DIGEST ARTICLE

"What About Anti-Enzyme Toothpastes?" December, 1953

1. Reader's Digest says—The most effective anti-enzyme toothpaste ingredient tested was developed in the Colgate laboratories.

(It's Colgate's miracle ingredient Gardol (Sodium N-Lauroyl Sarcosinate)—found in no other leading toothpaste!)

2. Reader's Digest says—One of the foremost dental authorities in the world proved that this ingredient binds itself effectively to the teeth—holds acid formation below the decay level in 95 per cent of cases tested.

(Unlike ordinary toothpaste ingredients, effective only for minutes, this protection won't rinse off—won't wear off—all day or all night!)

3. Reader's Digest says—Even 12 hours after brushing, this new Colgate anti-enzyme discovery continues to guard against the enzymes that cause tooth decay.

(Thus, regular morning and night use guards against decay-causing enzymes every minute of the day and night!)

4. Reader's Digest says—In full-year clinical tests, X rays showed far fewer cavities for those people who used New Colgate's with Gardol! No new cavities for 4 out of 5.

(Distinguished dentists examined this evidence and agreed—New Colgate's with Gardol gives the surest protection against decay ever offered by any toothpaste!)

5. Reader's Digest says—New Colgate Dental Cream is the only toothpaste with clinical proof of such effectiveness in actually reducing the formation of new cavities.

JULIUS LA ROSA:

HOW NERVOUS CAN YOU GET?

Julius sees life through La Rosa-colored glasses, but Hollywood doesn't see Julius that way.

■ A few weeks ago Jimmy Durante remarked, "The trouble with a lot of youngsters these days is that they want to start in at the top of show business and work their way up."

One of these, Hollywood suspects, is Julius La Rosa, the handsome young crooner from Brooklyn who gained national attention when Arthur Godfrey fired him because he wasn't humble enough.

Julius suddenly found himself in demand for television and nightclub appearances. He accepted a bid from Ciro's, one of Hollywood's plushiest, and was advertised by them as "the year's most exciting personality." But he didn't do very good business. Just fair. Nor did he make many friends.

Julius whirled into the swank Beverly Hills Hotel and gave orders that he didn't want the phone to ring until he gave his okay. During the afternoon reporters were surprised when they were told that the ex-seaman was still asleep. Curious about his schedule, they asked the bellhops about Julius and his friends.

Said one, "I think he's about as humble as King Farouk."

He was never seen with a date, though he did consent to pose at Ciro's with Terry Moore.

Julius was belligerent when questioned about Dorothy McGuire, a singer on the Godfrey program.

"We don't mention her name," Julius told a reporter.

"Why?" the reporter wondered. The incident had made national headlines when Miss McGuire's husband, in the Army in Korea, flew home to talk it over with her and apparently persuaded her not to get a divorce.

Julius reddened. "I told you we don't mention her," he repeated. "Don't you get it?"

Julius posed with Terry Moore but spent most of his spare time with disc jockeys.

One evening a reporter entered La Rosa's dressingroom at Ciro's. "I have an appointment to interview—" he began. La Rosa spun him around and tossed him out of the room!

A minute later, one of La Rosa's assistants came running out. The newsman explained that Ciro's press agent had arranged an interview with La Rosa for him. "Is this the way your boy treats people?" he asked.

"Holy smokes!" the assistant wailed. "You'll have to forgive him. He's so nervous he didn't know."

"Okay," the newsman said. "Tell him I'll be waiting in the back of the club." He waited for quite some time —including some time after La Rosa had passed by (kissing two girls on the way), and sat down for a chat with his booking agent. After more unpleasantness, an apology came from La Rosa.

"I'm so sorry about last night and that reporter," he told the press agent's secretary. "I was so nervous. I had a rough time during the first show. There was a heckler down front. Really, I'm very sorry."

Studio representatives who watched La Rosa perform at Ciro's said they weren't interested in him for the movies until his voice had been trained considerably more. They added that he seemed to have a pleasant personality. Their wives thought he was cute.

The press is inclined to disagree. If the reporter who was tossed out of the dressingroom had not held the story, La Rosa would have been blasted in all the newspapers in Los Angeles County.

In the tournament for the hand of Princess Aleta (Janet Leigh), Prince Valiant (Bob Wagner) is defeated, fears he has lost her.

He leaves the court of King Arthur to help his father, King Aguar, recover his throne. Aleta has been promised to victorious Sir Gawain.

Having learned the identity of the mysterious Black Knight who has aided King Aguar's enemies, Val returns to court to challenge him. Sir Gawain has now fallen in love with Princess Ilene (Debra Paget), leaving the way clear for Aleta and Val to marry if he defeats the Black Knight.

PRINCE VALIANT. A comic strip is brought to CinemaScopic life in Prince Valiant, and all the color, adventure, romance and flatness of character of the former medium are lavishly transcribed. Prince Valiant (Robert Wagner) comes out of exile to the court of King Arthur (Brian Aherne) for training as a knight. He's pledged to win back the throne of Scandia for his father (Donald Crisp) who was divested of it by the evil Sligon (Primo Carnera) and his lusty Viking followers. Sligon has made a deal with a mysterious Black Knight. Bring me Valiant and his folks, says he, and I'll give you a thousand Vikings to overthrow King Arthur. Who is the Black Knight? Don't ask. It isn't Sterling Hayden (Sir Gawain) who takes Valiant as his squire. Could be anyone at Arthur's round table—Don Megowan, Richard Webb, John Dierkes, James Mason, Tom Conway. Trust Valiant to find out and finish him! Meanwhile love blooms around princesses Janet Leigh and Debra Paget, war rages in the ancient castle of Scandia where Valiant almost singlehandedly subdues a horde of horn-capped Vikings and pageantry flourishes at Camelot where knights in armor meet on the tournament plain. Critics may carp at Valiant's complete unreality, but kids of all ages will love it. Technicolor.—20th Century-Fox

ROSE MARIE Maybe the Mounties always get their man but a woman's harder to snare, especially when she has all of the Canadian Rockies to be elusive in. Howard Keel is a Mountie in this latest version of the operetta Rose Marie. And Ann Blyth, possessed of a voice that does not falter before "Indian Love Call," is a wild young waif brought to heel and, eventually, to Fernando Lamas, footloose romantic of the great outdoors. Even in sparsely populated areas Fernando manages to break hearts (one he should have left intact belongs to Indian maiden Joan Taylor). Now Fernando joins Keel in pursuit of Ann. Keel's pitch is largely vocal. Fernando's is vocal, too, but his charm lies in the pauses. Eastman Color and CinemaScope capture the magnificence of the Rockies and of a slightly smaller wonder—Bert Lahr, Mountie by choice but certainly not by avocation.—MGM.

MAN WITH A MILLION There isn't a humorist to beat Mark Twain, but that isn't the only reason this is such a delightful, winning film. The acting, the setting, the vibrant colors, the whole tone of J. Arthur Rank's production can hardly be improved. Based on Twain's Million Pound Note, the story occurs in London at the turn of the century. Impoverished American Gregory Peck accidentally meets a couple of eccentric millionaires who present him with the note. They've bet that mere possession of it for even one month will open all doors. Peck tries cashing the million but no one has that much gold. Instead he's offered unlimited credit, becomes the most sought after man in England, wins the love of society girl Jane Griffiths. When that bank note mysteriously disappears Peck's life shifts into reverse gear. There's gentle hilarity here, but most of the fun is in its clever running comment on human nature. Technicolor.—U.A.

LA RONDE La Ronde is a French film with English titles. Master of ceremonies Anton Wallbrook introduces a group of characters who play out a merry-go-round of love affairs. The round starts with a street girl (Simone Signoret) and ends with her. Soldier Serge Reggiani picks her up, drops her for a maid (Simone Simon), drops her, too. Simone forms an entente with her employer's son (Daniel Gelin) but be bores easily, turns to married woman Danielle Darrieux. Danielle's middle-aged husband pays court to model Odette Joyeux who loves poet Jean-Louis Barrault who's mad about actress Isa Miranda who cottens to a count (Gerard Philipe) who wanders dazed into the night and waiting arms of number one girl Signoret. The incidents are deftly told with much humor. They're spicy, suggestive but at the same time reveal how tenuous, sad and empty of fulfillment such dalliance is.—Released by Leon Brandt.

And cried, "What a smart girl am I!"

Smart girl, indeed! For what could be more tempting to the lips than the sun-ripe, sun-sweet color of fresh plums? And what more effective accent to the whole new range of Paris blues, off-pinks, charcoal and black? (Nice, too, to know that Cashmere Bouquet's Pink Plum stays pink, stays on—for hours—without re-touching!)

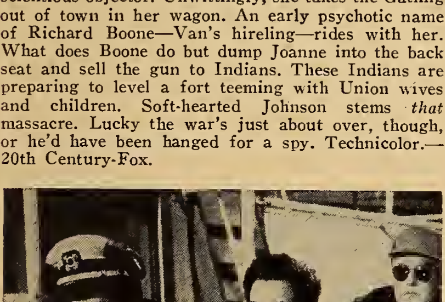
NIGHT PEOPLE Swiftly paced, fast talking, full of intrigue and strong-shouldered action, Night People is a hopped-up suspense film. When it's over you may wonder what happened but not while it's on. A young soldier (Ted Allen Avery) is kidnapped from the American sector in Germany. His father, industrialist Broderick Crawford, flies to Berlin to give orders to Colonel Gregory Peck. Peck takes orders from nobody. A woman named Hoffy (Anita Bjork) is a go-between for him and some Russians who'll give up the boy for a couple of battered, anti-Nazi, middle-aged people. This deal is considered with many midnight meetings, setbacks and surprises. The couple attempt suicide, and Crawford's determination to get back his son at any price weakens. Peck carries his assignment through to a dynamic climax, assisted by Rita Gam, Walter Abel, Buddy Ebsen, Casey Adams, CinemaScope.—20th Century-Fox.

FRENCH LINE There must be more to Jane Russell than meets the eye in French Line—but not much more. Her problem is: she's too rich. That is, in this movie she's an heiress out of Texas and nobody has the nerve to marry her. Anyway, nobody in the United States. So she sails for France. Her garrulous guardian, Arthur Hunnicutt, hires Frenchman Gilbert Roland to chaperone her, which is like hiring a wolf to tend sheep. Unknown to Roland, Jane has switched identities with model Joyce MacKenzie. But Roland isn't dumb. He falls for Jane. This makes her nervous, also enraged when he ignores her for "the heiress." Before that boat reaches Paris (where Jane's pal Mary McCarty will stage a fashion show) everything has become hopelessly complicated. But it's gay and frothy, studded with songs and girls—all more rewarding to follow than the plot. Technicolor.—RKO

THEM! Case you've ever wondered about the effects of atomic radiation here's something that ought to unset your mind. Giant ants. Maybe fifteen to twenty feet long. Everybody knows that even little, tiny ants are smart—set up colonies, conduct wars, employ slave labor and lift objects twenty times their own weight. State policemen James Whitmore and Chris Drake come upon a child (Sandy Descher) in a state of shock. Her family's trailer has been torn to shreds. A general store up the road has been torn to shreds and its owner, quite lifeless, tossed into the basement. Is a homicidal maniac on the prowl? No. Giant ants is all. Entomologists Edmund Gwenn and daughter Joan Weldon tackle the situation scientifically. With the aid of FBI man James Arness, a large part of the Army and martial law they destroy what they hope to be the last ant nest, in the drainage system of Los Angeles.—Warners

PRISONER OF WAR This is a fictional account of events whose brutality exceeds the imagination. It's concerned with American prisoners of war in Korea and is a study of methods used to wring confessions of germ warfare and the like out of them. Soldier Ronald Reagan has orders to report on camp conditions and joins a march of 700 captives. Two hundred make it to camp and are immediately ordered (by Russian Colonel Oscar Homolka) to perform setting-up exercises. They resist in a body but "every man has his breaking point," Reagan warns his buddies. Dewey Martin's comes early with the offer of food and a pocket comb and he's put in charge of his cell. Reagan seems to be won over by a natural cynicism. Others submit to horrendous tortures and die like heroes or, too broken in body and spirit, sign away their honor. Cast: Steve Forrest, Robert Horton, Paul Stewart, Darryl Hickman.—MGM.

THE SIEGE AT RED RIVER Guess there were a lot of good guys on the wrong side of the Civil War. Like Van Johnson—Georgia born. Charming? My word! He's just charmed a Union troop train out of a Gatling gun. Plans to sneak it to the Rebs in his medicine show wagon. Pinkerton detective Jeff Morrow catches on, but not fast enough. Union Nurse Joanne Dru falls for Van who claims to be a conscientious objector. Unwittingly, she takes the Gatling out of town in her wagon. An early psychotic name of Richard Boone—Van's hireling—rides with her. What does Boone do but dump Joanne into the back seat and sell the gun to Indians. These Indians are preparing to level a fort teeming with Union wives and children. Soft-hearted Johnson stems that massacre. Lucky the war's just about over, though, or he'd have been hanged for a spy. Technicolor.—20th Century-Fox.



HELL BELOW ZERO Alan Ladd flies to Capetown to beat up a crook. This accomplished, he feels much better. Good enough to sign on as first mate of a whaler headed for the Antarctic. Because Joan Tetzel is going that way to find out who killed her father, co-owner of the whaling fleet. Living co-owner, Basil Sydney, says that Dad committed suicide. So says Basil's son (Stanley Baker), who is now controlling operations. Baker has murder written all over his face, but the one man who's willing to talk catches a flying knife in his chest. Ladd panics Baker, though, and soon there's plenty of action. Ladd's boat is marooned on an icepack. Baker's boat rams it, both boats sink and everybody's left shivering in tents on the snow. But don't touch that light switch, Ladd isn't dead yet! Shots of whales being harpooned and worked over by actual factory crews are exciting. Technicolor.—Col.

Often a bridesmaid...
Never a bride

Most of the girls of her set were married . . . but not Eleanor. It was beginning to look, too, as if she never would be. True, men were attracted to her, but their interest quickly turned to indifference. Poor girl! She hadn't the remotest idea why they dropped her so quickly . . . and even her best friend wouldn't tell her.

Why risk the stigma of halitosis (bad breath) when Listerine Antiseptic stops it so easily . . . so quickly . . . and for hours on end, usually? It's the extra-careful precaution against offending, four times better than any tooth paste.

No tooth paste, of course, is antiseptic. Chlorophyll does not kill germs—but Listerine kills bacteria by millions, gives you lasting antiseptic protection against bad breath.

Listerine Clinically Proved Four Times Better Than Tooth Paste

Is it any wonder Listerine Antiseptic in recent clinical tests averaged at least four times more effective in stopping bad breath odors than the chlorophyll products or tooth pastes it was tested against? Gargle Listerine Antiseptic every morning . . . every night . . . before every date.

No Tooth Paste Kills Odor Germs Like This . . . Instantly

Listerine Antiseptic does what no tooth paste does—instantly kills bacteria, by millions—stops bad breath instantly, and usually for hours on end. Bacterial fermentation of proteins which are always present in the mouth is by far the most common cause of bad breath. Research shows that breath stays sweeter longer depending on the degree to which you reduce germs in the mouth.

DRIVE A CROOKED ROAD The only thing Mickey Rooney knows is automobiles. He works in a garage, dreams of racing in the European meets, but he might as well dream about rocketing to Mars. He's poor, homely and shy. The only woman he ever talks to is his landlady. Enter beautiful Dianne Foster. Come sun with me at Malibu, she coos, and poor Mickey's so gone it never enters his head she has ulterior motives provided by Kevin McCarthy and Jack Kelly who live high on the beach from living low at other times. They know Mickey's an expert driver. If he wanted to rob a bank in California, for instance, and make a getaway he'd hit Canada before anyone called the cops. But he doesn't want to rob a bank; they do. Come in with us for fifteen thousand dollars, they plead. Go ahead, says Dianne. The pathos of his disillusionment, the tragedy caused by his trust heighten an otherwise sordid drama.—Col.

RECOMMENDED FILMS NOW PLAYING

BEAT THE DEVIL (U.A.): This charming and sophisticated comedy involves Humphrey Bogart, Jennifer Jones, Gina Lollobrigida in a variety of hilarious situations ranging from larceny to lunacy. A fantastically funny film.

NEW FACES (20th-Fox): Eartha Kitt in Technicolor is the most fascinating thing to happen to movies since sound. Surrounded by most of the Broadway musical's original cast, including Ronny Graham, Robert Clary, she slinks her way through "Monotonous," "C'est Si Bon," "Santa Baby," other hits.

EXECUTIVE SUITE (MGM): June Allyson, Bill Holden, Fredric March, Barbara Stanwyck, Shelley Winters, Walter Pidgeon, Paul Douglas, are among the exciting people involved in the business (and love) life of a big corporation.

TOP BANANA (U-I): Phil Silvers stars in this saga of a burlesque-to-TV comedian. With good tunes, lots of girls, the movie is as funny as the Broadway show.

RHAPSODY (MGM): Liz Taylor, Vittorio Gassman and John Ericson are the passionate, bewildered people in this story of artists and love. Great music on the soundtrack. Technicolor on the screen.

THE LONG, LONG TRAILER (MGM): Lucille Ball and Desi Arnaz star in this happy, hilarious tale of honeymooners on a trailer trip. A natural for everyone who loves Lucy and her zany ways. Technicolor.

MAN IN THE ATTIC (20th-Fox): Jack Palance as Jack the Ripper—and what could make a more terrifying combination? Constance Smith is around, as scared as the audience, and Byron Palmer is there, too, to see that everything comes out all right.

RED GARTERS (Paramount): This take-off on a horse-opera has Rosemary Clooney, Guy Mitchell, Pat Crowley, Joanne Gilbert, Jack Carson, Gene Barry, Technicolor and music. You want more? Well, it's funny, too!

ACT OF LOVE (U.A.): This is the poignant story of a soldier and a girl who meet and love in a world of blackmarkets, police and war. Kirk Douglas is excellent as the G.I. who offers shelter to the frightened Lisa (Dany Robin) and tries to protect their romance in the face of impossible odds. Irwin Shaw wrote the fine script.

ADVENTURES OF AN EX-CHOIR BOY NAMED SMITH

Wherein Robert Van Orden changes his name and makes a hit.

■ Until his voice cracked, Hollywood's newest rage was a boy soprano with the Mitchell Boys' Choir. Beyond working with them in The Bells Of Saint Mary's, Robert Van Orden's only contact with movies was as a messenger boy and later as a dispatcher of messenger boys for MGM. This was fine with Bob, who at twenty-three could pay the rent and eat steak once a week.

He swears that he never thought of becoming an actor. He just happened to drop into the casting office to say hello to an old buddy. But at that precise moment actor's agent Henry Willson walked through the place for the first time in five years, spotted Van Orden and figured they could turn an honest dollar together.

Willson also figured that there were too many Vans in the entertainment business and too many Roberts. "Besides," he announced, "I am tired of being razzed for inventing such names as Rock Hudson, not to mention Tab Hunter. I swore that the next time I discovered an actor, I'd name him something as American as apple pie."

So ex-choir boy Robert Van Orden became John Smith. Everywhere he goes, people ask, "What was that name again?" But on the roster of Wayne-Fellows Productions, John Smith stands high. He's the big boy discovery of The High And The Mighty. According to Director William Wellman, "He lights up the screen like a Christmas tree." John Wayne adds, "He'll make a lot of actors move over." Terry Moore and Debbie Reynolds, his recent dates, don't say a thing. They just whistle.

TV TALK

Art Carney off-screen . . . Arthur Godfrey has another mad on . . . Wally Cox won't go West . . . the Bairds adopt a boy.

Silversmith Cox

All the people who think Wally Cox is as shy as Mr. Peepers don't know the whole story. Cox, in private life, may be quiet, but he can be very firm. When he puts his foot down, it stays down and NBC knows it. When the network tried to move his show from New York to California, Wally didn't yell or even raise his voice. He just said no, in his soft voice, and NBC gave up. They knew he meant it. Wally never has liked Hollywood; in fact, he actively dislikes it. When he signed with NBC, there were many clauses in his contract that were more to the network's benefit than to Wally's. But he did make sure of one thing: one clause read that he didn't have to go to California, ever, if he didn't want to. And he doesn't want to. (He agreed to a two-week visit a few months back, but he didn't change his mind while he was there.) NBC could move the show to Hollywood if they wanted to, but they wouldn't have Wally Cox if they did. And what would Mr. Peepers be without him? Nothing. And they know it. One clause in his contract that Wally couldn't fix up was the salary. He's making much less than many stars of his caliber, and there's nothing he can do about it—except do some more work. That's why he's been showing up on so many panel programs. He wants the money. He also loves 'em because they're so little work—and because he thinks he's good on them. Lots of viewers have the impression that Wally doesn't care about public acclaim. But he does. He has his friends watch his performances, and he's almost childlike about their praise. He was absolutely elated when they told him he was terrific on What's My Line? His current ambition, in fact, is to be on a panel show every week. Outside of his concern with money matters (which amuses him when he stops to think how broke he used to be) Wally is the same person he was before he went into show business. He still stays at home and makes things out of silver. He hasn't forgotten one thing about being a silversmith (which is what he started out to be). He's even been known to pay $25 for a silver belt buckle and then reshape it to the size he wants! . . . Everyone thinks Sloan Simpson is a petite lady. She isn't. She's very tall, not at all as thin as she photographs. And her voice is much deeper than it is on radio or TV . . . The rift in the Walter Cronkite household seems to be patched up. Mrs. C. and the two little girls moved from their house in Washington to an apartment in New York right after Walter started working on The Morning Show . . . Bil and Cora Baird, whose puppets are as amusing at seven A.M. as J. Fred Muggs is, have adopted a little boy. And, as is often the case, he looks just like his new father! The Bairds are ecstatic, they're so happy to have a child at last; and little Pete couldn't have a home more full of fun. The Bairds have some 1,000 puppets! Pete's favorite so far: one made in the image of the late mayor of New York City, Fiorello LaGuardia. Pete says good night to him every night. Nobody has to guess who's going to be the most popular boy in the neighborhood when Pete gets a little older! All the kids will want to play at Pete's house . . . Art Carney may be funny on the Jackie Gleason Show, but in person he's so quiet you hardly know he's there, let alone know he's a comedian. He doesn't particularly like to be interviewed because the whole procedure bores him (lots of celebrities would say "Ditto" to that sentiment) and he's likely to clam up almost completely. He seldom drinks because he's not a good drinker, so liquor can't be used to warm him up. A very serious-minded fellow, Art is strictly a family man with three children who wants to further his career. He's not one for the gay party life that comes with TV success. You'd have a hard time finding him at Shor's or Lindy's

WHO'S YOUR LITTLE HOOSIER?

Introducing Herb Shriner who's introducing two new Shriners—identical twin boys!

SLEEPY HERB examines milk for twins' 2 A.M. feeding. Their bottles are labeled "A" and "B" but even Herb can't tell the twins apart!

BORED HERB waits for milk to heat while feeding is delayed. Shriners don't own a double-barreled warmer so bottles are heated singly.

CONFUSED HERB can tell cribs apart "but if anyone switches the twins, I'm a goner!" Even harder is simultaneous double burping!

BEAMING HERB holds Kin (named for comedian Kin Hubbard) and Will (for Will Rogers) while wife Pixie takes charge of daughter Indie.

■ The Herb Shriners' twins have already provided Herb with considerable humorous material for his popular CBS television and radio show, Two For The Money. Shortly after the twins birth, he told his audience, "When the doctor first brought out the two babies at the hospital, I thought he was just giving me a choice."

In addition to being one of the top stars of television, the sponsor of the International Motor Sports Show, and a smart business man, Herb is a most prodigious putterer. He is a model car fancier, an amateur photographer, a recording equipment bug, and most recently, a sailing enthusiast.

Someone once said that the secret of Herb Shriner's success as our best folk humorist was that he always looked like he needed a haircut. Around his own house, he's as relaxed as an Indiana wheat farmer at a family picnic. Off the air, he wears casual clothes, and admits that he hasn't bought a new suit for two years. "Pixie says if I don't get some more clothes, she won't go out with me. But now that we have the twins, I don't suppose we'll be getting out much anyway."

(Herb can also been seen in MGM's Main Street To Broadway.)

A MODERN SCREEN EXCLUSIVE:

Susan Hayward's Story

The headlines told only half the story. Here is the actual testimony of Susan, Jess—and the surprise third witness!

BY ALICE FINLETTER

■ Through the confusing examination and cross-examination, through the cold ritual of the courts, a clear picture of Susan Hayward and Jess Barker's marriage and unhappy separation unfolded. This was a typical Hollywood plot—the romance of Jess, a promising young star, and Susan, an obscure leading lady of the B-pictures —except for one ironic twist of fate. Barker was dubious about a marriage that might hamper his career, but Susan, (Continued on page 87)

the FACE is FAMILIAR

AND SO IS THE FIGURE. BUT THIS IS A LANA NO ONE HAS MET TILL NOW—HAPPY, HOMEY AND BRUNETTE!

■ The name of this brown-haired doll is Julia Jean Mildred Frances Turner Shaw Crane Topping Barker. You know her better as a blonde and by a briefer handle—Lana Turner. In other ways, too, you wouldn't recognize your Lana now.

Veteran of the Hollywood bistro belt for seventeen gay and gaudy years, Lana is seldom seen in her old haunts any more. And when she does make an occasional appearance, people say, "That's Lana Turner?"

It's the hair. The blondeness of yore has been replaced by dark brown. It is the most controversial head of hair since Veronica Lake took half an idea from an English sheep dog and dangled her tresses over one eye.

Some people like Lana's brown hair. Partisans include an important gent named Lex Barker, who heretofore has been expert in such matters as swinging from tree to tree and emitting loud jungle calls.

Some people hate the brown hair. These include Louella O. Parsons, who called it "mousy." This annoyed Lana. She exclaimed, "Call it unattractive. Call it ridiculous. But not mousy!"

Actually, Lana has changed in more ways than her hair color. Friends have remarked that she returned from Europe much happier than they had ever seen her. Once the queen of the night life, she now seems content to spend her time at home with her new husband and her daughter Cheryl.

"I never thought I could ever call Lana serene," says an intimate. "But she actually has a serenity about her that I've never seen before. (Continued on page 75)

Despite Lana's obvious pride in her husband, some spiteful gossips insist that Lex is living on his wife's income, is too muscular to be talented! Newly serene Lana ignores digs, but furious Lex accepted U-I contract to prove himself an actor.

Joan Benny Baker and husband Seth cut first slice of 200-pound wedding cake for Jack. Joan's imported gown cost $2500; wedding cost $50,000.

WHO'S GOT THE MONEY?

by Richard Moore

THE STARS AT NIGHT ARE BIG AND

■ It's been nearly a decade since Hollywood has seen a wedding as lavish as the Joan Benny-Seth Baker ceremony and reception last March 9. It cost Mary Livingstone and Jack Benny about $50,000 to marry off their adopted daughter. The wedding dress required a trip to Paris by designer Don Loper—to supervise the handweaving of the white satin brocaded in a lily of the valley pattern. It took thirty-five yards of it to make the skirt and seventeen more for the train. It took Joan Benny's lavish wedding symbolized the immense wealth Jack's careful saving, wise investment have produced.

Bob Hope, Ann Sothern congratulated Jack and wife Mary Livingstone. Extent of Bob's assets is unknown; top-bracket money-maker, he may be a millionaire or—like many stars—one jump ahead of the sheriff.

Jimmy and Gloria Stewart attended the reception in the Crystal Room of the Beverly Hills Hotel. Working on a percentage-of-the-film deal, Jimmy makes far more than stars on a regular salary can hope to earn.

Bob Taylor joined Sue and Alan Ladd, later met Barbara Stanwyck. Bob is in the who-knows-how-much class, but the Ladds are definitely solid. Alan's percentage deal with Warners is best ever offered any star.

Tyrone Power and Linda Christian were among stars in the biggest assembly of notables since the Temple-Agar marriage. The Powers live high, own expensive foreign cars, fill their home with paintings, statuary.

BRIGHT, BUT DEEP IN THE HEART OF DEBT. IN HOLLYWOOD ALL WHO GLITTER VERY SELDOM HAVE GOLD.

$2500, in fact, to buy this wedding dress.

Other expenses: 200-pound wedding cake, vintage champagne (1945) for 600 guests, five buffet tables loaded with delicacies, the Crystal Room of the Beverly Hills Hotel, white lilacs flown from Holland to California, and the services of twelve uniformed policemen and four plainclothesmen for protecting the jewelry of the guests.

All very fancy, but not outlandish for the beloved only daughter of a famous show business couple. Certainly, the Bennys don't feel that they've spent an excessive amount. But there's been nothing like it since Shirley Temple married John Agar.

The reason for that is not far to seek. Who, in Hollywood, has enough money to toss off such a party? The stars? Well, a few of them, for sure. Jack Benny, to dispense with his professional formula for a moment, is a generous man, but loaded, nonetheless. Benny, indeed, may have a few of Hollywood's scattered millions.

Who is the richest star in Hollywood? Nobody outside the inner sanctum of the Department of Internal Revenue really knows, but according to the Sunset Strip grapevine, it may very well be Jimmy Stewart. During the past few years, Stewart has been leading the way in a new kind of jackpot: sharing his picture's profits. Instead of getting a salary on his current films, Stewart is part owner of the picture and conservative (Continued on page 78)

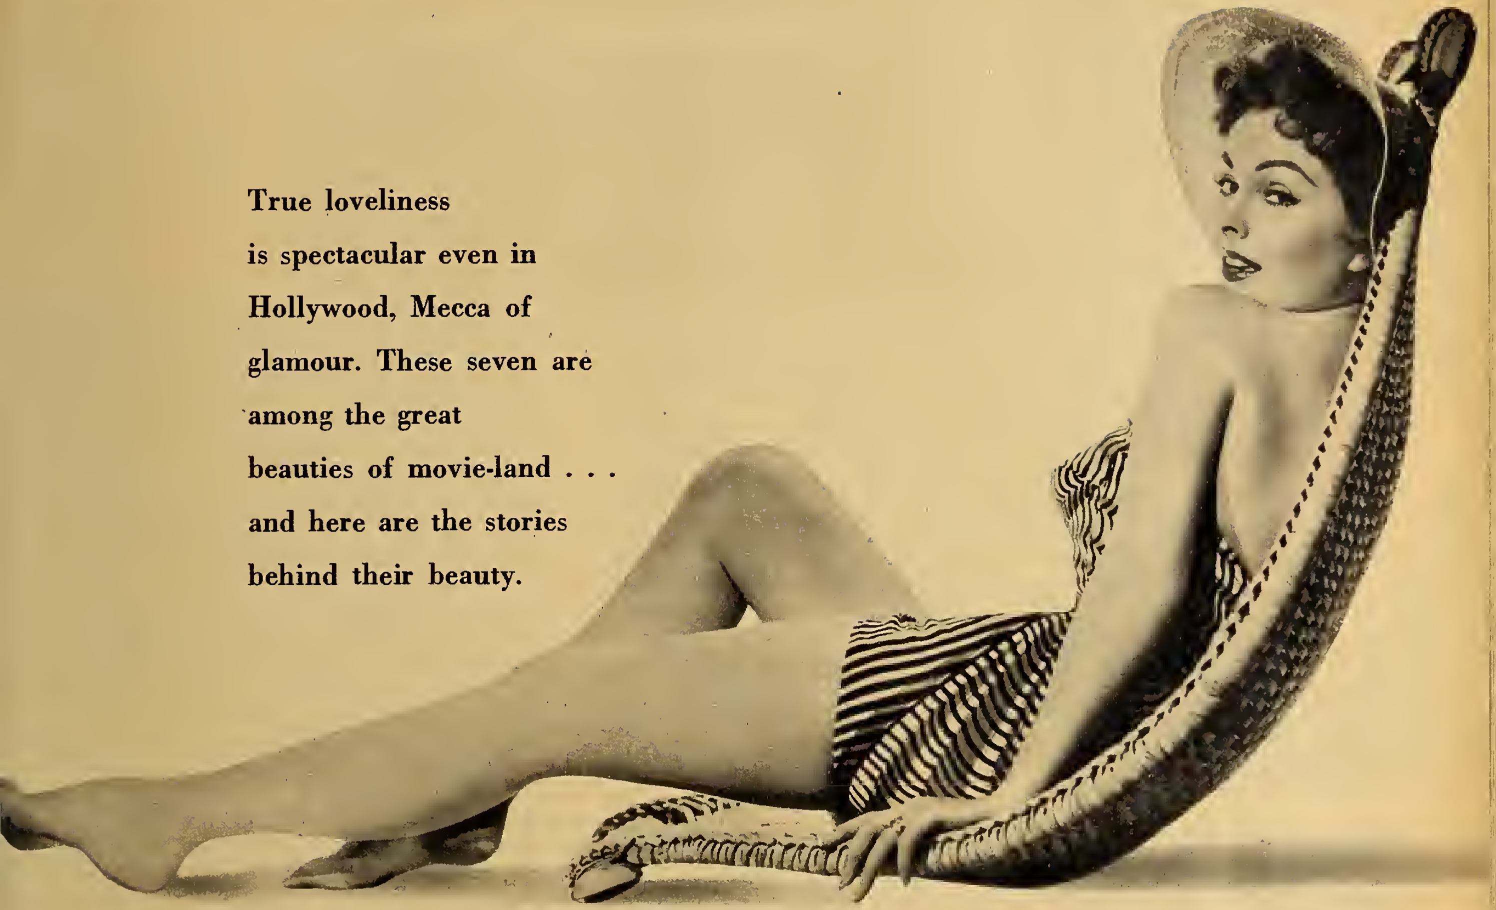
Once painfully shy, Ava Gardner (left) went unnoticed until she began to feel—and act—beautiful; Jeanne Crain (right) was considered "sweet" until she dropped her little-girl air and turned glamorous.

True loveliness is spectacular even in Hollywood, Mecca of glamour. These seven are among the great beauties of movie-land . . . and here are the stories behind their beauty.



Modern Screen's BEAUTY FAIR

■ An astute Hollywood observer recently remarked, "Really beautiful people are beautiful all over. Not just their faces and their bodies. Look at their hands, their feet, the way their heads are shaped and the way they move." Truer words were never spoken of these girls who grace MODERN SCREEN's Beauty Fair, chosen by our editors and readers as models of real loveliness. They are beautiful all over—in different ways.

Some are simply born to that desirable state of being and never have to lift a finger to remain there. Like Grace Kelly. She was born of a lovely mother; her father and her brother, millionaire John Kelly and Scull Champion Jack Kelly, Jr., could run away with a contest for the most handsome father-and-son team. How could the girl miss? She started from scratch with the pulchritude, and all she has had to do to enhance its ethereal quality is to be herself—tranquil, fastidious, elegant. "She's all of that," said a dazzled swain. "And she projects more zing than a dozen more obvious women put together!"

why Duke likes them

John Wayne's on the brink of his third marriage. After all, if you can't succeed with a Mexican, try, try a Peruvian!

BY IMOGENE COLLINS

■ Several months ago when John Wayne was fighting his bitter divorce battle, the courtroom audience was fascinated by his wife Chata.

They looked at this expensively dressed young Mexican woman's flushed complexion and broad features. They watched as she gradually became completely flustered and badgered and devoid of poise.

They listened to her on the witness stand, her voice hoarse and at times inaudible. And they turned to each other and mildly incredulous, they all asked one question:

"How come he married her?"

At the time this was the question Duke Wayne was asking himself. He had no answer. Not then, anyway.

When the vitriol and acrimony raised by the mud-slinging had died down, he said kindly, "I know it sounds as if Chata and I did nothing but fight during our marriage. But that's not true.

"In the beginning it was warm and wonderful and we had a lot of fun. She was pretty and regular and understanding. I expected it would get better but things just didn't work out."

Duke had used almost the same explanation in 1944 when he was divorced from Josephine Saenz, his first wife and the mother of his four children. Like Chata, Josephine was of Mexican descent.

Having struck out twice with imports from the Latin American league, one might expect that Duke would now try to change his luck.

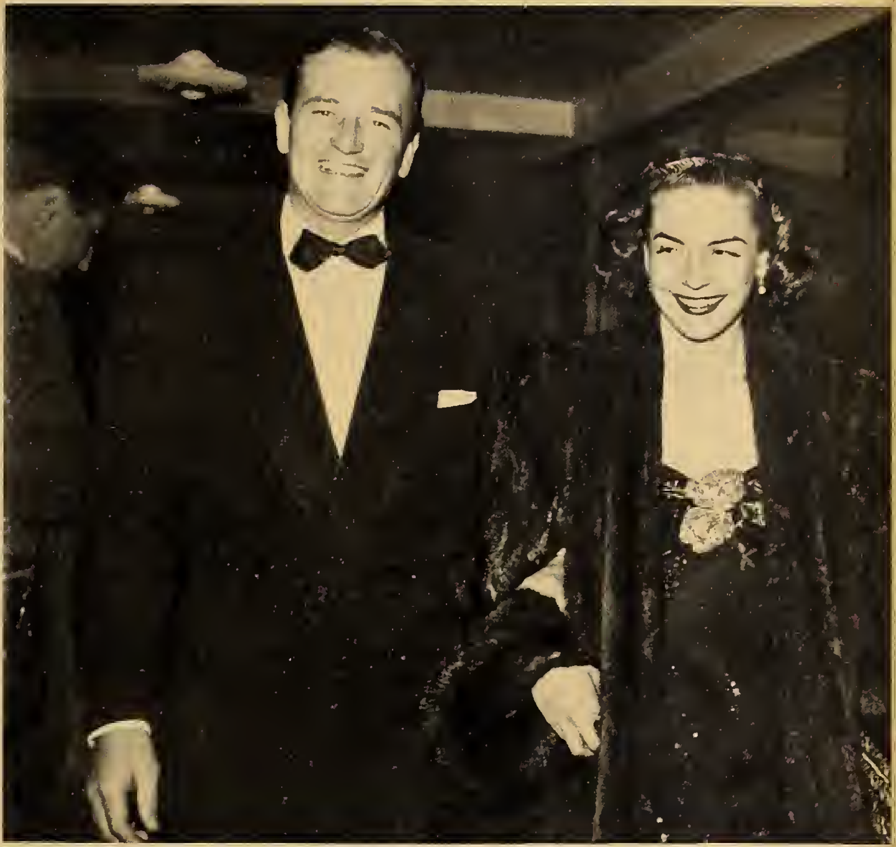
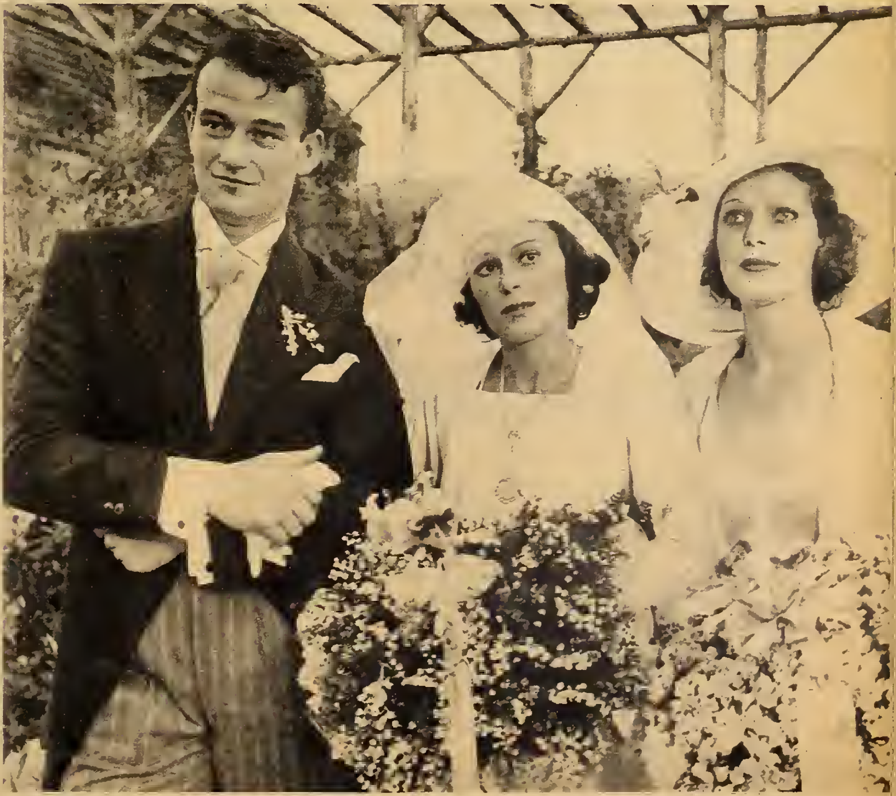
Gay Nineties party, gave their approval.



Happy for a while with Mexican Chata, John claimed that Latin women have a strong feeling for home-life. At their tempestuous divorce, however, he accused home-loving Chata of too much gambling, too much drinking and entertaining other men in his house.



John married his first wife, Josephine Saenz, at the home of bridesmaid Loretta Young. Partly Mexican, Josephine had a Central-American background; her father had been a consul for Panama. The marriage lasted ten years, left the Duke broken-hearted.

Nobody's Baby Now!

By Jack Wade

DON'T GET THE NEW PIER WRONG; SHE DOESN'T EXACTLY WANT TO BE NAUGHTY! BUT SHE'S 21 NOW AND IT'S TIME THE BOYS STOPPED TREATING HER LIKE SOMEBODY'S LITTLE SISTER!

A new wardrobe was Pier's first declaration of independence; she replaced flat sandals with European high heels, bought tight black dresses to supplement her beloved (but now more sophisticated) full skirts, and went on a shopping spree with twin-sister Maria (above) to celebrate their twenty-first joint birthday.

Pier and Maria stopped at Westwood Village's famous House of Candles, bought several for the modern, newly-decorated California ranch house in Brentwood Pier bought last year.

Handling her own money for the first time, Pier bought a sky-blue Cadillac, promptly dented the fender. Other firsts since her birthday include a key to her door, unchaperoned dates.

■ A few weeks ago, a sleek study in Parisian haute couture swept through the noisy, noontime tables of MGM's vast studio commissary with the poised, provocative gait of a mannequin. She sported a striking leopard skin coat and a rakish hat to match, beneath which a tight black dress hugged fascinating curves. The heels that clicked the big room to attention were thin as pencils, almost as high and studded with rhinestones. Beneath a severely adult coiffure gold earrings dangled, and massed gold bracelets clicked on her gloved wrists. She wafted a tantalizing scent called Femme, which, of course, means "Woman." Undeniably chic, soignée, even ravissante, this continental siren looked as if she had just stepped off the Champs Elysées, which indeed, only a few days before, she had.

One of Hollywood's happiest pairs are Glenn and Ellie.

LIKE FATHER, LIKE SON

Pete is more than a son to Glenn Ford. With every wacky escapade, Pete becomes more and more a mirror of Glenn's own hectic, happy youth.

BY KIRTLEY BASKETTE

■ A terrifying object swooshed suddenly into the velvet sky over Beverly Hills, spitting blue flame and hissing ominously. Briefly but gloriously it dipped, darted and corkscrewed crazily around the roofs and gables of mansions belonging to such eminent citizens as the Fred Astaires, David Selznicks, William Wylers and James Masons. Then it clanked to burnt-out oblivion.

Windows had lighted up like Christmas trees in this select residential section. Doors flew open and telephones jangled, as one private number dialed another. What was it—a flying saucer? Had push-button war begun? Neighbors in bathrobes chattered like squirrels and peered into the heavens.

One calm householder merely yawned and kept his eyes on his TV set. "It's nothing to get worked up about," he reasoned. "Just that Ford kid down the street."

"Which one?" his wife asked him.

It was a legitimate question. Down the line in a big brick house a couple of Fords are growing to look and act like each other more and more every day. At that tense moment the pair of them, a husky nine-year-old called Pete and a tall thirty-six-year-old called Glenn, stood rooted in the darkness of their backyard, staring at each other with expressions compounded of rapture, fear, wonder and guilt.

"Dad," exclaimed the one named Pete. "It worked!"

"Yeah," admitted Glenn a little shakily, "it sure did. Come on," he suggested, "let's duck into the house before the cops come. I thought you wanted that cigar can and the old movie film for a stink bomb."

"Well," explained his son, "it's like this: you cram the film into the can, poke a big hole in the top, light it and it's a stink bomb. But if you put little holes in the bottom, stick in a fuse, put on fins and rig up a couple of boards to launch it—then it's a space rocket."

Pete and pal pause respectfully for Glenn's advice on bike trouble. Glenn admits that his words of wisdom have occasionally backfired—as when he told Pete never to fight with a boy who wasn't bigger than himself!

Apple of his father's eye, adventuresome Pete is no "movie star's child," spends his days collecting bugs and making rockets with adventuresome dad.

Although Pete's first Christmas present was an electric train, Glenn was shocked to find that he had never been on a real one, arranged for the family to accompany him by train and boat to Brazil.

It is sometimes frightening to be a hero to a small boy, Glenn finds, realizing that he must weigh his words carefully. Pete accepts everything his father says as gospel, but is not above glamorizing his own experiences for friends.

a date with Eddie

Most stars on a first date with a dream like Mala Powers head for Mocambo and the wee hours of the morn. But Eddie Fisher had enough of nightclubs and night life on his last trip to the coast—so this time he and Mala started out at noon to explore the other Hollywood!

Introduced by a mutual friend, Eddie and Mala began their first date on the famous corner of Sunset and Vine near NBC where Eddie had been rehearsing his TV show.

First stop was at Stan's Drive In, TV and radio stars' hangout. "Those page boys," Mala said, "will probably end up vice presidents." "Good," said Eddie. "I'll hang around and maybe wind up as a page boy!"

At famous Farmers' Market they sampled several of the 37 varieties of fruit juice at one stand. "I feel sort of guilty," Eddie remarked, "drinking anything but a Coke."

Next they paused for fried fish and potatoes. "Talk about your rustic atmosphere," Eddie said, ordering the food, "I'd like to come out here and rub it in my hair for a few years!"

Enjoying his second trip much more than his first, Eddie said he'd like to telecast some of his TV shows from Hollywood, had been conferring all that morning with "the guys in scriptville" (his term) about it.

Equipped with ice cream cones Eddie and Mala headed for the hills, took in churches, mansions, and Mandeville Canyon to complete their tour of the other Hollywood.

What she doesn't have—she doesn't need

AN INTIMATE PORTRAIT OF THE YEAR'S LOVELIEST STAR, ACADEMY AWARD WINNER AUDREY HEPBURN!

■ You probably don't remember about Audrey Hepburn, at fifteen. How this thin, fragile, sensitive child victim of World War II, was reduced to eating weeds and grass from the fields of Holland.

I'd forgotten it—and I feel I know her pretty well—but Mel Ferrer, her leading man on the stage (and in real life, too, at the moment!), reminded me of it the other day.

That's why Audrey's been in precarious health lately.

"People all around her were dying of starvation," Ferrer told me. "Her ankles were filling up with water.

"There was no meat to eat. And no salt. And her serious condition was spreading. Her whole constitution was undermined.

"Now," continued Ferrer, "she eats good food, and all the meat she was supposed to have eaten back in those years. But her blood pressure is away down. Everything for her is a big effort.

"That is why," he added, "she doesn't have the strength to go out a lot socially, and do a lot of interviews.

"It makes life difficult for her," Ferrer said, "because she, like Garbo and Helen Hayes, is an actress who—I don't want to sound corny—feels she must give of herself to the audience."

And so that is the fight that the twenty-four-year-old Miss Hepburn is making today: to regain her health so she can give to her audiences.

But it is only half the fight. For Audrey, sitting in her dressingroom at the theatre where she stars in Ondine with Ferrer, plainly told me of another battle.

"I have to prove to everybody that I am not a fluke," she said.

"A fluke!" I exclaimed.

She who had just won the Academy Award for Roman Holiday and who was acclaimed as almost no actress ever (Continued on page 94)

HIS PALS DON'T LAUGH AT LEWIS

What's

■ A tide of resentment is mounting against Jerry Lewis.

Any mention of the great clown's name used to arouse only smiles, laughter and happy memories of comic pandemonium. Now it also brings expressions of regret, puzzled head-shaking and grimaces of disillusionment.

The general opinion is that Jerry is beginning to resemble the cock who thought the sun had risen to hear him crow. His large circle of Hollywood friends is getting smaller.

Janet Leigh and Tony Curtis no longer make those riotous home movies with Jerry and his wife Patti. Mona Freeman, once a confidante, now blithely goes her own way.

Simmons and Lear, his writers, are objects of his annoyance. Although he is compelled by contract to pay them, he neither talks to them nor uses any of their material.

Jerry strongly dislikes Bob Hope. Bob doesn't like Jerry, either.

Although Hal Wallis rescued Jerry from an unprofitable contract, Jerry's behavior now borders on loud-mouthed hatred.

Formerly content to let "Jer" hold the spotlight, Dean is now reported to be sulky about it. Wife Jeanne has long avoided Lewises socially.

happening to Jerry?

Worse yet, there are signs of family warfare in the Martin and Lewis camp.

While the comedians were in Phoenix on location for The Big Top a national magazine was shooting a picture spread on Jerry. Apparently chagrined that he had been overlooked, Dean simply disappeared from the set, holding up production of the picture.

It had been no secret, of course, that Jerry's wife Patti and Dean's wife Jeanne avoid each other socially. Now it looks as though their resentment is spreading to the boys.

Until lately, Dean has always seemed to be content to play golf, relax, enjoy himself—and leave professional problems and decisions to "Jer." Now he's taking an interest.

He, too, could be suffering from a little head expansion. A few weeks ago a Hollywood composer dropped by Dean's house. He had a new tune he thought would be just right for Dean. This composer has written almost as many hits as Irving Berlin and he doesn't need Dean Martin to sing his numbers. But he's thoughtful and naturally he expected Dean to appreciate his gesture.

When Dean was told that the composer was downstairs he turned to Killer Gray, his aide-de-camp, and said, "Can't see him now. Let him leave the sheet music."

When the composer got the message, he grabbed the sheet music out of Killer's hand.

"Tell him for me that if he doesn't have the courtesy to come down and say hello—" his speech began.

Still, Martin has not offended by untoward behavior nearly so much as Lewis. Not long ago, Lewis, accompanied by his gang stalked into the Paramount commissary. As usual, Jerry began to shout and cavort. A veteran studio employee was entertaining a guest. He leaned over and said politely, "How about taking it easy? We can't hear ourselves talk."

"Look," snapped Jerry, "if it weren't for me and my partner you wouldn't be working here. We're keeping things going."

There are similar stories emanating from the wardrobe, publicity and script departments—all showing (Continued on page 83)

Unhappy with latest scripts, Dean and Jerry would like to leave Hal Wallis. Both boys are in debt to Paramount as well as Uncle Sam, but some say money troubles are not the only cause of Jerry's bad temper.

Once Jerry's closest friends, Tony and Janet Curtis are now rumored to be feuding with the Lewises, no longer take part in their home movies. Stories started when families held separate parties, didn't invite each other.

■ There is an idea in some quarters that Kathryn Grayson, however eminent and undeniable her status as a star, does not, away from the soundtrack, produce the sort of chitchat that sends the troops storming into battle without their Vitamin C.

While Miss Moore, for example, dwells on the virtues of donning ermine bathing suits and Mrs. Di Maggio on those of staying clear of undergarments, Miss Grayson is wont to ponder how tough it is for a girl to shift from second into high in the middle of "The Bell Song."

Miss Hayward and Mr. Chandler are maybe thisaway, Ava and Frankie that—Miss Grayson is positively at home with a good book and a very, very good five-year-old daughter named Patti Kate.

This is the stuff that soups up circulation and stands the beauty parlor on its collective ear? No. Not this year.

"It's a shame," said Miss Grayson not long ago, "but it's sort of late to back down. My life and my career have been—what were the words you used? Dignified? Decorous? And just a little dull. Well, I can't apologize for it. I've wanted it that way. But have you ever found me dishonest or evasive in an interview? I've always answered what was asked (Continued on page 91)

Protesting, "I am not stuffy!" the usually staid Miss Grayson whipped off her skirt and did kicks with the chorus line for her last show at Las Vegas' swank Sahara Hotel. Delighted crowds had expected opera!

how TONY and JANET saved their LOVE

There's nothing new under the sun—except, perhaps, the Curtises, who left Hollywood on the point of collapse and came home on top of the world!

■ It was Janet who was supposed to be badly in need of a rest but it was Tony who kept dropping off into short naps after they got to Palm Springs.

"See? Him's tired, too," said Janet when she came out of their room at the Racquet Club in her new gold bathing suit and found Tony lying on his tummy with eyes closed at the edge of the pool.

"Cut out the baby talk," said Tony, still with eyes shut. "I bet you put on the gold suit even though I told you I liked the blue job best. Why? Must a wife keep her husband guessing even after they have been married three years?"

"She must," replied Janet, sitting down right in the middle of his back. She pulled at his ears, filled her bathing cap with water and poured it over his head, and said "Nope!" when he told her to quit. Suddenly Tony rolled over, pulled Janet to him in a short hug, and in the same moment practically gave her a shove toward the pool. She screamed, tried to catch her balance and couldn't make it. There was a splash. When someone came up and asked what was wrong Tony replied, "I never did care for that girl." Janet was already swimming the length of the pool in a beautifully smooth crawl and his eyes were following her with obvious admiration.

For more than a year Tony and Janet had been trying to get a few weeks off for a vacation; last spring they finally made it—or at least ten days of it—down to Palm Springs after they finished their second co-starring picture, The Black Shield Of Falworth. Janet was pounds under her normal weight and Tony was really worried about her. Janet admits he had reason. (Continued on page 55)

Unable to sit still, Janet relaxed by playing tennis with Charlie Farrell, owner of Palm Springs' luxurious Racquet Club, where the Curtises stayed during their vacation. Farrell is best known as Gale Storm's doting father on the TV show, My Little Margie.

Never without his paints, Tony did a portrait of screen writer Ed Trzcinski. He also found time to work on a year-old unfinished study of his wife. Later he gave Janet chess lessons, using the huge outdoor game played on squares of different-colored grass.

Underweight and exhausted when they left Hollywood, Janet got back to normal with the aid of massage. Despite tension of their hectic way of life, neither she nor Tony really wants to settle down; they feel young actors shouldn't be "stable—like bankers!"

"Is him tired?" Janet cooed, ignored Tony's order to stop talking baby talk and let a weary working man rest. Instead she pulled his hair.

A little nonsense now and then is relished by the best of men—unless they're sleepy!

Filling her cap with water, she doused Tony, barely got the cap on again before he shoved her into the pool—then penitently dried her off.

(Continued from page 53) "I was on the verge of vanishing into thin air," she confessed. "It's true, though I don't want to be hysterical about it, that I was near collapse when we climbed into our blue Cadillac convertible—please forgive me; we haven't had it long and I sound like I'm bragging but we're both so crazy about it!—and rolled down to Palm Springs.

"I've heard people snickering when they hear of overworked actresses. The usual reaction is: Well, now, isn't that too bad? The poor girl only has to work about forty weeks out of the year, has hairdressers, make-up artists, servants at home, a doting husband, gets paid scrambled thousands of dollars a year and then tries to talk herself into believing she is about to fall over from nervous exhaustion!

"And maybe they're right, but I don't think so. Tony and I have gone from one picture into another. We don't think we're great thespians, but on the other hand we work at it; we must memorize pages and pages of dialogue and we must do dozens of things we've never done before—and do them convincingly. For my pictures I've had to learn how to milk a cow, drive a team of horses, run an old-fashioned sewing machine, toe dance, tap dance, ballet dance, ride western, ride English, ride sidesaddle, ride bareback, handle parachutes, train lions—and I'm expected to look like an expert at it! Tony has had even tougher assignments than mine. Is it so hard to believe that after steady weeks, months, and yes, even years of this, you could get a bit weary?"

So they swam and took the sun and lazed around. Tony had a chance to catch up on his painting, even to try to finish a study of Janet he had started more than a year before in Colorado. (Continued on page 100)

Little Theatre enthusiasts, Tony and Janet attended the Palm Springs Playhouse production of Affairs Of State. They are now considering some legitimate theatre work for themselves.

Backstage with the cast, the Curtises talked shop, admitted that though they enjoy co-starring they don't want to be considered a permanent acting team, think it might limit them.

Like many very active people, Janet normally eats high-protein food and has to be urged to eat the starches and sweets she needs for additional poundage. Tony needs no such coaxing to eat.

THE LITTLE LESSONS

■ When I was three weeks old my father carried me to church on a pillow and, as I grew up, even before I attended Sunday School, I was hearing the stories of the Bible from my mother. Through childhood and teenhood the relationship of my parents to me was close and reflected their confidence in me, as well as their love. When I required not only their permission, but their trust in me, it was freely given. In this sort of home faith holds up the roof, faith supplies the table, faith guards and plans and heals. I am a very lucky girl that I had and still have that kind of home.

If anyone were to ask me whether I am a regular churchgoer I would have to say no. With the (Continued on page 62)

Jane Powell was first to blurt out the truth. "Pier Angeli!" she gasped. "It's you! Why, you're suddenly all grown up!"

Pier curved her stop-light red lipstick in a pleased smile that flashed like a baby spot. "Ooo-la-la!" she exclaimed in her best continental manner. "And is that such a surprise?"

Pier Angeli knew darned well it was—but of course that was the big idea. At home, working with the products of a European shopping spree, she had plotted her eye-opening entrance. It was Pier's way of announcing that, since she left Hollywood eight months before for Europe, there had been some important changes made.

Last May, Pier flew off to London to make Flame And The Flesh. She departed a girl and she returned a woman. What happened in between was not exactly sensational, or wouldn't seem so to most American girls. But to Pier Angeli it was the Emancipation Proclamation.

It was at Boreham Woods, MGM's English studio, that the petite Italian miss inquired hesitantly, her big green eyes on Producer Joe Pasternak, "Do you suppose I could get off work tomorrow?"

"What's the matter?" asked Joe. "Are you sick?"

"No," Pier assured him. "But tomorrow's my birthday—my twenty-first birthday."

Pasternak summoned his most severe executive frown. "I'm afraid that's impossible," he said shortly. "Sorry."

Pier nodded, disappointed, and went to her Savoy Hotel room. She had dinner with her mama as usual and climbed into bed thinking that people just didn't understand. But she was wrong.

NEXT MORNING, when she reported for make-up, lettered across the mirror beside a lipstick caricature of herself was, "CONGRATULATIONS, PIER. WE LOVE YOU." When she stepped out an orchestra greeted her with "Happy Birthday." Lana Turner dumped red roses in her arms, Carlos Thompson presented her with a book of prints, the crew gave her a silver dressing set, Joe Pasternak gave her a gold medallion for her charm bracelet and everybody kissed her. She didn't work much that day, after all.

All this was thrilling and Pier Angeli appreciated it. But none of those tributes or trinkets compared with the one she received that night. Carefully dolled-up in a sophisticated white and silver evening gown with a flower in her upswept hair, Pier was expectant and ready for a knock on the door. A fellow named Kirk Douglas opened it with orchids in his arm, ready to take her for a whirl on the town—and for the first time in Pier's life—alone. As the pair set out, Enrica Pierangeli pressed something into her daughter's palm, not without tears. It was the key to her room, and the greatest, most beautiful gift Pier Angeli had received in all her life. Too big for her tiny evening bag, she kept it pressed in her palm all evening, even when dancing at Les Ambassadeurs. And when she came home in the small hours, she used it with a particular sense of pride.

Now, a twenty-first birthday is pretty important to almost any girl. It's the day she's officially grown up, can vote, sign legal contracts, marry without parental consent and fry in the electric chair if she happens to murder someone. All these privileges accrued to Pier Angeli last June 19, but none to her was as important as another: the right to act her age and lead her own private life. Nobody was hungrier for this right than Pier Angeli, nobody had ever suppressed it with greater success, but nobody grabbed it more eagerly when it arrived.

After Flame And The Flesh (in which she battles Lana Turner for the love of handsome Argentine Carlos Thompson for the most adult role of her career so far) Pier zoomed south on her first jet plane ride to Ischia where her family had taken a villa. She sunned herself, bathed in the surf, rested and met Kirk Douglas in Rome for a Roman holiday. Then she hopped to Paris by herself to make Mademoiselle Nitouche with the French star, Fernandel.

Pier had never seen Paris before. Her producer, Raymond Hakim, met her at the plane, presented her with the appropriate "Femme" perfume, drove her to the Georges Cinq Hotel and asked her to dinner. But Pier declined. She was tired, she said, but actually she had to savor this thrill all by herself—the first room she had ever had to herself in the first hotel where she'd ever registered by herself in the most romantic and beautiful city in the world; the only city she'd ever visited alone.

PIER WILL NEVER forget Paris. She worked—five hours a day speaking French lines into a recorder and playing it back until it was perfect, because since her school days she'd never used the language. She acted in Mademoiselle Nitouche from ten o'clock in the morning often until ten at night. There was time to see the sights with another gentleman a good many years her senior, but very charming indeed—Jean Pierre Aumont. And so there were the sidewalk cafés, the restaurants of haute cuisine, the opera, the theatre and the late nightclubs such as La Tour D'Argent and Cheherazaz. And another new thrill: for the first time in her life Pier walked boldly into the smart shops along the Rue de la Paix and picked out what she wanted, not what her mother chose for her.

Pier was having such a ball, solo at last, that when Mrs. Pierangeli flew up with Pier's sisters for Christmas, and asked, "Did you miss me?" Pier replied, "Of course, but I've been having a wonderful time."

"You shouldn't say that," he mother reproved tearfully. "You don't love me."

"I do love you," she assured her mother with an embrace, "but for the first time I've been on my own and it's wonderful. I should do this more often." From now on it looks as though she will.

To hardened sophisticates, this mild continental spree might not sound like such a much. But although Pier Angeli was raised in Italy and had returned to Europe three times previously, her trip to Paris was epochal. This time it was her own party. For once, the decisions were Pier's—not Mama's. A lot of people who have known Pier since she arrived in Hollywood think it was high time, too.

It was only four years ago that Anna Maria Pierangeli got her first excited look at America. Stopping in New York on her way to Hollywood, she strode through the lobby of the sedate Plaza Hotel convinced that she was the glass of fashion and the mould of form.

Encasing her dainty ankles were festooned cowboy boots and over her slim legs flapping chaps. She wore a powder blue darted shirt, flame red scarf and a black sombrero. At her thighs swung studded holsters out of which pearl-handled six-guns poked. Behind her hip dangled a wicked-looking knife.

Anna, seventeen, emerged on Fifth Avenue and continued her Wild West strut in broad daylight past Manhattan's smartest shops. Occasionally she prowled inside wondering vaguely why people stared and some salesgirls gasped and fled. She was almost to Rockefeller Center before a distraught MGM publicity man caught up with her and hustled her into a cab.

"Say," he tried to communicate. "Are you crazy? That stuff's strictly for Hallowe'en."

"Hallowe'en?" inquired Anna. "Wot ees?"

"When you dress up and scare people," panted the guy, making a face to illustrate. "Look, with those pistols and that knife you know where you'll land? In jail!"

"Jail? Wot ees?" He explained that, too. Anna Maria burst into tears. In her limited English she explained that she was only trying to be fashionable and correct—to make the good first impression in America. Because as everybody in Italy who went to movies knew for a fact, all smart American girls dressed like Dale Evans!

FIRST IMPRESSIONS are lasting and it could be that the little girl aura which has clung to Pier Angeli all her years in Hollywood stemmed from that first misdirected masquerade. However, other junior miss factors combined to lodge cute little Pier in a never-never land of perpetual girlhood, until very recently.

Although she was almost eighteen, an age when American girls consider themselves thoroughly mature, Pier looked and sometimes acted like a sub-deb. She was tiny—only five feet-one, 100 pounds and with an eighteen-and-a-half-inch waist. Around the lot she immediately collected nicknames—"Bambola," which means "doll," "Annarella," which means "Little Annie" in Italian, and of course, "Honey." She wore her long bronze hair streaming down her back, and pattered around in flat sandals under fluffy ballet skirts, cincher belts and sweaters, sometimes carrying a teddy bear or a doll. Her struggles with English were charmingly droll; she said "hombuggers" and "smashed" potatoes, and massacred the bebop slang that her first chum, Debbie Reynolds, taught her. She neither smoked nor drank, but adored ice cream and jumbo malteds. Disarmingly ingenuous, she was inclined to break into giggles or tears at the slightest provocation. Almost at once Pier became the coddled pet of MGM, a girl whom bosses patted paternally on the head and said they'd like her for their little girl.

"Why does everybody say 'I like you for my daughter,' or 'I wish you were my sister?'" Pier sometimes objected. "Why don't they say, 'I like you for my girl?'"

But that was pretty hard to arrange, too.

Not that Pier's innocent angel child peg scared away men. From the start she attracted beaux in Hollywood like honey attracts bees. Arthur Loew, Jr., who produced her first picture, Teresa, discovered Pier more than just professionally and hosted her eighteenth birthday party. John Ericson, her lead that first film, was a good friend, also Stewart Stearn, the man who co-wrote it and who had first spied Pier in Italy. John Barrymore, Jr., liked her so much that he gave Pier his famous dad's make-up kit. Dick Andersen, a young MGM discovery took her out. And, of course, Kirk Douglas. At Pier's first party with young people—when Debbie Reynolds held open house at her new swimming pool, Pier—who couldn't swim then—stepped out up to her nose. With that slim excuse, six boys leaped in and thrashed furiously for the chance to save her. So she wasn't exactly neglected. But all along there was a frustrating factor. Until she turned twenty-one nobody could get Pier out alone.

If a boy figured on sitting out a date with Pier at home they also sat it out with Mrs. Pierangeli, watching like a mother hawk. If they took her out they also took her twin sister, Maria Luisa, and always with a crowd of others. Then, they got the inevitable question from Mama, "Wot time you get back?" and an early front door deadline. Even then Pier had to report home periodically by phone through the brief evenings, and often leave a dinner half-eaten to make the strict curfew.

"Dating Pier was a package deal," recalls one boy who tried it and then gave up. "You also got Mama, and her twin sister and sometimes even little Patrizia, too." And while Mrs. Pierangeli was youngish and smart, Maria beautiful and Pat a real cutie, there are times when five can be a crowd.

One chagrined escort had an upsetting experience. Giving Pier a lift home from the swimming pool one afternoon, he made an impetuous pass at a kiss before he let her out. As Pier drew back indignantly he explained, "Why, that's nothing over here. You always get a good night kiss from a girl."

"What do you mean, 'good night'?" tossed back Pier, slamming the car door and heading for the house. "It's only five-thirty!"

Despite these weighty handicaps to romance, Pier managed to get around. Beneath her doll-like beauty she packed an impish sense of humor. A gay gleam in her eyes and her vivacious spirit suggested a filly who might any minute break loose and romp out of pasture into the hills. She learned to like boogie and cut a rug and sometimes at home gatherings it was noted, when her mother left the room, Pier could swing her hips in a wicked mamba. While most of her stepping-out affairs were to premières or studio affairs, she also made Ciro's and Mocambo where sometimes, too, she managed to dance in one dim corner while her twin sister danced in the other. Even under wraps, Pier has always been terrifically popular in Hollywood. At her twentieth birthday party seventy guests showed up at the Beverly Hills Hotel to help her celebrate.

PIER'S SITUATION was anachronistic. Actually, Pier Angeli was more sophisticated in other ways than the people who shook their heads and wondered if she should be let loose without a nurse. She had flown the Atlantic eighteen times, toured South America, made pictures in Mexico and Germany. She spoke three languages, read the classics, knew both music and art thoroughly. Professionally, she was compared with the young Bergman and Garbo and played highly emotional roles with seasoned leading men such as Stewart Granger, Gene Kelly, Ricardo Montalban and Kirk Douglas. She had demonstrated adult courage. Once, when she was flying east, the plane had trouble over the Grand Canyon, almost crashed and had to return to California. The other passengers nearly panicked, but Pier snoozed calmly throughout the whole ordeal. In Rio de Janeiro, mobs almost tore her to pieces in one frightening public appearance, but without disturbing her composure. She thoroughly enjoyed her first bull fight in Mexico, although her mother became hysterical. Making The Story Of Three Loves Pier climbed up on a seventy-two-foot high trapeze platform and was swung through the air with the greatest of ease by Kirk Douglas. One reporter who scoffed that it was all a trick was brought to the set, but had to cover his eyes and leave shuddering. In rehearsal Pier had a bad spill, cracked her wrist and had to stop practicing—but not because she wanted to. She was all set to climb back before the doctor took a look.

So, by almost any standard, Pier Angeli never qualified as a real greenhorn, retarded child or a pantywaist in Hollywood. Then why was a twenty-first birthday necessary to shake loose the cotton batting from her private portrait? Why didn't she declare her independence long ago? Most American girls might find that hard to figure. But it's not puzzling when you consider two things: an old Italian custom and the special circumstances of Pier's girlhood.

Pier, of course, is all Italian, born in Sardinia and raised around Rome. No nice Italian girl ever does anything much on her own until she's twenty-one. She can't drive a car for instance, and as for going out unchaperoned, unless engaged or married, it's unthinkable. Pier's father, Luigi, was an architect, sculptor and painter. Her mother, Enrica, was on the stage from fifteen until twenty, when she married and retired. Pier spent a more than usually sheltered childhood studying piano, violin, dancing and art from the age of six. This was purely for culture; there was no thought whatever at that time of her becoming an actress. Her father violently disapproved of the idea, and once when her mother let twelve-year-old Pier sing on a Rome radio program, he raised the roof.

Pier remembers a close-knit family scene. Born only twenty minutes before Maria, the sisters were always together, dressed alike and received identical toys at Christmas from Babbo Natale, the Italian Santa Claus. "I never needed any other playmate," Pier has said. "Maria and I always dearly loved each other." When they were both ten the Pierangeli family circle was cinched even tighter because the Nazis occupied Italy. With Hitler's troops roaming the streets, Anna and Maria led an even more cloistered life. They left their apartment only to walk to school, a perilous mile journey past helmeted Nazis. Often terrible things happened to girls and a time or two Pier herself was chased by drunken soldiers, racing to refuge just in time. Once for five months she was desperately ill and always in those days chronically hungry. To get milk, meat and vegetables for his daughters, her father pedalled thirteen miles into the country and back on the bicycle.

One factor in Pier's new maturity was her romance with man-of-the-world Kirk Douglas.

PIER WORSHIPPED her father. Today his is the lone photograph in her bedroom. It is a handsome, sensitive face resembling Pier's. She frankly admits that a father complex lingers with her and may be one reason she has yet to fall seriously in love. "I miss him so," she will tell you, "I'm always looking for the qualities he had in the men I meet. But I never find them."

Luigi Pierangeli died of a sudden heart attack right after Pier had finished Teresa, and only two weeks before she left Italy for Hollywood. He never saw his daughter on the screen. His death was not only a profound shock to Pier but probably the strongest reason why she has never once protested or rebelled against her mother's close supervision of her private life.

The story of how young Pier Angeli became an actress in the first place has been told, but there's a story of more significance to her personal life which has not been told.

Pier was a milk-cheeked, titian-haired young seraph with lustrous agate eyes when she went with her father one day to the apartment house he had designed in Rome. It was called "La Bonboniera," which means roughly "The Candybox." The visit to the modern house was to check some plumbing trouble in an apartment rented by Rina De Liguoro, a prominent Italian actress. One look at Pier's cherubic beauty impressed De Liguoro so that she never forgot it. Through a chain of reactions involving Leonide Moguy, a French director, and Vittorio DeSica, the famous Italian one, Pier was offered a part in Tomorrow Is Too Late, the part, incidentally, of an innocent young girl suddenly faced and terrified with maturity. Both her mother and Pier wanted desperately to accept, but at first her father refused to consider such a thing. Pier remembers very well how she eventually won permission from her reluctant parent.

"I sat on his lap and gave him a kiss," she recalls. "I told him how much I wanted it, and I said 'Papa—please.' I could do things with him no one else could. And so he agreed. 'But only'—and I can still hear his words—'if you promise me you will always stay near your mother and do what she says until you are entirely grown up.' And so I promised." It was a promise that has been fully kept.

Pier Angeli was so shy and naive for that first screen job that when she was called on to kiss a boy for the camera she couldn't do it for two days. Finally, agonizingly coaxed into the embrace by her director, she fainted the minute it was over. And Pier was not much more advanced in the ways of the world when she came to America. Even as late as The Devil Makes Three only two years ago, Gene Kelly had to bark at her in love scenes. "Don't look at the floor. Look at me! Haven't you ever been in love?" Pier had to shake her head.

(Continued from page 56) sort of hours I have and all the traveling that seems to be a part of show business, I don't suppose I'll ever get to attend steadily. But I do go when I can and my faith is still with me when I can't.

Faith, to me, is having the idea of God and doing all you can about it. It is also having an uplifting idea of any kind and doing all you can about it even if you are going to goof it up.

I could never get up in front of people and act the fool as I sometimes do if I didn't have faith—all kinds of faith—in people as well as the Lord. Certainly I could not be a pessimist and do it. I couldn't do it if I were always saying to myself, "I don't suppose they will like me." In my work I have to depend on people.

I began with my friends. At first my faith in them amounted to little more than a hope that they would laugh with me when I cut up, and not at me. Later, with confidence and also with a realization that they wanted to be on my side and, all things equal, would be, I dared to do more. You have to dare to develop. You must have a trust in yourself and in those whose approval you must have, before you can dare. This is faith.

For some people making friends is a job, but it's worth it. For me the time I have spent with my friends and the thinking I have done about them is just about the best investment I have made in my life. Right from the start they were human and kind and let me gain the experience I needed (which all kids need!) of expressing myself in front of groups.

Were it not for them I could have grown up to a narrow-thinking little dope; instead, if I have a broad outlook on life at all, I got it from them. And it is not only that they were important to me; they are important to me today. I forgot this once and was reminded in a way I won't forget.

When I first got into movie work I became a little warped about it. For about a year and a half I got away from my old life. I seldom went to church with the family (I had no thoughts of God at all), I rarely called my old friends. One night I sat down knowing that I felt downright miserable. I kept telling myself there was no reason to be in the slumps. I was going along fine at the studio, I was being invited out here and there, I could keep going at a gay gallop every second if I wanted to. Yet all I wanted to do was cry—and I did.

"I must be getting sick," I told my mother. "I haven't got a reason in the world to feel blue but I do."

"What have you been doing that you really used to like to do?" she asked.

It seemed to me that I was having fun and therefore Mom wasn't on the ball at all. But then I began to understand that she didn't mean it the way I thought. What I used to like, what gave all of us kids our biggest kick, was creating a nice surprise for the other guy; a party, something she had always wanted, the solace she needed. I could remember how we'd get together and be so happy conspiring about some affair like this that we couldn't talk for our giggling. It all came back to me and I realized that this was living. It had been ages since I had done anything for anyone. And everything else was pretending.

There was only one thing to do: I jumped for the telephone and madly started calling all my old friends. I was in a hurry to get back into my old life and feel like my old self—a terrible hurry!

I guess I don't have to point out that my mother would not have been able to guess what was wrong with me—when I didn't know myself—unless, like so many mothers, she spent a little time thinking of herself and a great deal thinking of those near to her. In this way she has generated such a feeling of security in all of us that any threat to our well-being will be anticipated and overcome before it can mount to dangerous proportions.

For instance, ours is a family with no relationship to drinking. If this makes us all sound like livin' dolls, forget it. It's just that alcohol in any form has never been a factor in our life.

Whenever I see someone who drinks to excess I feel very sorry for them. They must be terribly bored or they wouldn't find it necessary. I am sure that if they could find something to do that really interested them they wouldn't need to drown their troubles.

This has worked out with a boy I know, a boy who had looks, money, and absolutely no interest in things, especially church. Somehow we got to talking one day about his lack of direction in life and I said something that made him laugh at first—that if he had any kind of little job he liked, it would change his attitude.

WHO—US?

When Tony Curtis and Piper Laurie were touring with The Prince Who Was A Thief, they held two autograph parties in my town and signed their pictures "Sincerely Yours, Tony Curtis" or "Piper Laurie." That afternoon Tony chatted with a small group of us as he waited for the train. Someone asked him if he was going to marry Janet Leigh, but he evaded the question. Later, I asked him again as he signed my autograph book. He still didn't answer. Then I looked at my book. He had written, "Sincerely, Janet and Tony."

Kathie Henke
Battle Creek, Michigan

I couldn't figure out why I had said it except that a few mornings before this I had seen my father doing a little work around the house and whistling contentedly at it. Dad is a carpenter. This day he had fashioned a piece of wood and then squinted down the edge of it to make sure it was straight and true. From the look on his face you could tell that it was—and more. He was at peace with himself.

I told this to the boy. I said I knew why my father had felt good; it was because he had a sense of being useful in the world, and therefore his life had meaning.

Months passed before I met the boy again, but then I saw that he was a changed fellow. He was in the automobile business—selling cars, I mean—and he was crazy about it, he told me. If he knew someone who needed a car but couldn't quite swing the deal, he would figure out how it could be done.

"You should see the looks on their faces when they realize they're no longer chained to one spot but can travel as they've always dreamed," he said.

You could see he was happy, all right, and before we parted he told me that he had started to go to church again.

"I don't know why," he said. "But it seems to be part of my new existence."

I don't know, either, unless it was because he was living more normally now and to be normal means to be sensitive spiritually instead of being dull and blind.

Of course it works out with me all the time. I don't suppose there is a living person who hasn't some faith of a sort. But we all know that there are too many people who haven't enough faith. Sometimes I find myself included in this bracket. I forget. I slip up on how to share my life with my neighbor. Almost always it brings me unhappiness. I know what this unhappiness is: I have been inwardly preoccupied and nothing empties a heart faster or leaves it aching so badly with that dull, hollow feeling—than self-love. That's why it is such a blessed relief to me at such times to remember the old words and ways I grew up with and to reverse the flow of my interest so that it takes in the other fellow.

Some people seek from religion a solution to the great questions in their minds. Is the world coming to an end? When? What happens to us then? And so on. It seems to me that they are still like the frightened child, as I was, who first sees mention of the millenium in the Bible or hears his elders talk of it. But to me religion is most important when it teaches me small lessons about the people we are—I and those with whom I live.

I remember when I was still in school, visiting my friend Jeanette Johnson in Balboa and attending a small church there one Sunday. The pastor was bowed with age and I didn't expect any unusual sermon. Yet he said something that has come into my head a thousand times since. He was talking about selfishness and greed and he described the people who sinned in this manner. "Oh, you can tell them by their turned-in eyeballs and their itchy palms!" he cried.

It was the kind of colorful phrasing you get from old-time ministers, yet I am always asking myself these days, when I think I may be too piggish, "Am I like that? Are my palms itchy?"

Sometimes the answer is "Yes!" And, boy, I change policy right away. I don't ever want turned-in eyeballs or itchy palms. In case I haven't explained too clearly what the phrase means I will now: turned-in eyeballs, of course, means thinking only of yourself and itchy palms means the love of money.

I remember when my luck was the cause of one of my high school friends succumbing horribly to envy . . . which is, after all, a form of greed. This had to do with my being chosen for a screen test and getting my first contract in a studio. Since I hadn't been a standout as a dramatics student in school (other girls doing far better at acting and my activities being confined to shoving scenery around) it was quite a shock to some of them when I got into the movies. It was a shock to me, too. Let's face it!

Most of the kids I knew took it pretty well and wished me luck. But a couple of girls thought the whole thing was silly, pointing out that I was neither pretty nor talented! They even, with all the bountiful imagination of high school vintage, got nasty little reasons into their explanations of how such a horrible mistake could have happened. One girl, very good in school plays, just blew her top altogether.

A couple of weeks after I had started at the studio I dropped into the school and saw her. "Hi!" I called. She looked at me frozen-faced, turned and walked away. I was really hurt. I asked friends about it. They gave me a quick answer. "She doesn't like you any more. She thinks that if they were picking the best actress she would have been chosen. She is disgusted with people who select talent."

I was angry but in time I began to realize how hurt she must have been. This didn't excuse her, of course, but I think I prayed for her to understand and to feel better. It took time (years!), but we got over it.

SOME PARTS of the Bible are brought to the attention of children too early, I believe, and should be withheld. Talk of dire punishments and, of course, those references to the end of the world were just plain scary when I was a kid, I remember. And some of the indirect injunctions were just confusing. "Let him who is without sin amongst you cast the first stone" really meant "don't throw stones" when I first heard it. By the time I should have understood how it actually applied in everyday life it had lost its power for me. Not until I had cast a few stones I shouldn't have (and had them come bouncing back to me so I was in lots of trouble) did I re-learn these lessons.

Reading the Bible and believing its message has not only been a matter of benefiting from its content but also an education in how to pace my life. There is no hurry to the Bible. All things are considered deeply and time is taken for consideration. This is the feeling I get. And so, though I know I am considered a girl with quick notions and flighty ways, actually I am not. I now deliberate much longer over decisions than people think.

There was a period in my life when all any friend had to do was suggest we take off for somewhere and I was right back with an "Okay! Let's go!" before I had even heard the whole idea. It's not like that any more. Now I take time to decide if it's really a good idea or not. In that way I keep out of a lot of trouble.

NOT LONG AGO I woke up conscious of a vague feeling that a former interest in my life needed reviving. I wasn't sure what it was and I was too busy during the forenoon to concentrate on the matter. At lunchtime I had a date with a boy I've known for years. While we were eating he happened to say that he wanted to reread some of the books he had known earlier in his life but hadn't understood. The second he said that, I knew what had been bothering me.

When I was playing the French horn in Burbank High we tackled a lot of symphonic numbers which meant very little then to a would-be bopster like me. But some trace of the quality of these compositions must have gotten into my blood and stayed there until the time was ripe for me to understand better music. This was it. As I listened to the boy talk about the books he was going to look up again I knew I must go back to the study of music and particularly to the symphonies I had once played. I felt that they had influenced me somehow even though I wasn't aware of it, and they would now mean more than ever.

Don't get me wrong. I'll always love popular music and that will be my forte, but I'm going to start enjoying the more serious music, too—the kind of music that is a hit for a hundred years instead of just a season. To me this is a sign that my faith is mellowing and the depth of my understanding deepening. This doesn't hurt anyone, not even a hep cat like me. The more there is to us, the more wisdom, the finer the feeling, the better persons we will be to live with. Nothing, not even continuing to progress in my career, is as important as this—and this is part of my faith. END this glamorous head—and spare the photographer's feelings!

Robertson owns a "least co-operative" award.

■ One of the silliest attitudes a movie star can take is to be belligerent toward the army of photographers whose job it is to take pictures of celebrities. It's Hollywood legend that if you take one swing at one photographer anywhere in the world, they will all duck the blow and swing back. You can't escape a black eye. Shelley Winters may not know that yet, for it was in Rome that she tossed a glass of whisky into the face of a photographer who was trying to shoot a picture of her as she sat with Farley Granger.

"I hate photographers," she bellowed. "You're always bothering me!"

This is an old refrain, sung by more than one harassed star who lived to regret the angry shout. Perhaps the first movie star to risk the wrath of photographers was Greta Garbo. She always wanted to be alone but seldom was. After she snubbed photographers, they managed to shoot this beautiful woman in the most idiotic poses, often looking like a frightened spook. They even photographed her sunbathing nude. Shortly thereafter, Greta quit pictures altogether.

While stars have their own reasons for getting fighting mad at photographers, many of them have the feeling that everyone is staring at them, when perhaps no one is even glancing in their direction. Consequently, it is the man with the camera eye who becomes the focal point of their hatred. Almost every outburst in the feud between Frank Sinatra and newspaper reporters has its beginning in his attitude toward photographers. These men see themselves as citizens who are out to do a job and are entitled to everybody's co-operation. Naturally celebrities (who have work of their own) can't always see it that way. If Sinatra could remember always to befriend photographers and never to scream at them, he'd find that they protect him, instead of badgering him.

There's more ill feeling between Rita Hayworth and photographers. No one knows why she dislikes the very people responsible for making her famous through their spectacular camera work. They forgive her, saying she has had poor advice.

They forgive Bing Crosby, too, for his somewhat snobbish attitude toward them. They realize that it is, after all, quite a job for Bing to slip on a toupee, and that he has suffered private tragedy. But he hasn't a chance of dating Mona Freeman and other young glamour girls without becoming "darkroom bait"—and unless he is polite, good old Bing will be in for a rough time.

Photographers, oddly enough, are really the only people in Hollywood who aren't afraid of anything. They are not afraid of a glowering Marlon Brando, who considers his body too precious to be snapped at will, nor David O. Selznick, who once had his whiskers dusted by a photog who refused to take interference while he shot pictures of Shirley Temple.

Currently not favorites of Hollywood press photographers are Dale Robertson, Bob Wagner and Gordon MacRae. The lens lads are also a little worried about the attitude of Doris Day, once much more co-operative but now beginning to show signs of great impatience. Esther Williams and June Allyson also give them trouble.

"I guess you can't blame the kids," one of them said. "It's a nervous town. But if a star wants to get really nervous, all he has to think about is the day that may come when no movie fan wants to look at his pictures—so nobody shoots 'em!"

You can have a hassle with people who know all of the Russells on the subject of beauty. "By Hollywood standards she's as beautiful as they come, but when I think of her mother and brothers, I'm not sure that Jane's the best looking of the lot. You should see the boys!" says one of Jane's friends.

What does she do to keep the beauty that is possibly second or third best in her family? That required a little thought, because who can safely say why Miss Russell does anything at any time? "Well, she gets nine hours of sleep every night," her friend offered tentatively, "but I honestly don't think that it's to preserve her looks. She's just tired. Anyhow, with her heritage it wouldn't matter what she did. If she went to bed with her make-up on, her skin would stay as smooth; if she wore her hair in a knot on top of her head all day, she could brush it out and it would look better than the rest of us if we have been up in pin curls. She even looks good when she wakes up in the morning."

Jane's other beauty secrets include working too hard, fighting other people's battles, and taking the problems of the world onto her own sleek shoulders. She ought to look like a hag for all of the attention that she gives herself, instead of which she joins the lovelies of the Beauty Fair. "Sultry, smouldering, the slow-fire type," is the masculine verdict on Jane. "But you also know that you'd have a ball on a fishing trip with her. She's a wonderful pal as well as a beautiful woman."

Elizabeth Taylor had a problem in her younger days: she was too beautiful. When she appeared on the set of one of her first pictures, the director cast an outraged eye at this incredible child and roared, "Take her back to make-up and get those eyelashes off her. She's too young for that sort of thing!" It would have been pretty painful, considering that the offending eyelashes were her very own, but this misunderstanding was only one of the indignities that Liz had to suffer. Silly as it sounds today, looking at dainty Miss Taylor, she had to be taught to wear feminine clothes. She was such a tree-climbing tomboy that when she was trapped in a dress, the awkwardness she felt was apparent.

It could have been—should have been—about Cyd Charisse that our observer said, "Everything is perfect." From head to toe there is such unbelievable symmetry of face and form that watching her move is pure delight. The hands that are as expressive as her face, the incomparable legs, the fluid economy of motion are such that they often hit her audience after she has quietly passed. They are apt to say, "Holy cow, wasn't that a radiant girl!"

A presumably case-hardened publicist explained Cyd this way: "Crazy as it probably sounds to you, I have the feeling that her mind and soul are as symmetrical as her body. She does everything exactly right because she can't help it. It's natural to her, a part of the way she lives. Even her life unfolds with the same grace that characterizes everything she does—and that doesn't just happen, you know."

Speaking of grace inevitably brings to mind Ava Gardner, who would stand out on anyone's poll of beautiful women. Again the man behind the lens said, "When people speak of Ava, they generally refer to that gorgeous body—which makes sense. Other girls may have put the wiggle on the map, but Ava's got the sexiest walk that ever happened, because it's so lithe and effortless. But I've got news for you: this girl has one of the most beautiful faces I've ever seen in fifteen years of photographing movie stars. Hair, eyes, nose, skin, bone structure—she's got 'em with chimes. Highlight that face correctly, and a more beautiful woman never lived."

Nor a more glamorous one—but that came with time. When Ava descended on Hollywood, her painful shyness was an enormous liability. With great beauty there must also be an air, an awareness of self and of the proud, exciting aura of glamour. The young Ava sadly lacked it. The physical splendor was there, but Ava was so timid and retiring in the beginning that she all but went unnoticed until she commenced to emerge, little by little, like a butterfly from its chrysalis. In time confidence gave her that necessary proud air, but simple good sense preserves the natural beauty. Ava is the soap-and-water girl of all time, the most vigorous wielder of the bedtime hairbrush.

Those who are close to Rhonda Fleming insist that her inner beauty is far greater than that which gratifies the eye. Her business manager, Anetta Hughes, says, "I've been with Rhonda more than five years, and I have yet to hear her express an unkind opinion of anybody or do an unkind deed. She always thinks wholesome thoughts."

This long-stemmed beauty of the flaming tresses is a firm believer in moderation. If she nibbles at a cookie or two, she will have a smaller helping of potatoes at her next meal, even though her weight never varies. It's a matter of principle. She does setting-up exercises, but not fanatically. She enjoys swimming and playing tennis with her husband, Lew Morrill, but her world

Flowers—Hotel Statler Flower Shops, Los Angeles and New York

(Continued from page 68) will not fall apart if a few days lapse without her doing either. She enjoys oil painting, at which she has displayed some talent, but only when she has time. Her glowing skin is regularly exposed to soap and water, but Rhonda doesn't go overboard on that score, either. She is meticulous about removing every vestige of make-up with cold cream before retiring at night. She makes a big effort to be orderly and usually succeeds—but when she is rushed, things do fly.

Three things she does not do in moderation. The first is to love humanity (although she had to overcome her native shyness). The second is to read; she is a quick and retentive reader who can go through an average script in an hour. The third is to sleep. Like Jane Russell, she can't do with less than eight hours nightly and feels better with a little more. And she is more than moderately beautiful.

STILL, as we said, people in Hollywood tend to think of beauties only in one way or another. They remark on the bewitching, gamin face of Jean Simmons, notwithstanding the fact that quite a body goes along with the face. Or they speak of Ava Gardner's magnificent body as though her ravishing face is superfluous. Our last entry in the Beauty Fair turned the tables on people half-blinded by beauty. For years Jeanne Crain was famous for the classic beauty of her face, the limpid innocence of her eyes, the sweet gravity of her mouth. And so they thought of her. Oh, they knew that she had an uncontrollable desire to play practical jokes, but they practically heard the whisper of angel wings when Jeanne Crain walked by.

It took even an intelligent girl like Jeanne a while to get bored by being thought of and cast as Little Goody Two-Shoes, but bored she got. Off came the long, girlish locks that seemed to belie the knowledge that she was a mature mother of four; she emerged with a sophisticated Italian-boy cut—and what hair there was left was purely red! A little of the devil that is in all the Irish danced in her eyes, lurked in the corners of her smile. The demure costumes disappeared; Jeanne Crain posed for cheesecake, yet, and it hit the town between the eyes that this girl had attributes other than a classically beautiful face.

It tickled her pink, humor being one of Jeanne's assets. She had fooled the town that knew everything about glamour. And how does she go about maintaining beauty of feature and of form? Little Jeannie Crain has a formula that might well be hers alone. High on a hill Paul Brinkman has built her a small studio, where she goes to paint, to read, to meditate. She likes to go there, also, to swim at midnight. There is something about the water and the atmosphere at that hour, she says, that relaxes her, gives her the balance and composure without which no woman alive can be beautiful. END

Two colors of fine European hair are beautifully braided into a coronet—golden sable (Denise Darcel's own hair color) and silvery blonde. This coiffure accessory is easily and quickly attached to Denise's short bob with hair pins. Note the beauty of detail in Coro's jewelry.

Again, the short bob is transformed. Denise pins a Bouclette of dainty curls at the nape of her neck. Leo De Bray made this House of Hair Fashions coiffure accessory to match the silvery blonde tips of Denise's own hair. Denise wears Coro's novel rhinestone and golden earrings.

Here Denise adds a braided chignon coiffure accessory, also just attached with hair pins. Again, the color of the chignon is the color of Denise's own silvery blonde tips which gives a lovely two-color effect. Coro's feminine cluster earrings are of pearls and rhinestones.

"At long last, she seems well adjusted to the wacky life of being a legendary movie star. She's a happy girl."

Part of the change is due to maturity. I don't mean that she's pushing middle age. Lana was thirty-four on her last birthday—a surprise when you consider how many years she has been an international trademark. She started in the movie business early. She was jiggling her way through They Won't Forget when Marilyn Monroe was learning to multiply.

But the passing of the years isn't the only reason for Lana's new look. Some glamour girls never grow up.

A happy marriage will do wonders for a girl's serenity. Lana's decision to marry Lex Barker was a considered one, but the idea did not appeal to many of her friends and business associates, some of whom seem to resent him because he is tall and handsome—and perhaps because he married Lana Turner.

One consideration, somewhat overlooked, is that Lex Barker is said to be one of those rare men whose blood is Rh negative. This is of little interest to most ladies, but Lana Turner is a negative, too. She is a devoted mother, but she has had a tough time trying to add to her family. An Rh negative husband is a blessing the doctor wouldn't have dared to order.

Lex has a new contract with Universal. Lana told him she wouldn't mind if he didn't take it. Certainly he'd do better on taxes if he concentrated on individual pictures, residuals, and such. But he took the contract because he didn't want anyone to say he's "living off" his wife. It isn't so.

LANA WALKED in for this interview exactly on time, certainly another sign that she has changed. She was as gorgeous as ever in a grey suit studded with pearl and gold jewelry.

She did seem different. There was nothing flighty about her. She talked philosophically about her life and times, laughed about her past mistakes and was pleased with the prospect of her future. She admitted she had changed.

"I've been hurt, time after time," she remarked. "Sure, I've heard all the stories about what I'm supposed to have done. They are fantastic! I would have had to be eight different people.

"Those stories used to upset me terribly. I would read the nasty little digs that were printed about me and stew about them until I made myself miserable.

"But now I look at it differently. There's nothing I can do to stop those stories. So I have adopted this attitude: the only person you have to answer to is the one you face in the mirror every morning. If you can look yourself in the eye and know that you're not guilty, you have no worries.

"I've tried that system and it works. Lex and I have tried to adjust our lives so we can avoid trouble. We stay home a great deal. We avoid big parties that look as hough they're going to end up in brawls. We can have a better time among our close friends. Let the others end up on the ront pages. I've had my share.

"I don't mind being knocked for somehing I do. If I make mistakes, I expect to be criticized for them. But the thing that makes me sore is having people make up hings about me. That's why I've always been wary of interviews. Sometimes a writer will take one brief quote out of a long statement I may have made. Out of context, the remark looks ridiculous."

A so-called exposé magazine recently printed a scurrilous article about Lana and understandably, she was incensed. She turned it over to the studio police department for further action.

"Why do they print things like that?" she asked. How long will they be allowed to stay in business?"

THEN SHE REVERTED to the new philosophical Lana and added, "Being a movie star would be a wonderful life except for all the slop that goes with it. You have to put up with a great deal for what you get in return.

"Nobody escapes it. Stay in this town long enough and you'll hear stories about every star. Without exception. You can hear every kind of story about anyone. As soon as you get up on top, they start aiming at you."

Of the stars who have had real troubles and some whose woes have been magnified out of all proportion by the gossips, Lana stuck up for three, especially.

"Nobody could have been happier than I when Ava Gardner got an Oscar nomination for Mogambo. She's just about my best friend. I love that girl. She's awfully hard to get to know; she's a very shy person. But once she considers you her friend, you'll find she's wonderful. She deserves all the credit she can get.

"Judy Garland is another one of my favorites. We're next-door neighbors; our kitchens practically look in at each other. Judy is another girl who deserves better breaks than she's gotten. I hope her A Star Is Born is the greatest picture ever.

"I'll tell you a girl I'd like to meet and that's Marilyn Monroe. She must be a fascinating personality, considering all she has gone through. She's taking a lot of knocks because she's on top now. I wish there were some way I could tell her not to let it get her down."

I remarked that Lana had done a pretty good job of chronicling her own life and hard times in her autobiography. "Oh, that!" she remarked. The story, which was printed in a woman's magazine, created quite a sensation when it came out.

At the beginning of the story, Lana dropped a bomb by telling how her father was killed in a crap game at Fourth and Mission Streets in San Francisco, December 14, 1930. She went on to tell how her father had been a bootlegger during Prohibition days, how after his death she was boarded with a Modesto couple who beat her with a stick when she didn't complete her tiring chores. She also gave intimate details of her first three marriages.

"I wish now I hadn't done the story," Lana confessed. "It's not that I regretted having those matters known. All the friends who knew me were aware of the facts, and they are the ones I am concerned about.

"The damage was not in the first publication, but in the way it has been used since. Writers have taken chunks out of it and used them for their own purposes. One magazine writer really got me sore. He took the record of each of my romances and tried to prove that I had a father complex.

"Now, look! I wish I had known my father better. He died when I was only nine and a half. But I didn't develop any complexes about it. I am a very uncomplexed girl."

THE IDEA of an autobiography arose when she hired an independent press agent. The writing was done by Cameron Shipp, an astute writer who had done similar jobs with Billie Burke and Lionel Barrymore.

"Cam had a mind like a vacuum cleaner," she recalled. "I'd talk with him for two or three hours at a clip. Sometimes I would toss off an incident with a sentence or two. He'd come back to it later and say, 'Now what about this?'

"He was very thorough. I didn't find out until later that he even went up to San Francisco and consulted the police records to find out that my father's death was still carried on the books as an unsolved murder. I hadn't known that.

"When it was all done, he brought it to me to read. I sat there reading it for an hour or more and I started to get scared. It's one thing to carry certain experiences in the back of your head; it's another thing to see them down in black and white. I wanted to drop the whole thing, but how could I tell the man after he had worked so hard?"

She did balk, but then her publicity agent swung into action. After an hour of steady convincing, Lana agreed to go through with the deal, but with certain deletions.

The autobiography appeared and created quite a stir. MGM, which had helped to keep out of print many of the details she revealed, was understandably peeved. Her mother, who has always stayed in the background of Lana's career, said sadly, "Why did you have to tell about those things after we've kept them quiet all these years?"

Lana learned her lesson. She had to continue to pay the press agent a stiff sum, but she never again did a story with him. She says she'll never hire another publicity man.

SHE SEEMED happier to talk about more pleasant matters—her hair, her husband, her daughter and her career.

The hair: She loves it. Doesn't care what anybody says.

"I let my hair go brown for a very simple reason: I had to do two pictures that called for it," she remarked. "In Flame And The Flesh, I played a real earthy Italian girl. Unlike anything I'd ever done before. At the beginning of the picture, you see a shot of the seamier section of Naples. Down in the streets a big fight is going on. There are a bunch of kids scrambling and a woman screaming at them like a fishwife. She turns around and you see that it's me. The words 'Lana Turner' come on the screen and the credits begin.

"Now I couldn't very well play a role like that as a blonde. In the other picture I made in Europe, Betrayed, I'm a Dutch spy who dyes her hair."

She said she was delighted with the privacy the new hair shade gave her. She could travel about during her ten months in Europe without being recognized by the public. Even as she spoke, men filed past the table and stared at her for a moment as if to say, "That girl looks familiar." But they passed on, still looking quizzical.

Lana intends to keep her hair brown, regardless of the advice of some people at the studio. One or two argued that she should wear a blonde wig when she appeared on the MGM 30th anniversary show on Ed Sullivan's TV show.

"I shouldn't have had to point out to them that it was good business to have me appear with brown hair with these two pictures coming out," she observed. "What better way to introduce the hair than before the millions of TV viewers?

"Personally I'm delighted with the whole situation. It's a controversy without a scandal. What could be more ideal?"

HER HUSBAND: She's also enthusiastic about him

"This is quite a guy," she said with a glow in her eyes. "Somebody was mentioning that it was nice that we were able to get to know each other well in Europe before we got married. I started thinking about it and it's true.

"If we had stayed here, we would have been all wrapped up in the Hollywood routine and our own friends. But we avoided all that. We had only each other and the experience of seeing Europe together.

"I decided this was the man for me. And I got married in Italy on purpose. When you get it done over there, the marriage has to last. There's no way out."

I mentioned that her remark had a slightly reminiscent ring. When she married Bob Topping in a garish free-for-all at a Sunset Boulevard mansion, she was reported to have uttered the deathless remark, "This is forever."

"Ridiculous!" Lana exclaimed. "I never said that marriage would last forever. How could I have predicted such a thing? The man could have dropped dead. He promised he wouldn't, but it was still possible. How can you predict anything can last forever?"

The Turner-Barker idyll may not be for the ages, but it would appear to have a better chance than her three previous entanglements. Lana has married four strong-willed men, but the last of these seems to have what it takes to keep Lana happy.

"Sure, Lex rules our house," she admitted. "But he's not overbearing about it. The thing about him is that he has the intelligence to back his decisions. And he has a great sense of humor. That's very important."

HER DAUGHTER: A source of constant amazement.

"Cheryl is only ten and a half years old but she's five feet, one, compared to my five feet, three," said Lana. "She's going to be taller than I am before long, and a real beauty. Oh, how I hope she won't be ashamed of her height! I keep telling her to walk erect and be proud of how tall she is, even if the boys are shorter.

"She gets along wonderfully with Lex. At first she was a little standoffish with him, and that's only natural. She called him Uncle Lex, and when she wanted anything, she'd wait until she could get me alone and ask me.

"That's all changed now. Both of them go right over my head. The two of them are conniving all the time, and I'm the last to know what's going on. She dreamed up her own name for Lex. She calls him Po.

"I couldn't figure out where she got that, so I asked her. She had something of a problem. She calls her own father, Steve (Crane), 'Daddy.' I didn't want her calling Lex by his first name alone, because it simply riles me to hear children call grown people by their first names. It just doesn't sound right.

"For a while it was Uncle Lex. But when she got so fond of him, she decided to call him Po. She said she took 'Pop' and dropped a 'P'."

HER CAREER: Moving in high gear.

Stars like Clark Gable and Greer Garson may be checking out of MGM, but Lana is there to stay. For another five years, at least.

Is she happy about it?

"Yes, I like Metro," she said, "though I do wish I could be allowed an outside picture a year. There are so many exciting pictures being made and I'd like to be able to take some of the offers I've had. I've never been loaned out in all the years I've been at MGM.

"In fact, until the two pictures in Europe, I never got off the Culver City lot. Except that I did a few days at Laguna for The Postman Always Rings Twice and at Monterrey for Mr. Imperium."

Lana seldom speaks enthusiastically about her pictures, but she's all het up about Flame And The Flesh. "It's not a Lana Turner role at all. It's one of the few times I've had a chance to really act."

There's just one other matter that belongs in this report on the 1954 Lana. She hopes it will have happened by the time you read this.

Lana and Lex hope it will be a boy. END

(Continued from page 24) or Twenty-one. He'd rather stay home with his family . . . Next time you watch Arthur Godfrey, try to figure out the one member of the cast that the boss doesn't like too much. It's especially evident on the morning show, when Arthur spends so much time talking to the various Little Godfreys, but you can also spot it on Wednesday night if you're sharp. The person in question is pretty independent, and has a devil-may-care attitude that some of the others can't afford to have. Arthur's fond of subservience, so this attitude doesn't go too well. But there's not much he can do about it. He can't fire anybody else yet, not while people still remember the Julius La Rosa incident . . . Another nice sidelight on the success of See It Now: Ed Murrow's co-editor, Fred Friendly, and Mrs. Friendly have been able to afford two children. Before the show they just didn't have enough money, although Fred owns part of Who Said That?. But since See It Now started, over two years ago, the Friendlys have become the parents of a boy and a girl. Their friends doubt, though, that the Friendlys will ever move out of the city and into the suburbs where the children will have a yard to play in. Fred just works too hard and too long to have any commuting time left . . .

Clooney and Hepburn

Audrey Hepburn has officially met Mel Ferrer's relatives at a family dinner . . . Many people were mighty chagrined when they found out that Charley Applewhite had a wife and a child. He's been palmed off by his press agents—by implication anyway—as an eligible bachelor from Texas. From Fort Worth he is. But married he is, too . . . Ethel, of Ethel And Albert, is not only an accomplished actress who brings her role to life: she's also the sole author of the show, and always has been. She does most of her writing down in her small apartment facing historic Gramercy Park. When in the city writing or rehearsing, Peggy Ronning (that's her real name) lives alone and works. Her free time is spent in Connecticut, where her husband, their young daughter, and her mother live all the time. She takes great pride in her house, which is a very old one, and her furniture, which is all antique. And she's a great gardener—when she has the time. Peggy somehow manages to look just a little dowdy when she's playing the part of Ethel. But when she's off screen, she's quite chic—and many pounds slimmer than you'd expect. And it's quite true that the adventures of Ethel and Albert have nothing to do with the life of Peggy and her real-life husband—who's name is Odd! Peggy just has a flair for eyeing other people's domestic lives and turning them into plots and dialogue.

who's got the money?

(Continued from page 33) estimates of his earnings on The Glenn Miller Story alone say three quarters of a million. Tyrone Power, John Wayne, currently Burt Lancaster and others have capitalized on this star-owner plan. Others have not been so shrewd. The $5,000-dollar-a-week salaries you read about really don't go so far.

For instance, a few months ago, two famed and high-salaried figures in the entertainment world barricaded themselves in a New York hotel room rather than accept a subpoena that threatened surgery on their wallet.

The husband, Dick Haymes, was reputed to get $5000 a week for his nightclub and theatre services, yet for some time he had been making plaintive noises indicating he couldn't scrape up five bucks he could rightfully call his own.

The wife, Rita Hayworth Haymes, is rewarded by something in the neighborhood of $250,000 a picture. $250,000 is a quarter of a million dollars. Now it seemed to be touch and go between room service and starvation.

At about the same time, back in Hollywood, an actor who raked together $250,000 all told in 1953 was faced with a tax bite of $196,000. That was not extraordinary. He could and did pay it. That was extraordinary. He was one of two stars of a certain business management's whole stable of Hollywood clients who was able to get up the scratch for Uncle Sam. Nor did this constitute a reflection on the business office's acumen. On the contrary, it is one of the shrewdest in town.

Meanwhile, a fourth luminary, whose weekly salary is roughly $1500 more than the average American family is paid in a year, was turning up at various Hollywood gatherings in a series of brand new Cadillacs. The answer was not extravagance. The performer had bought each car on credit, had been unable to meet subsequent payments, had it repossessed, then bounded off to get another one—on credit.

Now what the bemused public presumably would like to know is: Why can't these gilded cuties with the staggering incomes keep themselves in the black? How is it that a guy with a take-home pay of less than $100 a week can keep himself and his loved ones solvent—if barely so—and another guy who gets $200,000 a year is only a jump ahead of the sheriff or is running neck and neck with him?

Well, Modern Screen was curious about it, too, and presents a few of its findings.

But first, let it be clear that Modern Screen does not consider itself an apologist for the poor screen star. The element of pathos in the economic collapse of the $5000-a-week hero is not much stronger than it would be if the Aga Khan absent-mindedly took a Turkish bath on the day before his Moslem followers gave him his weight in platinum. The star has a pretty posh set-up however you look at it, and should be able to hang onto noodle money after the locusts have passed over.

But there is something of a case for the boys and girls. It will not and should not reduce you to a sympathetic crying jag, but it does negate in part the careless charges of spendthrift and addlepate.

There are a few of those still around, of course; the yacht-and-triple-alimony set is not wholly obsolete, and now and again, some lovely makes the journals by the rough equivalent of buying her favorite steed a chinchilla horse blanket. But all in all, these are, like the dinosaur, extinct, and the money troubles of most stars today are something like yours, if not much.

To begin with, let us take the actor who does indeed make in film salary $200,000 a year—under the usual contract, $5000 on a forty-week hitch. Salaries have dropped in the last years as taxes have risen, but there is a fair number of his kind left. If he makes this much money, he's been around for quite a spell—ten years is a reasonable norm—probably has a family, and has outgrown the yen to rub champagne in his hair and regard a 1954 Jaguar as a suitable runabout for the gardener.

Let us take him and then let us take his check, before someone else does.

In the first place, a salary check for $5000 is no such thing. It starts its abortive life as a salary check for about $3900, since our star must pay withholding tax, of course.

Then—pow! his business manager (and if a star doesn't have a canny, reputable business manager along the lines of Hollywood's Bo Roos or Myrt Blum or Roger Graham, he is just asking for it) immediately pops $2500 more into the star's tax account. This is the account the star stacks, like a squirrel, against the Ides of March, der tag! And this star, with his 200 grand, is in the ninety per cent bracket.

Very well. Mr. Got-Rocks now has $1400 of his flying start and more is yet to go.

To his agent goes $500, the customary ten per cent; to his business manager, a relatively modest $150, or three per cent; and to his insurance folk $100. Six-fifty left.

And fifty of that—zowie!—into the fund for the Motion Picture Home, and don't think that's not insurance. The Motion Picture Home is where he stands a good chance of winding up if he doesn't manage his affairs like a neurotic hamster, a small rodent that hoards everything against a rainy day. The Motion Picture Home is the final refuge for the improvident great, near-great and never-great. It is the film industry's looking after its own. It is at once pathetic, shocking and admirable—the names of some of its inhabitants would amaze you. But it must be maintained.

Fifty more dollars go to the mortgage. Stars are a mortgage-ridden lot. Those with fat contracts are prone to have much more credit than cash. So this one, say, has a $90,000 home with a $25,000 mortgage—and that makes him exceptionally solid.

Miss Billie Burke, Broadway star and wife of the late Flo Ziegfeld, once was assigned to the same table aboard a transatlantic liner with a gentleman who was sneezing at a dreadful clip. "Go to your stateroom," she advised. "Drink plenty of orange juice, take four aspirins, then cover yourself with all the blankets you can stand. Sweat the cold out. I know what I'm talking about. I'm Billie Burke."

"I've always wanted to meet you, Miss Burke," the gentleman assured her. "I'm Dr. William Mayo of the Mayo Clinic."

Bennett Cerf in This Week

What's he left with now? $550? Still big money, eh? Enough to keep the wolf away from your door! Sure it is. But look again.

He hasn't even started on his grocery bill, his utilities, his maintenance, his wardrobe, his wife's wardrobe, his children's education, his car's upkeep (maybe two cars, maybe three), his community taxes, his state taxes, and his rather fancy surplus overhead. For like it or not, a star isn't supposed to live in a tree or wear burlap, and the same goes for his loved ones. Furthermore, he should entertain now and then for business as well as social reasons. And that doesn't mean milkshakes and salt water taffy all around.

A close professional audit of this final $550—and this essay is based not on guesswork but on highly expert conjecture—indicates that our star is still solvent if he doesn't mind going without shoes.

And bear in mind that we are dealing with a fellow with no alimony trials (e.g. Dick Haymes, Errol Flynn, Dean Martin, Frank Sinatra), no tax delinquency tribulations (almost anyone you care to mention) and no lawsuits pending (Marlon Brando) nor suspension of his pay (Marilyn Monroe).

At this point, you could hardly be blamed for snorting into your cambric tea. Evidently we have here a man who is working for nothing or less than nothing, who is skidding toward catastrophe on the sweat of his brow, and who might be better off employed for wages in a garage or simply shooting himself.

Well, not quite. There are outs. That's where the business consultant comes in. To over-simplify somewhat, our man can earn it, but he can't keep it. But that's impossible you say. Yes, of course, it's impossible. But here is the happiest conception of his balance sheet, according to one of the most illustrious business brains in Hollywood:

Say a star earns $500,000 a year—an almost unheard of sum. He can keep $50,000 of it. But the conditions are that he live in a hall room, subsist on graham crackers and water, go nowhere and see no one, and draw on hypothetical savings.

That is not an extreme statement of the matter. That's a fact. Now look once more at the financial statement of the star we have just left. To the extent that he's solvent—"liquid" is the preferred trade term—he's pretty well-heeled. But you saw how far we peeled him down simply by outgo for necessities. We left him no more than $550 at the top for what business managers call "personal living expenses"—and employed the term loosely.

Yet, one of the shrewdest of these men has appraised the personal living expenses of such relatively affluent stars as Joan Crawford, Jane Wyman and Dick and June Allyson Powell as running from $36,000 to $60,000 a year. Our "Star X" has been stranded with only $27,500. Minus shoes.

So here, by deposition of men best situated to know, is what he does.

First, he cuts a few corners. Domestic champagne will do as well as imported, or maybe the guests would settle for aspirin and Coke. His luxury car he may keep because it gives him the reassurance stars need so badly, but he drives it two years instead of one. (Two years, the management offices say, is the ideal economic life for a car anyway. No more, no less.) European and other trips, unless deductible or for sound business reasons, can be relegated to the category of fiddlefaddle. Last year's mink will have to do for Mrs. X. Trifling, but a beginning.

Our beleaguered financial invalid now has to take a positive forward step. That means what the hotshots call "risk capital." He's got a contract and an assured income, and hence credit. On this credit, he borrows money, always under the close supervisory eye of his business brain. With this money, he buys, for example, into income property—pronounced in Hollywood "inkum poppity." Inkum poppity can be a hotel or a motel or an apartment house. Fred MacMurray, whose nest is supposed to be spectacularly well-lined for an actor's, is up to his hair-line in inkum poppity. The idea for Actor X is that he picks up a $75,000 poppity for a down payment only a fraction of that amount, then sits back and lets the money roll in. Or if it doesn't exactly roll in, appreciation of values is working for him.

Alternatively, he can try for a capital gains set-up or a corporative deal or, if he'll accept the advice of one wizard, buy into purebred livestock, said by this man to be a very good thing in 1954. Real estate's not bad, nor

by George Frazier

■ Possibly over a period of say, two years, the most popular recording artist in history is Eddie Fisher. Now, with the burgeoning sales of "Anema e Core," his latest RCA Victor release, he has had sixteen consecutive hits (a hit is a record that sells a minimum of 250,000 copies). As far as I've been able to determine, that's unprecedented. It is always intriguing and often rewarding to try to determine the reason for such pervasive and persistent popularity. In Eddie Fisher's case, I think it is because he seems to be such an ordinary kind of boy.

My own theory is that it is Eddie's lack of any striking distinctiveness that sets him apart. Certainly, it would be a mistake to call him a song stylist. He does not exert himself physically in the way of a Johnnie Ray or a Frankie Laine or a Billy Daniels. He has none of the vocal individuality that makes a Nat Cole, a Bing Crosby or a Frank Sinatra immediately recognizable. It seems to me equally important that Fisher the person isn't a stylist, either. I suspect that only his fans would be able to pick him out of a crowd.

The Fisher phenomenon, a triumph of normalcy, has interested me enormously. I read a piece in this magazine which had to do with the fact that Eddie had managed to make himself cordially disliked while visiting Hollywood a few months ago. I immediately made up my mind to observe him more closely. In recent weeks Eddie has been turning up fairly regularly in the Cub Room of the Stork Club, a retreat to which I often repair for supper on evenings when I've worked late. Between forkfuls of Chicken Hamburger a la Walter Winchell, I studied him.

For one thing, he is undistinguished in appearance. He looks, indeed, very much as you would expect a young man fresh from a singing job at a Catskills resort to look. He is short, compact, dark and extremely boyish. Surrounded by the poised and celebrated—Sir Cedric Hardwicke, Louis Jourdan, Charles Boyer, Lloyd Nolan, John Hodiak, Alfred Drake and Franchot Tone (all of whom were appearing on Broadway) he seemed almost painfully shy. The chic and the glory and the choosiness that are the Stork appeared to overwhelm him. One night he was about to leave when Sherman Billingsley noticed him. "You're not going yet, are you?" said Billingsley.

Eddie looked suddenly apologetic. "Well, er, I—" he said, and then stopped, turned around and sat down. He seemed genuinely touched by the fact that his presence had been noted by an individual who is often described as "the world's most celebrated host." Later, when Eddie's girl was presented with a large bottle of Sortilege perfume, he stammered his appreciation. On a subsequent evening, when Jack Benny and Bob Hope came in after having attended the Friars' testimonial to George Jessel, Fisher gazed at them in unabashed hero worship. He behaved exactly as any youngster of humble origins would have behaved upon finding himself in the presence of fame and wealth. I think this attitude is apparent in his singing. As to Eddie's tactlessness in Hollywood, I find it entirely in accord with his personality. It was the behavior of an unspoiled person. I'm reasonably certain that a more assured celebrity, a shrewder human being, would have assumed a false complexion. Eddie is not sufficiently hypocritical to be able to mask his feelings. Or, to put it perhaps more accurately, he isn't worldly enough to do so.

A long time ago I described Frank Sinatra as "a Frank Sinatra fan," but young Edwin Jack Fishbein's number one hero is Perry Como.

As this is written, a new musical called By The Beautiful Sea is having its out-of-town troubles before opening on Broadway. The troubles do not include the performance of Shirley Booth, who is said to be her usual magnificent self. Nor do they include a beautiful song called "Alone Too Long." No matter how the show fares, this number is certain to become popular, as I think you'll agree when you hear the superb treatment it is accorded by Nat King Cole on the Capitol label.

By the time Beautiful Sea will have reached Broadway, a new dance band will have been heard on many a campus. It is Les Elgart's and you can hear it on the Columbia label. Its best release is a spirited version of "The Varsity Drag." Elgart once played trumpet with such bands as Charlie Spivak's, Woody Herman's and Harry James'. Columbia Records' Mitch Miller urged him to start his own group. It appears to have been a happy decision. If, after trying "The Varsity Drag," you find Elgart's music to your taste, you'll find a full portion of it on a 12-inch LP called "Sophisticated Swing."

Tex Ritter, who did so admirably with "High Noon," sings "Brave Man" (from Paramount's Red Garters) on a new Capitol. It's a fine performance, manly and eloquent and, it goes without saying, western all over the place . . . Jazz fans will be delighted to learn that RCA Victor's new label, called simply "X", will reissue some of the most memorable hot recordings of all time. The initial release will include ten LP's and will be followed each month by two additional LP's . . . In the low-priced field, which includes the splendid releases on RCA Victor's Camden imprimatur, Columbia's Epic label has some items you should investigate without delay—notably, it seems to me, the resonant faces by Count Basie's jumping band . . . Prettiest of the new girl singers (and a distinct bet for the movies) is Epic's Helene Dixon, a lovely blonde from Brooklyn. Her first recording, an Okeh of "The Breeze," excited favorable comment.

The problem of selecting the right equipment on which to play records becomes increasingly important. As I've said in past issues, there are several worthwhile low-priced machines on the market, among them Columbia's excellent "360" table model. But I would be leading you astray if I were to suggest that authentic high-fidelity reproduction can be bought cheaply. According to most experts on such matters, it costs at least $500 to assemble a unit that will provide above-reproach reproduction. I have just heard the Concerto Grand, which is manufactured by the highly-regarded Philips firm of Holland. It's magnificent, but so is the price. $850. On the whole subject of hi-fi, however, I can say that if you are at all mechanically-bent, you can assemble a superb unit more cheaply than you can buy a ready-made one. Eventually, of course, prices will be reduced, particularly when color television achieves a state in which it can provide competition. But until they come down, I can merely repeat that the low-priced machines put out by Columbia, RCA Victor, and Webster are pretty wonderful. END

I flirted with sex

I had aroused desire in my sister's fiance. It never crossed my mind that his prim relationship with my sister was no answer to the deep emotional hunger my behavior aroused in him. Every glance, every provocative pose, every time I had kissed him or teased him and laughed, had carelessly been an invitation to him. Now, like a Frankenstein monster, it stared me in the face.

(Continued from page 79) oil wells if there's oil in them. But he must invest risk capital and remember that high salaries, as a means of net gain, are as quaint today as the dodo.

"No star," said a well-known business consultant recently, "who has come up since 1940 will make a million dollars from pictures. Very few will get 'rich,' a word I'm using to mean 200,000 clear dollars or more. Those days are over. You don't have to feel sorry for the star but you don't have to envy him either."

AND IN SPADES, you do not have to envy Star X's opposite number, the immortal champion of it's-only-money and there's - plenty - more - where - that-came-from. This baby is truly in a spot. You might even wish to drop a wreath on the mangled remains of his billfold some time when you're in town.

We can call him Cornwall Birdbrain. In fact, he is a composite of four well-known stars who must remain nameless.

Cornwall Birdbrain did not have much money when he was a kid. He did not make much money when he was a youth either, nor when he was a young man. In truth, Cornwall Birdbrain was eating doughnuts and coffee two weeks before his twenty-ninth birthday, and not minding it because he never had gotten used to anything much more substantial.

Then all of a sudden Cornwall Birdbrain is making several thousand dollars a week, which strikes him as stage money because how silly can things get?

Cornwall does not want any business managers cramping his style, so he dispenses with any such idea, and shortly rares back and makes a down payment on a $150,000 home. He buys a Cadillac convertible and a Jag to keep it company and a station wagon to keep the Jag company, because a station wagon has always symbolized his ragged dream of opulence.

So has a yacht. So he buys a yacht, bearing in mind that off the shores of southern California, anything longer than a dinghy is a yacht. Cornwall's yacht measures a cool fifty-two feet, including Diesels, and wasn't it the late J. P. Morgan who said that if you had to ask how much a yacht cost to run, you couldn't afford it? Well, Cornwall never even asked.

Cornwall gets so he can't stand the sight of anyone else lifting a check of any kind, and he's the easiest touch in Hollywood. Nothing is softer than Cornwall's heart except his head. Bad debts are deductible but only if bona fide intent to repay is proved, and Cornwall's beneficiaries have no such provable intent. Cornwall says of these loans that he is moved to make them by remembrance of his own bad old days, but psychologists specializing in the star mentality won't give him passing marks on that. It is partially so, but Cornwall's real motives, they say, are over-compensating for all the years he himself was a beggar. Generosity and sentiment are only a small part of it.

Meanwhile, a couple of prior wives who up to now have forgotten Cornwall's middle name abruptly remember it, and Cornwall is paying alimony with both hands. And Wife No. 3, a post-prosperity item, entails a maintenance bill about equal to that of the Super Chief.

Cornwall always has had a secret yen to gamble, and now it bursts loose with an awesome blast. Hollywood snuggles up to two major race tracks, Santa Anita and Hollywood Park, and Las Vegas isn't far away. But Cornwall's judgment is even worse than his luck, and his luck is foul.

And what of Cornwall's business acumen, more fittingly called his gullibility? There are promoters around town who never turn down their beds at night without murmuring a prayer for Cornwall's continued health and earning power.

Not once does it occur to Cornwall Birdbrain that his phase in the sun will not go on forever. Hasn't his astrologist banged him out a scratch sheet saying as much? And he does not read the communications of the able economists of the Hollywood scene, one of whom wrote recently:

"Salaries have taken a terrific bump. I know (that) most salaries that were $175,000 (per picture) against 10% of the gross are now in the neighborhood of $50,000 to $100,000 and 4% or 5% of the gross, or 20% or 25% of the net." And this man is talking of top, established stars. Cornwall's just a skyrocket with freak propulsion.

Mr. Whiskers will be around talking to Cornwall by and by. Indeed, he was seen leaving Cornwall's house only yesterday—frowning. Cornwall, if he thought of it at all, thought Federal taxes were something you paid when you got around to it, state taxes a gag. He needs ready money now, and fast. A loanout picture? His studio, which thought up the fine contractual print Cornwall never bothered to read, says no. Sell the yacht? Who wants it? Call in the loans? From turnips?

Diana gets bitten by lobster.

SOME AUTOGRAPH!

Several years ago I went to Baltimore to see Bedtime For Bonzo, starring Diana Lynn and Bonzo, the chimp. Both stars were there in person and after the movie I saw Diana Lynn in the lobby. As I walked toward her, someone tapped me on the shoulder. I turned around. To my surprise it was Bonzo. He immediately grabbed my finger and bit me. The teeth marks stayed for about three weeks, but fortunately all went well.

Janis Crawford

Las Vegas, incidentally, is not the answer. You have read about stars making whopping amounts for three-week stands there, settling their back taxes, and having plenty left over. Well, here's a sample:

Miss Y, a big picture name, was signed to a three-week engagement for $60,000, payable on the line. Her hotel bill there was $3800, including expenses for entourage, the whole works. Two costumes ran her $1100 apiece, not to mention fittings. Her commutings between Vegas and Hollywood tapped her for more. If she took the engagement to meet back taxes—and she did—she didn't get far, because the $60,000 itself was taxable; in fact, very much so. At the end, she was left with $7000, which went into her depleted tax account.

One may ask, "How about that entourage? Who insisted she take that along?"

No one. But the expression "living it up" is a peculiarly sensitive one in Hollywood, where the vocabulary is not flexible nor notably generous. A careful star is arbitrarily labeled pretty close with a nickel, and that is a sneer. The freespenders are right guys. As long as they have it.

Who's got the money? A quite authoritative list of who's got the money, or who very likely has the money, contains many of the names of those who are adjudged nickel-squeezers. Who ain't got it? Old Bring - me - the - check - waiter - and-keep-a-sawbuck-for-yourself!

The safest guesses at the truly affluent in the film colony go back to pictures' early days, when taxes were trivial, West Los Angeles and Beverly Hills cow pastures, and real estate there going for a song—and the smart investors sang their heads off. The names of these investors will be more familiar to mama than to you, and even more familiar to grandma. And Dun & Bradstreet knows them well.

Mary Pickford has well over a million, or the astutest observers of Hollywood fortunes are crazy. So has Harold Lloyd. And the self-exiled Charles Chaplin, who once and for all made a monkey's uncle of the sage who said: "You can't take it with you." Chaplin did—in amounts that can only be estimated, but the estimates are eye-popping. Marion Davies is not ready for the dole yet.

Of the present crop of performers, the supposed fat cats are mainly veterans or semi-veterans of the screen, and again, one must rely on informed conjecture.

Bing Crosby, enmeshed in a web of enterprises, should be set for life. His fortune has been rated as high as twenty million and as low as one, but no lower than that. MacMurray is by no means destitute but is alleged to become wrathful over any mention of the fact. Gary Cooper was thought to be extraordinarily prosperous until a few months ago, when he sounded off in oddly gloomy tones to one or two friends. These were not too alarmed.

The case of John Wayne, perhaps pictures' most highly rewarded figure, is in abeyance. Two years ago, an intimate has said, you could fairly have called him rich. Two years from now, the same should hold true again. But at the moment, Wayne would appear to be stanching the flow from an awesome wound ripped in his bank-book by his former wife, Chata.

Gene Kelly, no man for throwing quarters out the window, did his eighteen-month European hitch before the loophole in the tax structure had been plugged, and presumably came home fixed for life. Glenn Ford has said he'll never have to work again, and the same may well be true of Pat O'Brien. Joan Crawford has been on the scene for close to twenty-five years and conceivably could be in the rare millionaire class. Victor Mature is a successful businessman who employs the services of the shrewdest advisors; some think he could retire tomorrow. Clark Gable, another of the less-than-reckless spenders, may or may not have it, according to the most cautious advice, but if he doesn't, nobody can figure out where it's gone. The combined incomes of Dick Powell and June Allyson, plus Powell's canniness as an investor, make them likely candidates for authentic wealth. With such steadfasts as Irene Dunne, Loretta Young, Spencer Tracy, Ronald Colman and the duo of Betty Grable and Harry James, stuffed safe deposit boxes are deemed altogether possible.

All these are nominated as likely to own entrenched and plentiful assets.

Among those with high-salaries but nobody knows what kind of savings are Bob Hope, Claudette Colbert, James Cagney, Lucille Ball and Desi Arnaz, Olivia deHavilland, Marlene Dietrich, Frank Sinatra, Barbara Stanwyck, Robert Taylor, Lana Turner, Elizabeth Taylor, Judy Garland, Bud Abbott and Lou Costello, Humphrey Bogart and Lauren Bacall.

At least two of the post-debutante group —Esther Williams and Kathryn Grayson— are reported on very good footing indeed, while two others in a category all their own these days—Shirley Temple and Deanna Durbin—could easily have a mint.

It's the younger crowd who may be most discouraged at not getting a clean crack at Uncle Sam's greenery. Most are believed to be handling what they can get their mitts on sensibly enough—Tony Curtis, Janet Leigh, Marilyn Monroe, Doris Day, Montgomery Clift, Marlon Brando, Ann Blyth, Virginia Mayo and Robert Wagner are cases in point—but what can they get their hands on?

All this looks like quite a list, but it's only a handful. The trouble seems to be that to make money costs too much money, so spare a tear for the big-earning film star if you can.

Who's got the money then? Aga Khan. Couple of Rockefellers. The Nizam of Hyderabad. Oh, and Howard Hughes. He's got money. Has a multiplicity of interests, oil, tools, aircraft, airline and so on, only one of which costs him dough. Motion pictures. He's been losing on that. END what's happening to jerry?

Jerry wants to sing ballads in his pictures that should logically be sung by the heroine—or by Dean Martin. And he was so furious about the script of The Big Top that he didn't want to make the picture. It wasn't until Hal Wallis threatened to take the boys off television and cancel their personal appearances and recording dates that Jerry got back in line.

The rubber-faced comedian's friendship with Janet and Tony Curtis has also cooled. The two young couples were all but inseparable for a couple of years. Patti and Jerry stood up for Janet and Tony when they were married. Almost every weekend found the Curtises out in Pacific Palisades with the Lewises.

Now? Well, you won't get either pair to admit that there's any friction. But last New Year's Eve there was a party at the Curtises'—and Janet hadn't remembered the Lewises. The same night there was a party at the Lewis house and the Curtises weren't asked.

Rapidly, rumors of feud spread through the movie colony. Jerry's press agent even advised the Lewises and the Curtises to make the rounds of the night spots together just to kill off some of the talk.

Modern Screen raises the discussion of Jerry's behavior because we have long admired his great talent and considered him a fine human being. We wouldn't want him to change.

Jerry has contributed untold time and money to charity and to the victims of muscular dystrophy, cerebral palsy, infantile paralysis and other diseases. He has been fined by his union for giving benefit performances without permission. Surely, he has spent thousands of dollars on other people.

We are convinced of Jerry's virtues and we hate to see him unwittingly antagonize his fellow employees.

Al Jolson did that kind of thing as a young man. In spite of his tremendous stature and remarkable public popularity he was once intensely disliked by those who worked with him. We don't want to see this happen to Jerry Lewis.

We hope Jerry won't need to reassure himself about his own value by behaving in a brash and dictatorial way—by appointing himself an authority on music, comedy, and story values—and by losing his friends.

Jerry is a kind, warm-hearted, considerate person. He could become one of our loved, admired and respected comedians.

It must be remembered that Jerry has been under a great strain since he returned from Europe last summer. He has

RECONCILIATION BLUES

Now you see them, now you don't—those happily married (?) couples!

■ It was a big night at the Cocoanut Grove; Gordon MacRae was making a personal appearance. But the real spotlight was stolen from him by two movie stars—who showed up with their wives!

First to arrive were Jeff and Marge Chandler, formerly a fairly happy couple whose devotion was measured in terms of their two cute kids, Jamie and Dana. Last year trouble hit and they went through two separations and two reconciliations. Now it looked as though they might be trying a third. But insiders knew that only a few nights before, Jeff had escorted Susan Hayward to a producer's party and had dated others as well. Hollywood's self-styled love experts speculated that the other dates were a cover-up for an eventual out-in-the-open wooing of Susan and that Marge will start divorce proceedings soon.

Happier hopes were held out for the Gene Nelsons when they arrived together. Sympathy during their recent, much-publicized separation was largely with Mrs. Nelson, who calmly refused to file for divorce and admitted to friends that "Gene has been through something like this before. I'll play me a waiting game." Hence, it was no real surprise to see Gene and Miriam on the same dance floor where, a few months before, Gene and Jane Powell had danced cheek to cheek.

For once, the experts were right. Jeff and Marge Chandler show little chance of getting back together, despite their somewhat glum dates. Gene and Miriam Nelson, on the other hand, have held their marriage slimly but successfully together—though no one actually expects Gene not to stray again.

Oh, those reconciliation blues!

How to use a feminine syringe

YOU'LL find many helpful suggestions on feminine hygiene in the book offered below. Also information on the use of B. F. Goodrich water bottles, ice caps and other rubber products.

The B. F. Goodrich "Sojourn" is a gravity-flow syringe, like those used in hospitals, holds two quarts yet fits in a handy water-proof case.

finished three motion pictures, starred in half a dozen TV shows, appeared at the Copacabana in New York and played countless benefits and dinners.

Jerry pushes himself, driving his meager physical resources to the limit. He ignores his physician's advice and works until he becomes nervous and irritable.

After earning so much money, it seems incredible that Martin and Lewis could be in debt both to the U. S. Government and to Paramount Pictures. They have already paid back more than $750,000, but they spend a remarkable amount of money. Jerry can't buy one pair of slacks or one pair of socks; it's got to be half a dozen in all colors. Dean's support payments to his first wife come to more than $3,000 a month. Between them, they keep twenty-three people on their payroll. You can see how tough it is for them to try to get even now.

According to some old friends, his financial situation is not responsible for Jerry's domineering ways. Others think that's part of it.

"Look," one of them said, "I remember that kid from the 500 Club in Atlantic City. In 1946 his act consisted of mugging to phonograph records. His wife was in the hospital with a new baby and he didn't have the dough to bail her out.

"I don't want to use an overworked line, but the kid was very humble then. Very nice and very grateful for anything good that came along.

"Three years later he was earning $15,000 a week. The hangers-on were gathering around him, and—well—the setup went to his head. He's only twenty-seven, after all. It's only natural."

An actress who used to be his pal and no longer is, says, "Jerry Lewis is a contradictory guy—a strange guy. One minute he's warmhearted and generous. The next he's fighting and quarreling.

"You've got to remember that his success came quickly. By the time he was twenty-two or twenty-three he was earning close to a half million a year. Under circumstances like that it takes great strength of character to keep a level head and a civil tongue. Jerry has begun to throw his weight around.

"Dean's wife recognized that early in the game. She felt and she still feels that Dean is 50% of the act and is entitled to 50% of the attention. That rubbed Jerry the wrong way, and that's why his wife and Jeannie don't mix. That's the way it looked to me, anyway.

"I've seen only one man put Jerry in his place—Hal Wallis. Unfortunately, both Dean and Jerry would like to get out of their contracts with Wallis. It's no secret that they've been more than dissatisfied. They believe they're being exploited in lousy pictures. Actually, their movies have been grossing less and less. It's difficult to find story material for them, but by contract they've got another four or five years to go with Wallis. Maybe that's one reason Jerry has been rather disagreeable of late." But the actress knows Wallis, too.

SHE SAID, "There's another side of the coin. Wallis is a producer of stature and experience. The boys have achieved their greatest popularity under his wing.

"Jerry is lucky to be married to Patti. There's a young woman with both feet on the ground. If it weren't for Patti I think Jerry would be completely unmanageable. She's a settling influence—it was she who got him to the point of sleeping without a gun under his pillow—and if anybody can keep him in line, Patti can."

Jerry likes to say, "I wasn't brought by the stork. The bat brought me." He was named Joseph Levitch when he was born in 1926 to a pair of vaudevillians, Danny and Rea Lewis.

Jerry was brought up in Newark, mostly by his grandmother and his aunt. His parents were on the road most of the time and he felt so lonely and unhappy that he hasn't been able to recover to this day. Probably that's why he has surrounded himself with yes-men and why he cannot abide being alone.

He never really had a definite home. During summer vacations he used to work as a bus boy in resort hotels where his parents were entertaining. At Brown's Hotel in the Catskills he put on a wig and began to do imitations. Irving Kaye, a local comedian, heard Jerry, thought he was hilarious and got him a job in a Buffalo burlesque house.

When the scared fifteen-year-old boy trotted on stage for his debut, the hardened customers shouted their disapproval. "Get off! Bring on the dames!" Jerry started to cry and ran to the wings. Max Coleman, a friend of Jerry's father, persuaded the boy to go back and finish his act.

WITH SUCH a rocky start, it's no wonder Jerry needs constant encouragement and admiration from those around him. He surrounds himself with employees who won't speak up when Jerry steps out of line, either because they don't know or because they won't take a chance on Jerry's reaction. As a boy, Jerry felt inferior too many times to hazard that experience again.

Essentially, Jerry is a moody, melancholy young man with a genius for mimicry that can take him out of his depression into the world of responsive laughter. So, again, he must have an audience.

The Lewis house is usually filled with people—Patti never knows how many will stay for dinner—all assuring Jerry that he is the greatest. He demands boundless loyalty of his friends. He gets jobs for acquaintances, gives them money, puts them on his payroll. In return he expects slavish devotion over and above the bounds of normal gratitude. Apparently, he has not yet realized that this is too much to ask. People can't give it. If they could, it wouldn't be worth much.

When they refuse to build their lives with Jerry as the cornerstone, there is bitterness and tapering-off friendship.

Under Jerry's wackiness there is perception and shrewdness. Probably he knows what's happening, but he does not or cannot stop it.

He knows he should relax, vacation, enjoy himself, but he doesn't. Maybe he can't. He loves to entertain. He is compassionate, generous, humanitarian and—like all great entertainers—stubborn and self-centered. Many Paramount employees will testify that he has done more for people than any actor on the lot. He is genuinely and deeply loved. It is a shame that a young man who formerly had only friends should now have enemies, too.

Of the explanations for this untoward behavior of late, probably the most valid is that Jerry and Dean are unhappy about their work in Hollywood. Several months ago they tried to buy back their contract. Hal Wallis wouldn't sell.

Since then, Jerry's temperament has been showing. END

Marriage at 15, motherhood at 16, divorce at 17—that was Sheree North, Hollywood's newest cyclonic blonde

Read all about her in MODERN SCREEN next month!

why duke likes them latin

Blondes leave him cold. Always have.

"Just a matter of taste," he explains. The rugged six-foot four-inch he-man is a sucker for señoritas.

The third Mrs. Marion Mitchell Morrison (Duke's real name) will surely be the black-eyed, black-haired beauty from Lima, Peru, twenty-four-year-old Pilar Pallete (pronounced pall-ette-ay).

By California law Duke cannot marry anyone until October 29, 1954, when he will receive his final divorce decree. If Pilar has obtained her divorce by that time, there will probably be a wedding.

DUKE AND PILAR are virtually inseparable these days. There doesn't seem to be much danger of any sudden breakup.

Pilar worships Duke and he, in turn, is extremely proud of her, and with good reason. Pilar is quiet and well-bred and knows how to make a dollar stretch.

Duke introduced her to his friends at the Gay Nineties Party given by his agent, Ned Marin. Everybody approved of Pilar.

An actress, noted for her acid tongue, said, "It looks to me as if Duke's gotten himself a winner in this girl. She's very polite, very lady-like, very appreciative.

"Of course I think there are prettier girls right here in Hollywood but Pilar is certainly an improvement over Chata. She's a naive sort, but I think Duke likes that type. Certainly they seem happy together."

When Duke was asked why he preferred Latin American beauties to the home-grown varieties, he was candid as usual.

A visitor from Las Vegas (says Hal Peary) saw a Coney Island merry-go-round and yelled, "You people must be nuts, gambling away your kids!"

Earl Wilson from The New York Post

"Look," he said. "I'm a fellow that happens to like girls. All girls. Only you can't like everyone in the same degree.

"No nation has a monopoly on beauty. I consider Latin American girls very exciting, very warm, very lovely. They have a strong feeling for home-life, for family life. And so have I.

"I like to take my vacation in Mexico and countries below the border. The Latins know how to relax, how to take it easy. They're never slaves to time. Up here I'm so darn busy it seems to me that I'm running all the time. That's why I go South.

"When a man is relaxing in Mexico, he meets Mexicans. When he's vacationing in Peru, he meets Peruvians. Years ago, if I'd taken a vacation in Sweden, maybe I would've wound up with a Swedish girl. Who knows? Friendships are frequently the result of geography and circumstance, and of course, individual taste.

"I happen to prefer brunettes. Sue me."

Duke hates to discuss his private life. He doesn't talk much about his plans with Pilar. When they were touring Las Vegas a few months ago, someone asked, "You two kids eloping?"

Pilar smiled and said nothing.

Duke merely grinned and muttered, "No. The judge made me promise that I wouldn't get married until November."

MARRIAGE COUNSELORS say that when a man marries more than once, the chances are very good that his subsequent wives will resemble his first. They say that unwittingly every man likes to improve on his failure, to start with some already known quantity.

Certainly this seems to be true of Duke Wayne. The failure of his first marriage to Josephine Saenz has been well hashed over. Some people claimed that Josephine was too social and that Wayne couldn't abide that sort of tea-party life. But they didn't know the Waynes..

More likely, the problems arose from the fact that Duke is Protestant and Josephine Catholic, and that, as the years went by, they began to grow apart.

There were four children in the ten-year period, but during that time, Duke was working so hard and so long that he spent very little time at home. He was just a beginner in the motion picture game, and he used to make a Western quickie in a little under three weeks.

Duke is a lusty, rugged, earthy, homespun man who enjoys the society of people like himself. To him the most important things are work, loyalty and love.

His first wife could not exactly understand or fit in with his philosophy. Duke has always believed in the sanctity of the home, and this divorce really broke him up. So he went down to Mexico.

In Mexico City he happened to meet Esperanza Bauer at a film luncheon. They started going together. Duke thought he had found a young woman who had all of Josephine's virtues and none of her faults.

"I thought," he was to say later, "that Chata would be satisfied with the simple things of life, a home, a family, friends.

"I didn't expect any wife of mine to go on location and shoot craps with the crew or to get loaded and fall all over herself in night clubs or to pair up with her old lady and hold a gun on me."

Duke has always fallen for Latin American girls because he thinks they are brought up to respect the institution of marriage, to respect their husbands and to understand that in a man's scheme of life, his work is paramount.

In Duke's book, Latin American girls are rarely flighty or sophisticated.

"They have a realistic sense of values," he once said. "And that's very important in a marriage. And another thing—they are wonderful with children.

"My four kids, for example. They're good kids and they're well-behaved. And all the credit for that must go to their mother. Over the years she's handled those children with complete mastery. And I'm as grateful to her for that as I can ever be."

Duke was under the impression that Chata was a woman who would subjugate her way of life to his. It didn't work out, and since the differences have been aired in court, there is no point in repeating them.

THE CRUCIAL question is whether or not Pilar Pallete will be able to fill the role of Duke's dream wife. Admittedly, Duke at forty-six, is not an easy man to live with. He is set in his ways, his friends, his business and his outlook.

At times he is brusque, ill-tempered and quick-to-anger, perhaps because he has consistently overworked in the mistaken belief that his popularity will be short-lived.

"An actor's hot for only a very few years," is one of his favorite remarks.

On the other hand, he is kind, considerate and generous to a fault. If he loves a woman the sky's the limit.

Chata, for example, testified in court that her monthly household expenditures approximated $13,000. She also drove a Cadillac convertible and had charge accounts in all the leading shops.

Even now she lives in a beautiful apartment in the swank Sunset Towers and lives

MEADOWS IN THE CLOVER

Audrey sometimes gets pie in the face and Jayne usually gets killed in the second act—but TV is the field for the Meadows.

Comedienne Audrey appears as panelist on CBS morning show, I'll Buy That. She was introduced to television by comic Phil Silvers.

Dramatic actress Jayne sits on the I've Got A Secret panel and often plays leads on such shows as Studio One and Suspense.

Jayne's most frequent date is popular comedian Steve Allen of What's My Line? and —of course—The Steve Allen Show.

On Saturday nights Audrey plays Jackie Gleason's pert wife in "The Honeymooners," one of Jackie's most uproarious sketches.

Born in China, both girls confuse escorts by talking Chinese to each other when double-dating, as kids spoke nothing else.

Until recently, Jayne was married to director Milton Krim. Audrey says she has no time for marriage, has never been engaged.

■ Every time you flip your TV dial, you come up with a Meadows sister. Since they dress alike, sound alike and live together, you can also flip your lid trying to figure out which Meadows is which. Which is why they never appear on the same show and probably never will—even if they could find a script tailored for one Grade-A comedienne and one Capital-A actress—or just for two beautiful and talented girls with a special talent for being confusing in the world's most confusing city—New York—and New York's most confusing industry—TV! extremely well on the $5,000 a month she gets from Duke as part of her alimony.

Duke also expects that his friends will become his wife's friends. Bo Roos, Ward Bond, Jack Ford, Jimmy Grant, Paul Fix, the whole gang must be treated well.

Duke cannot abide snobbery or high-handedness in any form. And that goes double for deceit.

Obviously Wayne feels that Pilar Pallete can meet his requirements.

When he gives a girl his heart, he doesn't give it lightly. His intentions have always been matrimonial and once he gets married he never strays. Although hundreds of dollars were spent by Chata and her attorney in an effort to uncover some evidence linking Duke with adultery in the seven years of their marriage, no such evidence was ever found.

When a wife disillusions him, he is quickly hurt and disgusted. And the next thing anyone knows he's pulled out of Hollywood and is wandering over Central or South America.

Then he meets another Latin American beauty who rekindles his flame and faith in the essential goodness of wifehood.

That's how Duke found Pilar Pallete.

They met in 1952 when Duke had flown to Peru to get Chata out of his mind and out of his heart. He knew by then the marriage was finished.

IN PERU the heart-broken actor decided to scout some jungle locations for a Wayne-Fellows production which was later shot in Mexico. He went up into the Peruvian jungle near the Amazon River where a local motion picture outfit was shooting Sabotage In The Jungle.

Pilar Pallete was playing one of the leads in this picture, and Duke was introduced to her. It wasn't love at first sight, but there was rapport between these two.

One of Pilar's friends who was secretary to producer Edward Movius, said, "Pilar knew all about Duke. After all, he's one of the most famous movie stars in the world. But Duke didn't know anything about Pilar. It didn't take him very long to find out. Pilar speaks good English. Also her eyes are very expressive.

"She was married to Dick Weldy, the Panagra public relations chief in Lima. She was his secretary, and when he got a divorce he married Pilar. So that Pilar knows what it is to live with an American. Anyway when she met Duke, she and Weldy were separated, and her divorce should come through any day now.

"Pilar comes from a respected Lima family. Her father was a senator and she and her three sisters were sent to good schools. When Pilar finished Lima High School she got a job as an airline hostess.

"Last year she flew up to Hollywood, and Duke gave her a screen test."

Duke and Pilar have been going together ever since. And as her love for Duke has increased, Pilar's desire for an acting career has waned.

She lives in a small apartment, makes many of her own clothes, and is Duke's constant companion when he isn't working.

Duke's friends like her fine. "She's a lady," they say. She finds all of them great fun.

At a recent party she spent most of the night snapping pictures of all the guests with a new Polaroid camera Duke had given her. One director said to Wayne, "Duke, I like Pilar. She is the first actress I've ever met who would rather take pictures than pose for them."

Duke grinned.

"Pilar's okay," he said. Then he walked over and slipped his arm around her shoulder. As the guests watched him, they all understood that it was just a question of time before she would become his wife. END

(Continued from page 29) who wanted a home and children, willingly signed an agreement before the wedding, waiving any claim to half of Jess' fortune (which otherwise would be hers under California community property law). Now, almost ten years later, Susan and Jess come to the divorce court—but the situation is reversed. Jess has been "between pictures" for several years; Susan is a big star; and it is Jess who wants to write off the premarital agreement!

Both Susan and Jess want to do what's best for their nine-year-old twins, but they don't agree at all on what's best. They seem to have been good parents. It was significant that their only complaints about each other's parental behavior were their fears that the children would be prejudiced and confused by their parents' rivalry for their loyalty.

If Susan and Jess are sincere in their wishes to protect their children—and apparently they are—they have chosen a remarkable way to do it. It's too late now to save their sons from unspeakable humiliation.

It's clear that Gregory and Timothy have been friendly and close to both of their parents, but that's all over now. What they've read and what they've overheard between their parents and about them has hurt them and filled them with mistrust and embarrassment.

Last July their home slid out from under them and their family became a public spectacle. If their elders can't handle the situation with dignity, how can a couple of nine-year-olds handle it?

After the lawyer who had drawn up the agreement had testified, the Plaintiff, Susan Hayward, took the stand to describe the fight in which she got her famous black eye. The case was heard by Judge Herbert Y. Walker. Miss Hayward's attorneys: Martin Lang and Milton A. Rudin; Mr. Barker's: S. S. Hahn.

(The testimony here is taken directly from the transcript of the Superior Court. Omissions are indicated by three dots; breaks in continuity by three asterisks.)

Q What time of the day or night was it?

A Well, it was late at night, because my husband had gone out to get the late editions of the newspapers; it was on his return.

Q Who was at home on that night, July 16, 1953?

A My husband and myself and my house guest.

Q Where were the boys?

A And my children were upstairs.

Q All right. And it was after dinner then, late at night, about eleven or twelve at night?

A Yes. We had been talking before this.

Q What were you doing on that occasion?

A I had been studying, and Mr. Barker had been watching television.

Q Studying what?

A My script, or a script. I can't remember right now whether I was working on something at the time or preparing.

Q When Mr. Barker went out for the late editions of the newspapers, where were you at the time he came back?

A In the living room.

Q Can you describe what happened on that occasion?

A Yes. As I said before, we started to argue. We argued about most of the things we've argued about in the past. I remember one thing; that I asked Mr. Barker for a divorce, because I said to him, under the circumstances, that I felt a divorce might be the only solution to these problems. He said I would never get a divorce.

Q Did you discuss the question of employment, or his not working?

A Yes; this was part of our argument.

Q And the effect on the children?

A Yes.

Q Give the conversation, please.

A As well as I can remember, it wound up in the fact that he said to me I'd never get a divorce. And I said, "If you don't love me, and don't want to do what I consider right, why do you want to hang on?" And he said, "Well, you're a good meal ticket."

Well, when he said that, I didn't understand, and I looked at him, and I said, "I don't understand you. I think you're very queer."

Q What did he do?

A And he walked over to where I was sitting and he slapped me.

Q In the face, Mrs. Barker?

A Yes.

Q Go ahead; proceed.

A I was frightened. I said, "Don't." So he

PAVEMENT POUNDING

Old Mother Hubbard came out of the suburbs to help out a dog in distress.

■ Twenty-three years ago, a tall, dark-haired pavement artist was working around London's Embankment. His offer: to chalk portraits on the pavement or to sketch them on postcards. His price was threepence and "your money back if you're not satisfied."

He showed so much talent that one customer asked him why he wasn't in art school. He replied respectfully, "I am. I'm only doing this to raise a little money. I'm trying to save my dog from the public pound."

The woman never forgot that boy nor his love for animals. She died a few months ago at the age of eighty-four. She bequeathed him $150 of her $175,000 estate. She was Mrs. Mary Valentine Salvage, and in her youth she was one of Britain's top secret agents.

The young artist she remembered in her will was Michael Wilding. In Paris he was notified of the bequest. "It was a long time ago," he said, "but I remember her. A friend and I were working as pavement artists. We earned seven shillings, sixpence to save our dog, but some titled lady had come along and bought her out of the pound, so we were left with the seven and six."

Today, Michael Wilding and his animal-loving wife, Elizabeth Taylor, have four dogs and five cats.

slapped me again. I tried for him not to hit me. He threw me on the floor, and pulled off my robe, and proceeded to beat me.

Well, when my husband was beating me, I tried to get loose from him, first of all, because it hurt; secondly, because there were children in the house, and Martha Little, who is not well. I didn't want to disturb them. But when he beat me, it hurt, and I was crying.

So finally I got loose and ran out of the house into the back garden. I just wanted to get away. Mr. Barker caught up with me; he forced me back into the house. I was struggling with him, and he hit me again.

Q Where did he hit you, do you remember? I know it's tough, but we've got to do it.

A I don't remember where he hit me; he hit me wherever he could.

Q What were you wearing, by the way, Mrs. Barker?

A I was wearing a terry-cloth bathrobe.

Q And what underneath that?

A Nothing. I sleep in the raw.

Q All right. Then he was dragging you back in the house. Continue the story.

A When he continued to beat me, I had to get help. I ran to the telephone. I was going to dial the operator, call the police, or anything I could.

Q What happened?

A He came after me and knocked the telephone out of my hand, and he said, "I'll cool you off," whereupon he yanked me by the arm, and dragged me out again, back through the garden and up the steps to the swimming pool.

Q And what did he do then?

A He threw me in.

Q And will you relate what happened after he threw you in?

A Well, as I said, I was wearing this terry-cloth robe, and it's pretty full. It's a big, pink, voluminous thing, and when I hit the water, the water soaked it up, and I went down. It's hard to get up because there are many folds in a garment. I got up to the top, and I started screaming again, because I was afraid, whereupon he pushed my head under the water.

Q Were you in fear of your life?

A Of course I was.

Q And what did you do after he held your head under the water—pushed it under?

A I suddenly realized that I was not dealing with a person who was quite themselves. I knew that he was so highly enraged that he wasn't responsible for his actions that night.

Q So what did you do?

A So when I came up the second time, I kept my mouth shut, and didn't make any noise. He said, "Now get back into the house." So I went quietly.

Q What happened to the terry-cloth bathrobe?

A That was soaking wet; and as I said, it was very heavy. It was left by the pool side.

Q And you therefore had to go into the house without any clothes on at all?

A Yes.

Q What happened then? Proceed. You walked in with Mr. Barker behind you?

A Yes. I walked in the house with Mr. Barker. He pushed me into the bedroom, and he said, "Now stay there." Naturally, by this time I was pretty scared, and I knew I had to get out and get help somehow, because I didn't want to stay in the same house with him. So I went to the closet and threw on whatever clothes I could find. . . . There's a little door that leads out of the bedroom, a side door, so I didn't have to go out around again through the den where I thought he might be. I opened the door quietly and walked through the garden, and then, as I remember it, around by the kitchen door, because that leads out into the driveway, and freedom. I got as far as the kitchen door, and it was suddenly—I hate to tell these things.

Mr. Gang: I don't know what else we can do.

A It was suddenly opened by Mr. Barker. He said, "Where do you think you're going? Get back in there." At least I think that's what he said; it's hard to remember. . . .

THE COURT: You can't remember exactly. The Court wouldn't believe you if you gave me the exact wording. Give it as near as you can recollect.

THE WITNESS: He grabbed me and threw me into the kitchen ahead of him, and that was lucky, because he threw me with such momentum that I could race to the front door. You go through the kitchen and the dining room and the hallway to the front door. And I opened it, and I ran out, and I ran down the driveway, and he caught up with me, and started to hit me again. He said, "You're not going anywhere."

Q. Proceed.

A At this point, of course, again I was screaming for help. I was screaming the man's name next door. It was dark outside, and I was screaming for help from the man across the street, anybody.

The next thing I remember, he tried to get me into the house, and I refused to go, and I was struggling with him, and he threw me over the hedge and I was down on the ground, and he still kept beating me. And that's all I can remember until Martha came out the front door, and she yelled, "What's going on?" because—

Q "Martha" was Martha Little, your house guest?

A That's right. She came out the front door, and she ran over and said, "Stop it; stop it." Well, when she said that to him, he stopped momentarily, and I ran back into the house and grabbed the telephone, because I was going to call the police. He ran back in after me, and again knocked it out of my hand. And then suddenly, I don't know, there was a commotion outside, and I ran out, and the police were there. I said, "Would you please call me a taxi?" I told the policeman—

Q By the way, do you know who called the police?

A No, I don't; I never reached them.

Q Proceed. What happened?

A So, when I asked the policeman to call me a taxi, I must have looked a mess. I said I wanted to go to my mother's house. So they called me a taxi. They offered to drive me in their squad car, but I said that wasn't necessary. So they called a cab, and I got in it, and Miss Little came with me, and we went over to my mother's house . . .

Q You spent the night at your mother's house?

A Yes. And then I tried to reach your office in the morning, and I wasn't successful, so I called Mr. Wood, my business manager, at his home, and asked him would he go back to the house with me, and ask Mr. Barker please to leave. Also, my brother came with me.

Q And you went back to the house the next morning?

A Yes.

Q With Mr. Wood and your brother?

A Yes, and Miss Little.

Q And Mr. Barker left the house that day?

A Yes he left the house that day.

Q It was after that that you filed your Complaint for Divorce, and asked for a restraining order?

A As soon as I could reach your office, one of your attorneys came to my home; I explained to him what happened.

Q And did you secure medical treatment for your injuries?

A Yes. I was X-rayed, and taken care of.

Q And can you describe what your injuries consisted of as a result of what had happened the night before?

A You want a description of how I looked?

Q Yes. What were your bruises, contusions?

A Well, I had a black eye, I guess you call it; bruises on the left side of my face, on the temple, the jaw, the nose. I thought my jaw was broken. The eyeball was injured—it was all bloody. My body was covered with bruises, mostly on my "fanny" (indicating), and my feet and legs were scratched and bleeding.

Q What was that from?

A From being dragged up the steps and down the steps, and being knocked against things.

Q And how long a period of time did it take before the visible evidences of your injuries cleared up?

A Well, that black eye lasted quite a while.

THE COURT: That still doesn't answer the question about how long.

Q By Mr. Gang: About how long?

A I don't know; I didn't keep count of it.

Q About a week, or two weeks?

A Two weeks.

Q Now, Mr. Barker did not live at the home from that time on, did he?

A He did not.

Q Did he come to take the children with him on occasion?

A Yes, he did.

Q Would you, on those occasions, see him?

A Yes, sometimes I would.

Q And he would not stay at the house, however?

A No.

Q Just come and get the children, and bring them back?

A That's right. Or if he wanted to pick up any of his clothes, or things like that.

That's most of what Susan Hayward remembered in court about the fight on July 16-17. But this is the way Jess Barker remembered the same evening.

Q . . . Let's begin with the fact that you were out, and then you came home about a certain hour, and let us start from there . . . What happened?

A . . . We went home, had our usual drinks before dinner—never less than two . . .

After dinner I was sitting in front of the television set for a while, and the programs were dull, and I left it. Mrs. Barker wasn't studying a script, because she wasn't working at the time, and there were no scripts, to my knowledge, that had been sent to her. She had just finished a picture . . .

Q You know about scripts?

A I should know; I have worked with them enough.

Q You studied the scripts with her?

A Always.

Q And you advised her?

A Yes, I did.

Q And what else do you do helping prepare for the work as a star?

A To give her every bit of knowledge I have had in the years in the theater, and what I have had in the motion picture business.

Q Did you attend interviews with her?

A I was frequently present in interviews with magazines and newspaper people. Quite frequently Mrs. Barker would ask me to join, as she termed it the "light touch."

Q Did you have to advise her about costumes at the studios?

A I was with Mrs. Barker on practically every picture she started on the costumes, and I saw the tests made, suggested camera angles, anything connected with her work.

Q In addition to that, you bought the groceries for the house?

A I bought the groceries for the house.
Q And you bought the supplies, and maintenance for the home?
A I did to the best of my ability.
Q And raise the children?
A That I did to the best of my ability.
Q All right. Now, tell us what happened from there on. You say she was not working?
A Mrs. Barker was sitting in front of the television set when I went to get the newspapers . . .

Mrs. Barker . . . started reading . . . I had a newspaper . . .
Q And what happened? What was done by you or her?
A There was a discussion about families in general in Hollywood—not gossip—just in general, about this person, and that person, which is the way many of our conversations started out. During the course of the conversation, something was said where a remark about my mother was brought into the conversation. Why it was there, I don't know.
Q What remark did she make about your mother?
A Well, it isn't very pleasant. It was about an incident I told her about when I was a child. "Possibly," she said, "that's what's wrong with you." . . .

. . . after the mention of my mother, I sat in complete stunned silence; and Mrs. Barker gave me all of the bad things that she could think about me.

Q What did you do then?
A I sat on the couch. I stayed right there wondering why a woman that I had all the respect for in the world should say that to me, the father of her children. Mrs. Barker leaned across me to get a cigarette, and said right in my face, "Besides, I think you're queer." And with that, I think I said, "You're not going to get away with that." And I slapped her, and the struggle was on from then on.

She struggled back. I tried to quiet her down, and by this time Mrs. Barker got hold of me, and bit me very hard in the left arm, in the muscle . . .

Q Then what happened? How did you get to the swimming pool?
A Mrs. Barker ran outside; I brought her back inside. I let her back inside; and I gave Mrs. Barker a spanking . . .

I asked her to please keep quiet, the children were upstairs, and I picked her up, carried her and put her into bed, and covered her. . . . And Mrs. Barker got up again, and ran outside, and I said, "If you don't keep quiet I'm going to cool you off."
Q What did you do to cool her off?
A I picked Mrs. Barker up, carried her to the pool, and dropped her in.
Q Which side of the pool did you drop her in, the nine feet deep or the three feet deep?
A It's approximately four feet deep . . . The robe, by the way, that she was wearing, slipped right off.

And I said, "Now are you cooled off?" And Mrs. Barker was still screaming, and I helped her out of the pool, and took her back in the house. Mrs. Barker never entered the parkway area gate in the nude—never . . .

Q Did you ever drag her?
A I never dragged Mrs. Barker. Mrs. Barker fell on a couple of occasions pulling away from me, yes . . .

Q You did not try to drown her as she says?
A No, Mr. Hahn. I helped Mrs. Barker out of the pool . . .

Q Then you went back in the house, and what happened then?
A Mrs. Barker was in the room for quite some time, and I was in the den, and in the state I was in, I decided to take a walk in front of the home.

I was sitting outside by the driveway which has the drain, and Mrs. Barker came out fully dressed with a coat on; I mean fully dressed apparently to the eye, with a scarf over her head. She had the dog in her arm, and she was going down the street in the dark . . . I tried to get her back, and there was a struggle . . . I took her to the front door, and asked Mrs. Little to please put Mrs. Barker to bed, and she said, "I will."
Q That's the first time you saw Mrs. Little that night?
A That's the first and only time I saw Mrs. Little until she left shortly after that with Mrs. Barker . . . Mrs. Little opened the door and was waiting.
Q And then the police arrived?
A . . . I sat on the front doorstep, or stoop, and sat there until a gentleman walked up to me in uniform and said, "What's the trouble here?" And the only word I spoke to the gentleman was, "Domestic."

Q Did you at any time throw her over a fence of some sort?
A I did not.
Q Did you at any time hear her scream loud and long, "Don't kill me, don't kill me?"

A I don't remember that.
Q Did you try to kill her?
A No, sir, I did not.
Q Did you try to do her any physical harm other than what you say you considered she deserved, a spanking?
A I did nothing else, Mr. Hahn.

A I left the home in the hopes that the home would be reunited and perpetuated . . . I was back on a Tuesday with flowers. This is the first occasion . . .

Q You brought her flowers for your and her anniversary?
A I did.
Q She accepted them?
A Yes.
Q She appreciated them?
A She thought they were lovely . . .

A third witness was called to describe the same incident. Her testimony came between Susan Hayward's and Jess Barker's. Her name is Dodee Hazel Swain and she had been a maid at the house next door to the Barkers'. And she had a room with a view.

Q . . . you could see from your bedroom into the area in which the pool is located?
A Yes.
Q All right. Now, on the night of July 16-17 of 1953, did anything occur which you remember at this time?

A In the early morning of July 17, I was awakened with a loud scream—a lady's voice.

And then I got up out of bed with the loud scream still on. Then I went back to my bathroom and I went straight to the back kitchen door, and I stood in the doorway looking and listening.
Q At this time of the morning were there lights on in the yard of the Barker home?
A There was two lights, big headlights, in the backway.
Q And did you see anything at that time? . . .

A I saw a lady run by out of the gateway, the back of the house, and she didn't have on anything. If she did, it was very sheer to me.

A few minutes after she was in the house, I heard a loud scream, then they ran outside in the backway, direction of the pool, and I heard screaming real loudly, and she was screaming, "Don't kill me; don't kill me," and "Somebody help me; somebody help me; please don't kill me." I heard a man mumbling, said, "You're going to sign that deal." She said, "No, no." And I heard a big splash as if something bumped in the water, and she was screaming and struggling. And then I heard conversation out near the pool, but I couldn't see, so I just heard the mumbling. I couldn't understand what was saying otherwise . . .
Q And did you go back to bed?
A I stood there for a little while, and then I laid back down. And later, in the early morning, I heard a man in the backway, two men, talking. I didn't even get up to see who it was.
Q Now, did you recognize any distinctive part of the person you saw running—the lady; was her hair noticeable to you in the light?
A It was kind of red—reddish-like . . .

Q Was the person you saw Mrs. Barker?
A I would say she was.
Mr. Gang: Thank you very much. You may cross examine.

Mr. Hahn: Did you notice that naked lady again?

A . . . I saw her twice.
Q All right. Now, after you saw her run into the door, when did you see her again?
A When she ran out the back door next to where I am.

Q Did you notice her for just about a second again?
A It was running so fast I guess it was a second.
Q And that lady was still naked?
A Yes.

Q Where did the naked lady run after she got to the driveway?
A In the direction of the pool. I don't know where she ran after that.
Q That's the last you saw of the naked lady?
A That's right.

Q When did you hear somebody yell, "Don't kill me, don't kill me," after she ran to the swimming pool, or when the naked lady ran through the door the first time?
A When she ran back to the swimming pool.
Q That's the first time you heard a lady say, "Don't kill me?"
A No. She was just hollering when I was awake. I was awakened with a scream; that's what I told you.
Q Yes, and with screams, "Don't kill me?"
A Yes, when she ran back to the pool, and there was some slaps like that . . . Then I heard her hollering, "Don't kill me . . . somebody help me . . ." Then I heard a man's voice say, "You're going to sign that deal," and she said no, and splash, he throwed her in the pool, and there was a scrambling, and scrambling, and that's the way it was . . .
Q A scrambling over a deal?
A In the water.
Q Did you go over there and look?

A No, I didn't go over, because I didn't want to interfere.

Q Did you call the police?

A I didn't call the police, because I didn't want to interfere . . .

Q . . . When you saw the naked lady run in the house, and when you saw the naked lady run out of the house in the swimming pool, you didn't see a man follow her?

A Yes, there was a man following her, but I didn't look at that second. He was sure following . .

Q Now, when the man's voice said, "Sign the deal," where was that?

A That was outside.

Q Outside, when she ran out the first time or second time?

A The second time.

Q Well, how soon after she ran out towards the swimming pool did you hear a man say, "You'll have to sign this deal"?

A It wasn't long afterwards, because that's when the most screaming was.

Q About how long?

A About a few seconds. I don't know just how long it was, but it wasn't very long.

Q How long did this yelling, "Save me; don't let him kill me," go on?

A It went on quite a while, because I don't see why somebody in the neighborhood didn't hear beside me . .

Q How long did they talk quietly in the swimming pool, in that direction, after the screaming stopped?

A Quite a while, I guess, because I went and laid down.

The Barkers were the only witnesses who appeared to describe their next struggle. Their disagreement about what happened on Labor Day was greater than their disagreement on the other fight. Miss Hayward was examined first.

Q What occurred on the Labor Day week end of 1953?

A I had taken the children and gone to Hawaii, and we had sort of a vacation, and I hadn't seen Mr. Barker, and he called and asked if he might take them out on Labor Day. And I said, "Of course." And they came back, and they were happy together. They were all, you know, laughing—stuff like that. I had guests, Mr. and Mrs. Dorsen.

We were up by the pool. I guess Jesse brought the children back about around six o'clock, and as is the custom in our home, we dine early, usually six-thirty, latest a quarter of seven, because of the children. The children always eat with me.

As Mr. Barker came in, he knew Mr. and Mrs. Dorsen, and I felt it would be embarrassing for me not to ask him up at least to say hello, because the children would wonder why I didn't ask him. So I asked him would he come up and join us in cocktails. We had just started. He said he'd like to, and he came up by the pool side, and he poured himself a drink.

We discussed this and that, social conversation, and then he said he'd like to talk to me. I said, "All right." Mr. and Mrs. Dorsen left, and went down into the house.

I said, "Please, Jesse, will you please be sort of quick about it, because dinner is almost ready and I don't want any delay." He started to talk about reconciliation . . .

Q What did you say?

A I said it was impossible, and I didn't want a reconciliation. I felt it would be better for both of us to be apart. He is sort of insistent, and, well, to make a long story short, he didn't want to leave. This caused delays in the kitchen, in my guests, and the children wondering why dinner wasn't there, and why their mother wasn't ready to sit down.

I asked him again and again to please leave—"Let's talk about it some other time, not tonight." It was a holiday; I had guests; it was time for dinner.

Mr. Barker said he would leave when he was good and ready to leave.

Q Did the guests come in at any time?

A Yes, they did. They came in to see what was wrong, and tried to persuade him to leave. They were unsuccessful.

Q Then what happened?

A Well, I was furious, because I tried to get him to leave peaceably, because I didn't want there to be any disturbance . . . The children were there, and I had guests, and besides, it's not good. I was quite furious. He was sort of standing near me, and I had a cigarette in my hand; it was lit; and I have a temper, and I said, "I would like to push this cigarette right in your eye."

Q What did he say?

A He said, "You haven't got the guts."

Q What did you do?

A Whereupon I proceeded to push it in his face.

Q What did he do?

A He put up his hand (indicating) and then smacked me.

Q You did not succeed in getting the cigarette in his face?

A This I can't remember.

Q But you remember—

A I aimed.

Q And did you get smacked?

A Yes, I got smacked.

Q What happened then?

A Well, I yelled, and Thelma came running in.

Q Who is Thelma?

A She's Mrs. Dorsen.

Q All right; continue.

A Oh, I forgot when they came in before, they tried to calm down the argument, and said, "Well, have another drink, and then leave." So Thelma went out into the kitchen to make this drink, and as she ran back into the room, when I screamed, she had the drink in her hand, and I grabbed the drink and threw the contents of the glass in Mr. Barker's face.

Q And where were the children?

A They were in the dining room. Mr. Dorsen, as I understand it, was talking with them about various things, trying not to let them hear the commotion going on in the house; but it was pretty loud. Mr. Barker said that he didn't hit me, and that I was a liar.

Q In whose presence did he make that statement?

A Mrs. Dorsen, although other people could hear him, because he said it pretty loud. I just wanted him to get out of there; and I ran into the kitchen, and he ran after me; and I ran into the den, and he ran after me, and insisting I didn't tell the truth, and that I was a liar.

Q Did the children hear this?

A Yes, of course; they must have heard it, although they didn't say anything to me about it.

Q All right; proceed.

A Well, finally he was prevailed upon to leave. He left. That's all.

Q What happened after that?

A I called you the next day. I said it was impossible, that I want a divorce, and I want it fast . . .

But Jess's report is quite different.

Q Let's go to . . . the Labor Day incident. Tell us exactly what happened there, briefly, when you came over . . .

A . . . I said, "Do you mind if I take the boys down to Studio City and see your picture, White Witch Doctor?" because they had been promised to see it. And I said, "Would you join us?" Naturally, I was refused; however, I did take the boys to see their mother.

We returned home afterward in a very happy frame of mind. The boys talked about the picture, and I felt that they liked it very much, which I was very proud that they had seen their mother and enjoyed her performance.

I was invited up to the pool, and Mr. and Mrs. Dorsen were present.

I asked Mrs. Barker if I could speak to her, and Mrs. Dorsen left the pool and we chatted quite a while; and Mrs. Barker informed me that: "How did it feel to know I'd be the recipient of $100,000 at the end of the week?" I thought it was a rather large amount. My remark was, "Is that all?" I didn't know what she was talking about.

She told me—she informed me she was going ahead and get a divorce.

At this point, Barker testified that he had been going to the marriage counselor under the impression that he was a psychiatrist and that their visits to him were for the purpose of working out a reconciliation.

We were going for a reconciliation, but Mrs. Barker told me since then that she was going merely for the children, which she said, about how the children should be handled.

Q Go ahead and tell us the rest of it.

A Well, we went into the home. I sat on a chair and Mrs. Barker sat on a small love-seat, and we discussed at length about various things. And Mrs. Barker wanted a quick divorce—go to Nevada right away—give a settlement.

So I continued talking about the home, and about the children, and our obligations to the children. Mrs. Barker walked away from me to the table, lit a cigarette, came back, and during the course of the conversation (I was standing beside her), looked at the end of the cigarette and said, "I ought to push this right in your eye."

I said, "Well, I don't think you've got the guts to do it." I thought she was joking. With that, Mrs. Barker reached up and pushed the cigarette towards my face, and with my left hand I knocked the cigarette out of her hand, put my foot on it, and what turned me around was Mrs. Barker yelling and screaming that she had been hit.

I grabbed Mrs. Barker by the shoulder, sat her on the couch and said, "What is the matter with you?" With this, Mr. and Mrs. Dorsen came in, and I said, "This girl claims she's been hit. Would you please take a look and see if she has a mark on her? She's got sensitive skin; it would show." Mr. and Mrs. Dorsen answered me.

Q Did you hit her?

A I did not.

Q Proceed. What happened next?

A The next thing I know, I was getting a drink in my face.

Q A drink of what, water or whiskey?

A Well, the part that came down my face tasted very much like whiskey.

Q All right. What happened next?

A I said to Mrs. Barker, "Will you please tell the truth?" Mrs. Barker kept yelling that, "You hit me, you hit me," and started moving around, and I moved with her, and I said, "Please tell the truth. I'll not leave the house until you tell the truth."

By this time I knew the children had heard it, and I wanted the children to know the truth too. And after several minutes of this I decided to leave, because I wasn't getting any place, and might have made matters worse. And I left, and the divorce was filed the following day.

In spite of their concern for the welfare of their children, the testimony of both the Barkers implied that their only worry besides protecting them from the knowledge of their parents' disagreements, was protecting themselves from each other in the eyes of their sons. In trying to get at the effect of the Barkers' troubles on their children, Judge Walker ruled:

I think this: Of course, the Court has raised three children of his own, and been around a lot of other children, and they restrain themselves, and you can't tell what they're thinking about. I think evidence as to their activity along that line is admissible even though it may be hearsay . . .

The Court is only interested in the attitude of the children. It's pretty hard to get it without knowing what they say, and in many instances, what they don't say when they are questioned . . . many times children will shell up, and you can't get anything out of them . . . I think the Court has a right to get the attitude, and he's doing it the best way he can.

Miss Hayward told about the questioning of their children about the separation.

The Witness: They didn't quite understand why their mother and father didn't live together any more.

Q What did they say, and what did you say?

A Why don't their daddy live here any more? And I said, "Sometimes when people grow up, and they can't get along together in happiness, it's better for them to live apart."

Q You started to say something about putting Gregory to bed one night. What did he say?

A He said, "Wouldn't you like it if daddy lived here?"

Q All right Did you answer him?

A Well—

Q Or did you evade the answering?

A I answered him.

Q What did you say?

A I said, "It's too bad, but sometimes grown-ups can't get along together."

Then she described her relationship with her sons and recounted a scene in which she believed her husband tried to undermine her position with them.

Q With reference to visitation rights, Mrs. Barker, will you relate to the Court the observations on the children when they leave for week ends, and when they come back?

A Yes. During the week they're pretty much relaxed, except for, well, boys will be boys, and once in a while they'll get out of line. But they're nice kids, normal, happy, and they have, well, the best way I could describe it is a rather relaxed and free relationship with me. I do notice when they come back over the week end with me, they're tense, and it takes a day or two for the tenseness to leave. I don't know why. I'd like to be able to talk with Mr. Barker and discuss with him how we can work this thing out so that we can work together and not against each other.

I told him it was wrong for two people to be in conflict, and to try to outdo each other.

Q What did Mr. Barker say?

A May I give an incident that's just come to my mind?

Q Yes. Go ahead.

A Mr. Barker came to the home after we came back from Hawaii . . And this kind of thing would occur, where we talked about the trip, and I said, "Tell Daddy how you were surfboard riding, and deep sea fishing, and so forth, and so on." And Mr. Barker said, "Were they very good boys?" I said, "Yes, they were very good boys, but once in a while I'd have to give them a little crack on the behind." So he looked at the children, and he said, "Oh, you've got a very bad mommy."

Well, it wasn't the kind of thing that you say in front of kids, because then, you know, they get confused.

And Jess Barker told the Court why he wanted to keep his wife from permitting her mother to live in the home with the children.

Q You don't want your mother-in-law to be in the house with you, your wife and your children?

A I do not.

Q Tell the court why.

A The children told me, during the time I had them at Christmas, that they couldn't understand something. I said, "What are you talking about?" They said, "Something that Grandma said right after you left home." I said, "What do you mean?" The child said, "Grandma said she would kill you." And the child said, "Grandma said to Mommy, 'Get rid of Daddy.' "

There was more examination and cross-examination of Mr. and Mrs. Barker that day. And there's more to come. But we've given you the gist of the testimony, and you can compare the stories for yourself.

It looks as though the divorce and custody hearings will be worse—an ugly fight with no winners. Of the losers, Gregory and Timothy stand to lose the most. END wanted: a man

(Continued from page 51) me, provided it's in reasonable taste. I—I don't feel stuffy. I don't want to be stuffy."

Miss Grayson is always forthright, amusing and even, at the right times, earthy. She has one long-standing restriction—an intelligent one. She will not hold still for an interview if the story promises to be poisonous or saccharine.

Now the scene was Las Vegas' posh Sahara Hotel, where Miss Grayson was playing the first nightclub engagement of her life. Playing it very nicely, too. Putting out with mostly operatic arias and making the florid Vegas clientele like it. She was also breaking house records, although no columnist nor trade paper had said a word about it. She had followed Donald O'Connor in. Before him had been Marlene Dietrich, whose costume had given the sensational illusion of being transparent above the waist. Well, Miss Grayson had got some vicarious publicity out of that. She'd gone up to Vegas to case the joint, so to speak, before she opened, and had sat in on one of Miss Dietrich's performances wearing what she, Miss G., now describes as a moderate evening gown, and Miss Dietrich was said to have cracked a bit wise about it. One of the columns reported it.

"And after I'd complimented her on her show!" said Miss Grayson. So a couple of nights after she opened, Miss Grayson, who is an accomplished mimic and dialectician and perhaps should have been given a try at straight comedy long ago, stepped out of her routine. In a fine Teuton accent, she made noises so exactly like those of the throaty Miss Dietrich that she brought the house down. The edge was hers. Miss Grayson can imitate Miss Dietrich fine. Miss Dietrich, for sure, can't imitate Miss Grayson at all.

When Groucho Marx received $15,000 for doing the Arthur Murray TV show, he said to Murray: "Be a guest on my show and you'll get a chance to win it back."

Sidney Skolsky in The New York Post

But with Miss D.'s departure, Miss G. was still getting competition from the throaty set. As she opened at the Sahara, the Sands, a mile or so up the road, unveiled Tallulah Bankhead. Miss Bankhead, as boomingly uninhibited as Miss Grayson is restrained, sprayed the air with dahlings, regaled the hypnotized press in basso profundo, and finally asked a harried reporter who had just left Grayson: "But tell me one thing, dahling! Why did you see a stahlet before you came here to see a stah?"

To have implied to Miss Bankhead that Miss Grayson's billing and take-home pay were at least the equal of her own would have been to invite carnage, so no one did. Miss Bankhead got the headlines, as had Miss Dietrich before her, and what did Miss Grayson get? Just a little old $90,000 for three weeks' work, it says here.

"I'm not the headline type," said Miss G., "and I honestly don't care. I've planned it that way, the way I plan everything. And I'm as happy as I can be. I've made my separate peace with everyone and everything, and those who say I'm not happy or that I'm lonely in my 'big, dark, gloomy house,' you tell them something for me. You say I'm happier than any of them. I'm the happiest."

It was early evening and cold and rainy in Las Vegas, which is most unusual. Miss Grayson was a little ill, with subnormal temperature and under a phybut every good Mexican's favorite dish is Mari Blanchard.

Men prefer blonde Mari as a brunette!

■ Pretty blonde (or brunette) Mari Blanchard has brought something new to Hollywood. She got it in Mexico and she calls it "the full enchilada."

An enchilada is a Mexican dish, but there are enchiladas and enchiladas, as Miss Blanchard discovered on her first excursions into Spanish. After some disappointing tries, followed by the volatile explanation of a Mexican friend, Mari learned that the thing she was aiming at was the enchilada with all the trimmings—the full enchilada. To Mari the words are symbolic of "the whole works, the completely joyful way of life."

"Whether it's food, work or fun, it's the full enchilada," says Mari.

Miss Blanchard, who has been both blonde and brunette in film roles, is naturally blonde, but it seems that the Army, Navy and Marine Corps prefer Mari Blanchard brunette.

"An actress owes something to her fans," says Mari, tossing her dark curls. "You receive in proportion to what you give in this life. I'm all for the full enchilada." sician's care. She may have been more than a little tired; for four years now, doctors have been trying to get her away from everything for a complete rest. 'Everything' includes Patti Kate, who is the strenuous type and Miss Grayson is not going anywhere without Patti Kate.

Miss G. wears no make-up except lipstick and something around the eyes, with the result that she tends to glitter a trifle, like a casually wiped winder. She didn't look tired and she didn't look ill. She looked great. But she had been sleeping a great deal and she sat somewhat slumped in a deep sofa and didn't move about much. Patti Kate did the moving. After a while someone came and took Patti Kate away for one of her excursions about the hotel. "What time do you want her back?" he asked.

"About Tuesday," said Miss G. A jest.

Patti Kate went, and Miss Grayson stirred faintly. She's a small girl with close-cut auburn hair, and the widely known heart-shaped face and snub nose. She didn't feel a lot like working but she was going to work.

"I want you to see my 'big, dark, gloomy house' sometime, so you'll know what they're talking about. It's a wonderful house—to sing in, to work in or live in. It's got bookshelves with books in them, and the books have been read. Isn't that horrible? And the grounds in the back slope down toward the Riviera golf course and there's a lot of space, so Patti Kate has room to play. It's fenced in just the way you've heard. But they just say, 'Oh, it's all fenced in,' without knowing why. It's not only for my own privacy but for Patti Kate's. There are a lot of drunks around the golf course—not the members, of course, but others who wander onto it. Therefore, the fence. It's very simple to me. I don't see why it should bother other people. I'm thinking of my child."

PATTI KATE's father, who is Miss Grayson's divorced second husband, Johnny Johnston, had been up to see her a few days before.

"I outgrew him," said Miss Grayson. "That's my side of it. There are two sides to everything—and isn't that a bright observation, considering my weakened condition? Johnny's a child. I think he'll always be a child. Johnny needed desperately to be loved but—I think not the kind of love that can be given indefinitely. You have to understand his background, though. Johnny and I are good friends. I'll always feel that way about him. But toward the end of our marriage—you remember?"

Toward the end of the Johnstons' marriage, there was some sort of mishmosh involving reported attentions of Johnston to Shirley Temple, Miss Grayson's subsequent wrath, and the attempt of a close friend and neighbor, Joe Kirkwood, Jr., to intervene. Kirkwood, a professional golfer and film portrayer of Joe Palooka, evidently was in the middle. He was quoted in the first stage of the disruption as wishing broken bones to Miss Grayson—purely a figure of speech. Later, he and Johnston got into fisticuffs at the Riviera bar. Very complicated. Anyway—

"Toward the end of our marriage," Miss Grayson resumed, "I could carom a cold cream jar off Johnny and catch Joe Kirkwood with the ricochet."

Prior to Johnston, Miss Grayson had been wed to another actor, John Shelton. That one had turned sourish, too. What now?

Miss Grayson took a long breath. It is one of Miss Grayson's modest prides that her chest expansion is three-quarters of an inch greater than that of Joe Louis, whose chest expansion is a dandy.

"I will think," she said on the exhale, "a long, long time before I marry again. And when I do, it'll be a man who can stand on his own feet, make his own living, be an adult from the ground up. I'm not sure I want any more actors and I'm not sure I want any more charmers and I'm absolutely sure I don't want any more children. That is, I want children but I want to have them in the normal way, not marry them.

"I keep reading I'm going to marry a man in San Francisco. But I'm not. At least, no one I know of now. I have a good friend there; he's my brother's friend, too. He's a wonderful guy. He's asked me to marry him. I'm afraid he didn't make out very well. He was down here last week. I had to suggest he go back home. I was working and—well, you know.

"But if I could find a man, the kind I've described, someone who'd stand up to the world and stand up to me—"

She wished to be dominated? Some sort of ruthless egotist might fit the bill.

She laughed. "No, I'm not sure there's a man alive who could dominate me. But I want it on an equal footing. I want to look up to him and have him look up to me. Stand up to me and let me stand up to him. That kind of scratches the ruthless egotist department, doesn't it? I guess a girl could get really bruised with one of those, not to mention really unhappy. No, that I couldn't take."

THERE WAS a ruthless egotist of a sort pursuing Miss G. a while back. He was a hot-blooded deal, a chap from out of town. He would call Miss G. at two in the morning and wonder how she could stand it away from him. Unhappily, he had accumulated, since the days Miss Grayson had genuinely liked him, a set of atrocious manners. She never liked him beyond liking, you understand, so now it became intolerable. "I wasn't exactly swept off my feet," she has conceded.

Miss Grayson brooded gently for a moment and then took on "them" again. "I wonder what they expect of me," she said, apparently referring to the hungry segment of the public that will settle for nothing less than sidewalk brawls and bottle-smashing at Ciro's. "Just because I don't have a new love affair every week and I'm not seen around nightclubs, which I don't happen to like, I don't think I'm a bore and certainly I'm not perfect. I've even been out when perhaps a little elderberry wine had been mixed into the lemonade and I got the giggles. But what's wrong with dignity and why should it be confused with stuffiness? I'm not stuffy. You know I'm not."

Possibly the simple truth is that Kathryn Grayson is a very nice girl living in a professional climate where standards are sometimes sleazy. The barometer for conduct is a strange one: the garish are "colorful" and the well-behaved "dull."

Miss Grayson has actually been scored for her selfless devotion to her family, some people in the industry having called her, not wholly in reverence, "The Little Mother Of All The World."

"That's almost the payoff," said Miss G. "I love my family. We're exceptionally close. My mother and father are both ill. But there's enough to go around. That's what matters. Whether I earn it, or mother or father or brother—and whose business is it, anyway?"

PATENTLY it is no one's business. It may equally be no one's business that throughout her career, Miss Grayson has steadfastly refused to pose for cheesecake. She has said that she is "not the type." Neither her long-time home studio, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, nor Warners, to whom she now has a picture-a-year commitment, has been overjoyed by her stand in the matter, and one time, while with Metro, Miss Grayson found she was not overjoyed herself. This was after thousands of requests had come in from soldiers in Korea.

Miss G. called Metro and said to go ahead. The pictures were made, Miss Grayson looked them over—and killed every last one.

"I didn't want to do it. But look: I have a thirty-nine-and-a-half-inch bust, then taper right down to a twenty-four-inch waist, then hips something like thirty-four. That's—I don't know—rather emphatic, wouldn't you say? Frankly, I guess I'm embarrassed. After Kiss Me Kate, a woman wrote to me and said I should—uh—use restraint, and I think so, too. I'm a moderate, all right, and nothing can be done about it."

Doubtless it is a good thing. The vast majority of Miss Grayson's large following gets rattled when she kicks up her heels, and registers grief and disappointment. At Vegas, to break the semi-lofty plane of opera and ballad, she had a bit wherein she detached a voluminous skirt to reveal a tighter one, slit to the knee. It was a reprise on a dance number she'd done in a picture called Two Sisters From Boston, a charming little change of pace, delighting the audience. But somebody reported that regal Katie was peeling right out in front of everybody. Peeling, yet! The first letter began: "You don't have to do a strip-tease to sell yourself, you with all your God-given talent!" That, as television's Mr. Peepers sighs from time to time, is the way she goes.

Kathryn Grayson was born in Winston-Salem, North Carolina and named Zelma Hedrick. When she was three, the family moved to St. Louis, and that she thinks of as home.

Miss Grayson was educated in St. Louis and got her professional start through the good offices of Frances Marshall, then a star of the Chicago Civic Opera. It was Miss Marshall who developed her voice, nurtured her assurance and gave her the flying start to what she is today.

ONCE IN HOLLYWOOD, Kathryn was snapped up in a hurry—it was one of those no-test-is-necessary bits—by the astute Louis B. Mayer, and jumped into the top brackets in her third film. She's been there since.

But whether or not she's entirely happy there is problematical.

"I'm certainly not retiring," she has said. "But there aren't going to be any more of these cream-puff parts. No more meringue. I've had it. I've a wistful idea I might be able to act, and I'd like a chance to prove it. Some singing, yes, but incidental to the story. Did you see the picture in which I played Grace Moore? That was the best so far. I'd love another like it."

And what did she plan next?

"Now, you mean? After I leave here? That long, long rest I've been hearing so much about. I'm going where nobody'll know I'm going. There's an element of risk about that, but the complete privacy is worth it. I'll bet you a Vegas dollar right now that inside a week, they'll have me secretly married or in a sanitarium getting over a breakdown or consulting an analyst in Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan. Only one thing worse could happen—their not even bothering to guess."

Not one of Miss Grayson's biographies makes note of a calisthenic accomplishment she swears is hers. One-arm chinning—a feat essayed by Mr. Darryl Zanuck but not accomplished. Mr. Zanuck said at the time that only five men in the world could do it, and after he'd made his try, there were only four. Miss Grayson has news for Mr. Zanuck. She can do it.

"He was talking about men," she said. "But I can do it. Honest. If there were a bar here, I'd show you. A chinning bar, you know."

Her biographies do make such notes as: "she devotes considerable time to her garden" (just a so-so amount of time), "long and frequent walks" (more frequent than long), and "ten hours of sleep a night" (correct).

They say that she likes drawing and painting, horseback riding and golf (Babe Zaharias' assorted titles are safe enough) and has a St. Bernard named Throckmorton.

Actually she had a St. Bernard named Throckmorton and a wonderful dog he was. But a few months ago, Throckmorton gamboled out onto San Vincente Boulevard near Kathryn's Santa Monica home and was killed. It wasn't the driver's fault. And naturally it wasn't Throckmorton's, because dogs in the intrinsic nature of things are faultless. But the driver wept on Miss Grayson's kitchen table, and who can blame him?

There's nothing about how Miss G. has her hair done twice a week at the Brentwood Market in West Los Angeles and buys her gas from Union Oil and travels with an entourage of brothers and sisters and in-laws (and they are all very close) and an efficient secretary named Sally Norton, or about what a bright little girl Patti Kate is, with an I.Q. way, way up to here. When Patti Kate met Art Linkletter, the radio and TV man, in Vegas, she was most impressed and crawled up and down the aisles of the Sahara's Congo Room to prove it. And "That," said Linkletter, "is how I'd act if I were meeting her mother!"

Do you detect herein anything overly prim or straight-laced about Patti Kate's mother? Do you find her innate niceness a necessarily dull quality? If so, MODERN SCREEN begs to differ. END

IT HAPPENED TO ME

I had just bought the February issue of Modern Screen at a neighborhood market. While waiting to have my groceries checked out, I opened the magazine to the Jane Powell story—the account of her break-up with Gene Nelson. Sensing someone looking over my shoulder as I read, I turned—and looked into the sad eyes of Jane Powell.

what she doesn't have she doesn't need

"I have to show them." She nodded, with sort of a half-smile, as she lay back on a chaise longue, in her luxurious dressing room.

"I'll have to do a whole series of pictures and plays to do that," she continued. "I think Ondine has done a little toward it.

"But it has by no means established me as an actress yet. Maybe Sabrina Fair, which should be around somewhere pretty soon, will help."

You may think this is false modesty. But I do not. Miss Hepburn has convinced me of her sincerity and her earnestness.

She sees herself now at a new phase of her career. She's no longer a pixie from Hollywood who's sort of interesting to audiences. Sort of "cute." She's on the spot now. She's got to do far, far better acting now, because henceforth she won't be judged as a pixie, but as an important leading woman who will, or will not, measure up to the greatest actresses of our time.

How amazingly serious she is about the battle was brought out by Ferrer in some more recollections of her recent activities.

"We were in Boston opening there with Ondine," he said.

"It was opening night—just before the curtain. All day long, Lew Wasserman, head of her agency, had been trying to get her from Hollywood.

"There she was, about half way through her make-up, fifteen minutes from the curtain, when the call came through. I ran into her on the stairs and I asked her, 'What are you doing in this part of the theatre now?'

"She told me Wasserman had called from Hollywood to tell her that Sabrina Fair was a great success. That people got up and cheered.

"And this had happened in Long Beach, where people don't do that.

"We went on and did the first act of our show then, and at the intermission I said to her, 'That was wonderful news about Sabrina Fair.'

"I again complimented her on the success of the picture, and she said, 'Yes, that's all nice, and that's all fine—don't you think we were kind of slow in our first act?"

THEN THERE WAS the problem of her hair shade for Ondine.

Ondine is a water sprite. Alfred Lunt, the director of the play, had felt from the first that the girl should be a blonde.

Audrey had wished to play the part with her own hair which, of course, is dark. But she decided that Lunt might be right.

And when did she decide this? On the afternoon of the day the show opened.

"She went that very afternoon and got her hair bleached," recounted Ferrer.

"But she felt it wasn't right. It was false. She said it seemed that she was 'cheating' a little. She didn't like her hair blonde. So she changed her hair back to its real color—and got a blonde wig.

"But the wig didn't satisfy her, either."

To me, Miss Hepburn had many descriptions of that wig. It was stuffy and hot and horrible. She felt "it looked dead in the back."

So Miss Hepburn determined to discard the wig, too. But what could she do to be a blonde without a wig?

She found that she could paint it with some gold-looking dust each night.

And this was what she wanted.

She had on her own hair, it was sprinkled with some blonde or gold powder, and she felt natural and real.

"She does a Mary Martin every night washing that gold out of her hair, but it is finally the way she wants it," said Ferrer. "And it no longer looks dead in the back."

THEN THERE was the matter of costume.

Nobody quite knew what an ondine should wear. In fact, until the show started getting attention, many people around Broadway didn't know what an ondine was.

Miss Hepburn, however, knew. She designed two of her three costumes herself—including one that's received much attention because it seems that about all she wears is a fish net—although actually she wears tights, too.

She created, personally, a blue make-up powder to blend with a blue costume; a creamy make-up powder to blend with a white outfit. And then came her most startling contribution.

Miss Hepburn designed for herself two pointed ears.

She created them out of plastic. Make-up genius Eddie Senz decorated them with gold. These pointed-up ears gave her the look of a fawn or a sprite that was so essential to the show, but which nobody else had worked out.

WHEN THE PRAISE began pouring in for the show—about the same time she began receiving all the awards for Roman Holiday . . . Miss Hepburn allowed all of that flattery to roll right off.

It seemed to make no impression on her at all.

But there was one thing that touched her, from far away.

She learned that Ingrid Bergman had gone to see her picture, Roman Holiday in Italy, and had liked it.

The story was, in fact, that Miss Bergman had come from the theatre crying.

"What are you crying for?" Rossellini had asked Ingrid. "Was it a tragedy?"

"No, it was a comedy."

"What are you crying for then?" Roberto had demanded.

"I was so touched by Audrey Hepburn," Miss Bergman had answered.

This was the one part of recent praise for Miss Hepburn that practically "knocked her out." And it is easy to see why, knowing what we do about her now. It was because Audrey was such an admirer of Ingrid Bergman, the actress, and wanted to be thought a good performer by one like Miss Bergman.

Let me make clear, however, that Miss Hepburn will not disclose most of these things about herself.

When I saw her in her dressingroom, she offered me tea or coffee or a drink, and was almost jocular. She mentioned that she herself still did not drink any hard liquor ever. Just wine occasionally.

"Just lately I've been drinking beer after the show," she said. "I find I've been terribly dehydrated after a performance. Beer quenches my thirst and is very relaxing to me, too."

As for restaurants:

"I eat a great deal at Dinty Moore's, always the red meat department!"

Don't miss the complete story of Suzan Ball's wedding next month in MODERN SCREEN!

I asked her whether she would tell me how she felt about her own career.

"Yes. First I was given a break when I appeared here in Gigi. That was the year I was sort of discovered.

"The next stage was when I did Roman Holiday. When they found whether I had any future in pictures, whether I was photogenic, whether I could act in front of a camera.

"They discovered, perhaps, there was hope for me."

As she told me all this, she got up from her chaise longue and darted across to her dressing table to get some hand cream.

She returned to the chaise longue and settled back in it, her pretty legs stretched out. I thought of the words of Billy Wilder about her: "This girl single-handedly will put bosoms and sweater girls out of business in Hollywood."

For this lean, unvoluptuous child was exuding all the sex appeal that should be allowed. Without seeming to try to do so. Above her head was a small wreath of seaweed that Ferrer had given her on opening night, and all around the dressing-room were gifts from other friends.

"And now," she said, "is when I must prove I'm not a fluke."

I asked her about her great ambition that we'd talked about before—to play Shakespeare.

Susan Zanuck's been at Ciro's every night to catch Johnnie Ray . . . Sez Johnnie: "I like Susie Zanuck. She's the hot-dogs-on-the-beach-grab-the-blue-jeans-and-go-for-a-hike type. I really dig a plain Jane like Susie. I can't see going with a doll like Marilyn Monroe and having every jerk in the joint coming up to her and saying, 'Ditch the square you're with, chick, and let's hit the road!' This you can quote, Dad!"

Mike Connolly in The Hollywood Reporter

"I would have liked one day to go to Stratford or to the Old Vic Theatre," she said, "but you need a much vaster knowledge of Shakespeare than I have to do it well.

"I don't just want to try to do Shakespeare. I want to do it well!"

She added that she probably should wait. "But you don't want to wait forever."

Of course, it's the romantic life of Miss Hepburn that worries lots of people. They can't seem to be content unless they get her married off, or at least engaged.

"What about Mel Ferrer?" I asked her.

"No comment," she replied, with a smile.

"How about your love life?" I persisted.

"No comment," she repeated. "There's nothing to tell . . . it's sad but true."

"I've predicted that you won't be getting married to anybody for five or six years," I said.

"Five or six! That's a bit long. A couple, maybe!" she flung back.

A Broadway character, ticket-seller Georgie Solotaire, had stated the situation pretty well not long before. He said he had been quite happy one Sunday afternoon when, in a movie theater, he found himself sitting next to Audrey Hepburn.

"Then I saw somebody holding her hand," Georgie said.

"It turned out to be Mel Ferrer.

"Now, why," demanded Georgie, "does that guy have to watch her Sunday, too, when he's with her every night?"

It seems that about one-half the New York male population is jealous of Mel. Before Mel came into the plot, there were rumors that Gregory Peck and Audrey were acting romantic 'way back when they were making Roman Holiday together.

Audrey didn't exactly deny it. She just didn't discuss it.

Before that, she was definitely going to marry handsome James Hanson, a rich British trucking gentleman, whose family has interests in Canada and the United States, some of them, in fact, in the El Morocco nightclub. They got engaged, then broke it off, and Miss Hepburn quite sensibly explained it.

"As we were not going to get married, it seemed sensible not to stay engaged."

"But why did you decide not to get married?"

"We saw as much of each other as we would have if we had been married—and it was bitter little," she replied. "So I decided this is not the proper climate for married life."

All this indicated to me a great growing-up on the part of Miss Hepburn and her emotions. For the first time I had talked to her about romance, about two years ago, she had been extremely enthusiastic about getting married to James Hanson—immediately.

"Why?" I had asked her.

"Because," she'd retorted, "I think it's a great waste of time not being married to James."

She explained further, "We met at a party and was I lucky! I knew I wanted to marry him the first day I met him. It was love at first sight."

She was impatient to get married at once, but with a "proper marriage." Honeymoon and all that.

Her career kept getting in the way. There was Gigi to finish on Broadway. Then there was Roman Holiday to do. And besides, her husband-to-be was busy all over the world, too, because his father's company is in London with branches in Canada.

And so they chose to get unengaged.

Although Audrey has grown up, it remains difficult for me to dissociate her from that Dutch pixie I saw the first time I popped into her dressing room at Gigi.

She was barefoot that night, romping nervously around the room receiving people dropping in to exclaim about her triumph in the opening of the show.

Each time I saw her in her dressingroom, she seemed to be barefoot.

"The trouble is, I don't have pretty feet," she said once, trying to hide them. "They're knobbly."

This could be, but you wouldn't notice it. Even though she's what you call "virtually flat-chested," being a size thirty-two in the sweater department, you don't notice that, either.

The fact is that this little 110-pound wonder girl with the twenty-one-and-a-half-inch waist, who grew up under the Nazi occupation in Holland, has everything—and what she doesn't have, she doesn't need.

Her Dutch mother is in New York sort of looking after her now. One of her mother's duties is keeping track of all her trophies. A little porcelain rabbit that her mother gave her for luck when she was a little girl, is on her dressing table, still.

Audrey has ambitions besides Shakespeare, right now.

One is to get back to her ballet lessons which she dropped during her concentration on Ondine and the two movies.

"And in there somewhere, I'd like to get a little holiday," she added with a certain wistfulness.

The last time I saw her in her dressing-room, I noticed and commented on the fact that she wasn't barefoot this time.

"The next best thing to it," she said, indicating her thin-soled slippers.

Little Audrey not barefoot? Little Audrey has really grown up.

like father, like son

(Continued from page 42) "I see." "Dad," pursued Pete, "have you got another empty can and some more of that old film?"

"Not on your life."

"Then—uh—can I have that chemistry set for my birthday—I'll keep it in the hut."

"We'll see."

"Dad," queried the youngest Ford, "what you staring at me for?"

"Oh, nothing," grinned Glenn Ford quickly. "Nothing at all."

Flashing through Glenn Ford's mind even as he ducked a fatherly decision was the picture of another kid, skinnier and with darker hair, but about the same age and with the same adventurous thrust to his jaw. A kid named Gwyllyn Samuel Newton Ford who also had a hut out in his backyard in Santa Monica—with a chemistry set inside. Glenn was thinking about the time he traded a World War I helmet for a big can of a "chemical" he could add to his set. The label was gone and the can was rusted shut. He and his friend decided to open it. Inside was a hunk of crumbly stuff that glowed when you knocked it off. Luckily, he'd had sense enough to use gloves and it was great rubbing the junk all over the hut, making luminous skulls and crossbones on the wall, until suddenly the chunk started hissing and smoking. They beat it outside with only a second to spare before it exploded, caught the other chemicals and blew the whole shack to splinters. The chunk was pure phosphorus.

"Mum's the word about the rocket," he told Pete. "Now, let's say our prayers and hit the sack. I'm sleepy."

More and more, it seems to Glenn Ford, he looks at his son Pete, and it's like looking in a mirror. He sees himself and something else—his own second chance at life. It's a gratifying, even thrilling, view most of the time, but a little scary, too. That second chance is important to Glenn. Pete is the only child of two only children and it looks as though he might remain the last of the Fords. No wonder his old man stays awake some nights staring out the window and adding himself up. Pete is no longer a baby; he's growing up and sizing up. His dad is still his hero but, as Glenn sometimes puzzles a little wryly, "How can you stay the right kind of a hero when your checkered past keeps jumping up at you?" Like just last summer down in the jungles of Brazil.

Glenn was there on location making The Americano. Pete was there and Ellie, too, because of a chance remark his kid made. When Glenn came home with his travel plans Pete had asked, "Say, Dad, what's it like to ride on a train?"

That handed Glenn Ford a jolt.

"You mean you've never been on a train, pal?" he gasped. But even as he said it he knew it was true, and for a special reason he felt shame and neglect.

His own dad was a railroader with the Canadian Pacific, and as a kid trains were the most glamorous, exciting and wonderful objects in the world to Glenn. Even today when he hears a distant whistle or just the tinkle of ice in a water pitcher, it brings back those dining car sounds of his boyhood and makes him itch to climb aboard. At the studio they've long since given him up for any other kind of travel. The company flies off to locations—as they did last year to Oklahoma for The Human Beast—but not Ford. He climbs happily aboard a rattler and they can count on him to show up two days later, cinders on his collar and rapture on his face. The first Christmas present Pete had was an electric train. The first book Glenn read to him was about a choo-choo. And what had his boy just said?

"Look," Glenn decreed a little firmly, knowing that Ellie would have to be pried loose from home with a crowbar, "this family is going on a trip."

So they had three delicious days on the Southern Pacific to New Orleans and then took a boat—Pete's first—around to Rio, settling finally in a comfortable cabana at Guaraja beside the most beautiful beach in the world. But right at their back door was the Mato Grosso, daddy of the world's jungles. That's where Glenn worked and naturally Pete insisted on being by his side. Soon Glenn began to wonder if his family excursion idea was so sound.

Because where Pete wandered happily with his bug jar and butterfly net was also where panthers prowled, tapirs and wild hogs roamed, cobras, coral snakes and all kinds of poisonous things slithered. How Glenn ever played a part with Pete on his anxious mind, he'll never know. Sure, he would have been as venturesome himself at that age, if he'd had that chance, but now he wasn't that age.

The inevitable scare came when he took Pete and Ellie fishing on the bank of a tropical stream. If fish didn't bite, as these didn't seem to, Pete's impulse was to wade in and see why not. They had all been eating apples and tossing the cores into the sluggish waters and suddenly there was Pete, in above the knees before he could be stopped. Glenn looked and his heart froze. Something glided at the speed of a torpedo right toward his son. A cavernous mouthful of jagged teeth yawned open!

What happened next is still sort of a blur in Glenn Ford's memory. He screamed, "Pete!" and leaped off the muddy bank, meeting his thoroughly scared son halfway out of the water. Glenn threw him the rest of the way, then sank to the mud, trembling. The crocodile was going after those floating apple cores, but it might have been something else.

"Won't you ever learn not to take chances? Suppose that crocodile, suppose—" Glenn sputtered. "You've got to be careful, boy! That was just plain crazy wading in that river. A stupid, dangerous thing to do—"

"Look who's talking," a voice cooled him down. Ellie's. She was hugging their son, acting calmer but every bit as shocked. "The man who climbed the Matterhorn and pierced the Iron Curtain!"

That wave came over Glenn again. Here he was bawling out Pete for taking risks and—well—he knew exactly what Ellie referred to. It wasn't the Matterhorn. It was Mont Blanc, the highest peak in Europe, and if ever there was a silly, reckless escapade that was it, for sure.

He was in Switzerland that year making The White Tower. It was winter—avalanche season—and what he knew about climbing Alps you could put in your left eye. But there was that big, beautiful, challenging hill and sometimes romantic Welshman Ford gets wild ideas from playing in moving pictures. So he found himself one day panting at the very last hut. From there you made a dash for the top—and if you didn't get back before dark, chances were you'd never get back.

Glenn shuddered to recall it. A sudden blizzard, a slip, miscounted minutes for a greenhorn and—well, there wouldn't be any pop today for Pete. As if that wasn't crazy enough, he'd tackled the Aguille du Midi next—not so high but even tougher. That 100-to-1 luck was with him again. In fact, the plaque the Syndicate of Guides gave him for his climbs was Pete's treasure. But Pete didn't know the details.

The Iron Curtain thing was even more impulsive and rash. That was after The Green Glove in France, only three years ago. He was thirty-three and should have collected some discretion. But one thing had led to another. First he'd visited an old service pal in Munich and heard about the big DP camp at Fernwald down the line, where 25,000 cooped-up, homeless people milled around, hungry to hear about the Land of the Free. So he went down to raise some hopes. Elated by that experience, he got the bug to see Vienna. He bought a ticket on the Orient Express and at Innes, where the trains enter the Russian sector, talked to a G.I. sergeant named Blum.

"Hmmm," frowned the sarge, looking at his passport. "With all these names, 'Gwyllyn Samuel Newton Ford, known professionally as Glenn Ford'—chum, you'll be a pigeon. The Russians won't get it so they'll toss you in jail just to make sure. Better lose the idea." After a round or two of vodka it was, "You really want to go to Vienna?" And of course he'd said, "Sure!" Then the guards told him how to get on a cattle car, turn up his coat collar and not show his passport at all—sometimes it worked. But this time it didn't. They caught him and hauled him before the American consul.

But then what did he do, after seeing the sights of Old Vienna, but get this stubborn idea to take home a rock from the Blue Danube to add to his collection from the Tower of London, Henry VIII's castle, Alcatraz and scattered points he'd already visited. The American side was cemented in, so he strolled across the bridge to the Russian bank and filled his pockets. As he was bending over something jabbed him in the ribs—a rifle.

SMILEY

Every morning the train on which I commuted to work was driven by a whitehaired motorman. He was pleasant looking but he never seemed to smile. One morning, though, I saw a pretty little girl sitting on his lap with her hands on the controls, and he was smiling as broadly as she. Even before the conductor had stepped out to introduce her, I knew that it was Shirley Temple—about nine years old!

Alfred A. Calvano
Yucaipa, California

On the other end was a red star boy. He made unmistakable gestures meaning "Gimme—and come along." Well, Glenn lost all the Blue Danube pebbles except one which he hid. It is in his garden today. But to get it and Glenn free the Department of State had an awful hassle. The consul told him, "It's crazy Americans like you doing crazy things around here that cause all the trouble." He reminded Glenn that a newspaper reporter named Bill Oatis was then in jail somewhere nearby just for trying to get a story, not rocks. But Pete never knew how close his dad came to being another Oatis case. Pete might have been answering questions, "Where's my Daddy? Oh. he's over in Siberia mining salt!"

At such introspective moments Glenn Ford sometimes wonders if he's a model block for the chip he sees before him. Actually, of course, Glenn is going through a common soul-searching sooner or later encountered by all fathers of sons. Actually, no dad, in Hollywood or elsewhere, has been closer to his son. And no parents—because Eleanor Powell has something to do with it too—have done a better job by starting a boy in the fundamentals. For faith, health and character, Peter Newton is an example of conscientious homework.

PETE HAS YET to go to bed without saying his prayers with either Ellie or Glenn, yet to miss grace at dinner. The Presbyterian church in Beverly is a family must, with Pete singing in the boys' choir and Ellie teaching a Sunday school class. One look at Pete's sturdy build—he's going to be a bigger man than his pop—attests to the patience and ingenuity expended in getting him to clean up his plate. Setting the right example almost fattened Glenn out of pictures until he learned the ruse of heaping his own plate with impressive but low-caloried hunks of lettuce.

IN MATTERS OF discipline and physical courage Glenn has been a stickler. When Pete gets cracked with a baseball and starts to water up, Glenn is prone to yell—to Ellie's horror—"No tears—not unless I see the bones sticking out." Being a hard-headed Welshman himself, he has encouraged thrift in Pete, a penny a pound for wood he stacked, fifty cents for the weeding job, etc. Pete is already a good business man. In Brazil when he uncovered a particularly repulsive but harmless giant beetle, the director got ideas to have it crawl over Glenn's sweaty face in a scene. "I'll rent your bug, Pete," he offered.

"How much?" asked Pete, and haggled the dollar offer up to three. Back home the money he had collected went into an ancient power mower for his dad. He dug it up for five bucks around the neighborhood. And although it cost Glenn a hundred to make the thing run, he was proud of his kid.

Glenn knows that besides bugs Pete has collected the right instincts by now. He's not worried about that or about the way they are instilled. You're the right kind of guy and your kid can't miss. You give him security, teach him manners, consideration and honesty, how to handle himself and how to stay away from danger. You feed his early hungers, prod his inquisitiveness with toys, flood him with books if he's a bookworm like his dad, buy him records if he likes music like his mom. Give him love, understanding, encouragement and care. Simple enough. But what dents a wrinkle in Glenn's brow these days are the nebulous issues, the yes-maybe-no problems a pop faces when a subtle yet all-of-a-sudden change takes place in his house.

Pete Ford will be ten on his next birthday, in fifth grade next year and already Glenn's pride and joy is beset with vague questions. He's knocking his brown head against the world, having scraps with the boys, puzzling encounters with females, angling toward the track he'll follow to manhood. Glenn knows that now is the time for him to pitch the right answers Pete's way. But how can you serve them up except from your own experience? After all, you have only a few opinions you've gathered on debatable subjects, some right, probably a lot more wrong.

The other day Glenn came home, riffled through his mail and held a lacy heart-shaped object in his paw, wondering who had sent him a Valentine. Then he saw the scrawl. It wasn't for him; it was for Pete. A gypsy girl made goo-goo eyes on the other side. "I'll be your loving, wandering Valentine," it read. "Guess who."

Glenn mused. Well, this was what had come of giving in on dancing school. It wasn't much of a family issue really. He just thought Pete was too young to get exposed to that school of social manners and dancing. But Ellie snorted, "He's nothing of the sort. I'm not going to have my son grow up a tanglefoot like his father." So he gave in. After all, Ellie had accomplished a thing or two in the dancing department and had a right to feel strongly on the subject. Glenn was thinking guiltily, too, that in all their married life they'd been dancing exactly twice—at Mocambo once, Ciro's once. He'd walked around the floor those times, as usual. Never had learned to dance worth a nickel, since—wow, this was 'way back—his first public performance.

He was in first grade at Venice, California, right after they had moved down from Canada, and there was this May Day pageant. The teacher dreamed up a kiddie take-off on The Merry Widow. Because he had black hair that could be slicked down they picked him to play John Gilbert and that was great because the girl chosen for Mae Murray was a taffy-topped cutie named Elaine Shaeffer, his dream of dreams. But at rehearsal when he rapturously pranced out with Elaine the teacher said, "No, Glenn—no! I didn't say 'walk out'—I said 'waltz out.'"

"I can't dance," he'd blurted.

"I can!" piped up a freckle-faced guy named Vernon, his arch rival for Elaine. So Vernon waltzed dreamily in the spotlight while Glenn sulked in the corner of the big production, ignominiously dressed as a clown and feeling every inch the part. Maybe Ellie was right at that. But now look. Girls!

"Hey, Pete," he called a little later. "Uh-how do you get along with the girls?"

"Okay, I guess. Why?"

There might be a way to stall this off a little longer. "The way to handle girls, Pal," said the voice of experience, "is to play hard to get. Keep aloof, pay them no mind. They love it."

Pete nodded without much reaction and Glenn forgot the whole thing. Just what followed he's not quite sure. But at Miss Ryan's Pete is the beau of the ball, a snap dancer who has the girls fluttering around him like butterflies, including such cuties as Van Johnson's daughter, Ann Sothern's, and Pete's special throb, Edgar Bergen's Melisse. What his dad would like to know (but doesn't dare ask him) is, did he follow the advice, or didn't he? Glenn has evidence—less happy to be sure—about another word of wisdom concerning manly affairs he passed on.

He'd noticed unmistakable signs when Pete came home from school—ripped shirts, scuffed knuckles, scratches here and there and once the beginnings of a black eye. He'd seen Pete right at home wrestling around with this and that kid. "He's turning into a little roughneck," concluded Glenn. "Got to stop this." Again a memory bulb lit up. His coach at Madison School in Santa Monica had a system. When kids tangled in the schoolyard he drew a ring, put them inside and made them fight it out. Glenn had been in that ring only once. That was because of an argument with a much bigger kid, and miraculously he'd been able to dust him off. After that, he noticed, nobody picked on him and life was a breeze.

"Look Pete," he counseled. "I don't care how many fights you get into but there's just one rule: See that you always pick a bigger guy than yourself to mix with."

Pete stopped brushing his hair and struggling with his tie. "Why?" he inquired in amazement.

"Because," said Glenn, "it creates respect. Now, at this party you're going to this afternoon—when you walk in look around for the biggest boy there. If there's any trouble make it with him. From then on your problems will be over."

About a half hour later the phone rang. A highly indignant hostess shrilled in his ear, "Mr. Ford, I'm sorry, but you'd better come get Pete. He has just created a terrible disturbance."

So Pete was in the car, mussed up again and chewing his lip. "I didn't do anything wrong—just what you told me to, Daddy."

"What was that?"

"Why, like you said. Right off I picked out the biggest guy there and I told him, 'I can lick you.'"

"What happened?"

"He knocked me f-flat on my ear!" sputtered his son.

And I knocked you out of a party, Glenn groaned to himself.

The trouble is, Glenn realizes at such anguished moments, that you forget your words are literal gospel. Before you pop off, you've got to stop and think, "I'm this little guy's hero. He thinks I wrote the book." And since you didn't and can still learn a lot yourself—why, this hero role is the roughest ever. That's how it seems to Glenn, and he's played plenty of other hero roles for the cameras (done all right, too) which is another thing that turns a black hair grey for Glenn as Pete sheds his kidhood and looks around.

YOUR FATHER'S MUSTACHE!

After seeing Jerry Colonna on stage in Hartford my friends and I went to an Italian restaurant for dinner. We looked up when the door opened and Jerry walked in with a group of people. As he passed I spoke his name and he stopped to chat for a minute. I asked him if his mustache were real. He said, "Don't tell anyone; this one is false. The real one I carry in my pocket!"

Since the day Pete was born Glenn has been hipped on one thing: Pete was going to have a normal American boyhood, just as he'd had. There'd be no puffed-up movie star's kid around his house. Not that Glenn Ford has anything against movie stars. He has enjoyed solid, satisfying success, collected a healthy bank account, interest in some oil wells and paper mills, and a devoted wife, Eleanor Powell, who was a very big screen star herself. Glenn and Ellie have been super wary from the start against spoiling Pete. They know how easy it is for an actor's only son to get high falutin' ideas.

Despite their comfortable station in life, Pete has never been pampered. He didn't have nursemaids; he had his mother and dad to take care of him, busy as they were. Glenn even pitched all by himself once when Ellie went off to dance in London—and came back spurning five-figure paychecks and junking her career for keeps because, "It isn't worth it to leave Pete."

Glenn has kept the home atmosphere plain—even sometimes sternly severe. There's still a rule that if Pete breaks a toy, he either fixes it himself or does without. He has had the responsibility of tidying his room since he was six. He earns his own Christmas money. Last year he came home with a flashy gilt compact for his mother, encrusted with glass diamonds and rubies. Ellie uses it and prizes it more than another she owns that's the McCoy.

The only time Glenn indulged Pete was with the swimming pool, and in a way he earned it. When he was only six, Pete asked Glenn about that.

"Tell you what," Glenn said. "When you can swim the length of the Beverly Hills Hotel pool, turn around without touching and swim back, you get your own pool." Soon after, Pete took his dad down to the hotel and proved he could do it. So the pool went in.

FOR A LONG TIME Glenn managed to keep Pete in the dark about what he did for a living. When he'd go off to the studio it was just "on business." But sometimes he had to rig up at home in high-heeled boots and a Stetson. Then he told Pete, "Got to go help a man with some horses." Pete got the idea his pop was a ranch hand, which was okay with him. He was nuts about cowboys, and Glenn could remember when he had thought Tom Mix was a far greater man than the President of the United States. So he kicked the gag along. The only pictures he'd let Pete see were outdoor ones where he rode a horse. The first set he took Pete on was The Redhead And The Cowboy. Pete began to compare his dad with other two-gun heroes like Hopalong Cassidy, Roy Rogers, Gene Autry—and especially his TV favorite The Range Rider, Jock Mahoney. Glenn suspected that comparisons weren't rating daddy so high.

So when he'd watch The Range Rider with Pete, and Jocko would pull a particularly death-defying feat, Glenn would scoff, "Ah, that's easy. I can do it better than that." Or if Pete admired a certain horse, he'd say, "My horse is twice as fast and smart." But he got skeptical looks and sometimes a "Yeah?" And it began to get his goat. After all, Glenn is human.

The thing ate on him so that he collared Jock, whom he's known for years and asked, "Do me a favor, will you?"

It wasn't long after that seventy kids were whooping and tearing around the Ford home at Pete's birthday party when the doorbell rang and there—wonder of wonders—was the Range Rider himself, pistols, fancy boots, buckskin shirt and all.

"Hello, hombre," he greeted Pete. "Does a cowboy named Glenn Ford live here?"

"Yuh-yes, sir. He's my father," gasped Pete, as the seventy gaping revelers crowded around. "I'm his boy, Pete Ford."

"Well, now, you're a mighty lucky boy." Jock played it to the hilt. "Matter of fact, I've come out here to thank your dad."

"What for?" Pete tingled to his toes.

"What for?" boomed the great man. "Why, sonny, your father taught me everything I know. He's the greatest cowboy of them all!"

Of course, such deceptions no longer work. A fourth grader at El Rodeo public school in Beverly Hills knows a thing or two. If he doesn't, the kids tell him. So of course Pete came home one day with an awed and questioning look in his eyes.

"Dad, are you a movie star?"

"Don't know about that," said Glenn. "Let's say I make my living as an actor."

"Gee," Pete whistled. "I wanna be an actor, too, when I grow up."

Well, there it was. Like father, like son. Was there ever a kid who didn't want to be what his dad was? Glenn had wanted to be a railroad engineer just like his dad, and if the Fords had stayed in Quebec he might have been. What could you expect of a boy whose parents were both entertainers? He checked up. Yep, there it was in old Pete—the same imagination, which his dad had subconsciously stimulated from babyhood. All Glenn's tall tales and poses were catching up on him. He didn't tout Pete onto his spinach any more with tales of his friend Cecil, the seal, who lived under the house and brought it in especially for him to eat. He didn't hide chewing gum in the magnolia tree and tell Pete it grew there just for him. He didn't make up a hair-raising bedtime story each night about his—Glenn's—astounding prowess with rod, gun and wild-bucking broncos. He didn't have to. Pete dreamed up better ones.

Last summer down in Brazil staying at a fazenda (like a ranch house) Pete knocked out a front tooth when, playing pool with another kid, a cue ball bounced up and smacked him. But what did he tell the gang when he came home? "See this tooth? I lost it in a fight with a panther. He clawed it out before I finally got him." And right before his own dad too, without batting an eye. Where did Pete confidently announce he was going next with Glenn? The Fiji Islands, no less, and following that a tiger hunt on elephant back with the Maharajah of Hyderabad and then a big game safari in Kenya. And who had given him those ideas and someday would have to make them good? What had Ellie always said when Glenn racketed off on those location trips to Europe, North Africa, Yucatan? "Don't worry about me. I'm never really lonesome when you go away. You see, I have two Glenns." Um-hm—and both with itchy feet.

"No, Pete," Glenn said, "you don't want to be an actor. Anything but an actor."

"Why?"

"Well—" How could he tell his boy that the odds were too long, a million to one? How could he tell the kid who worshipped him that he, Glenn Ford, had made it only by the rarest luck? How could he say what he really felt, "I still don't know how it happened to me. It's still just playing cops and robbers." But Pete liked to play cops and robbers, too.

"Oh, it's a hard life," Glenn lied. "Look, isn't there something you'd rather do?"

"I like music. How much do musicians make?"

Too close. "Oh, not much. Two or three bucks a day," he cut it way down.

"How about a doctor? I saw that bill on your desk—twenty-five dollars. Did the doctor get that just for looking at you?"

"Well—he has to know a lot to look at me."

"How much do doctors make?"

"Forty or fifty thousand a year if they're good." Glenn built that one way up.

"I'm going to be a doctor," decided Pete.

Glenn started to smile—but it wound up a frown. He'd talked Pete right into that. He felt a little ashamed of himself. What business was it of his what Pete wanted to do? What difference did it make whether he was a doctor, lawyer, plumber—or actor—so long as he was a good one and, more important, a good man? He'd find his way and in his own way. Pete is his son, but Pete is a person, too, part of a million other people stretching way back into time. The trouble with fathers like himself, Glenn decided, is that they overplay their parts—like ham actors.

YOU'VE GOT A son and you've got a second chance and that is both a privilege and a responsibility. But it's no mandate to make over anyone in your own image, even if you could. That's the danger of looking too closely and trying too hard. Sure, you die a thousand deaths trying to do the right thing, but the right thing is not steering him but backing him up. Funny, you worry about teaching Pete, and all the time he's teaching you. What was it that poet wrote? "He doesn't die who has a son." Well, you don't live unless you have one either, thought Glenn Ford.

"All that stuff's a long way off, Pete," he said. "Let's see what's for supper." END

how tony and janet saved their love

(Continued from page 55) And they caught up on talk—not studio talk which is mostly on their tongues when they are working, but small talk—the little things about each other that each wants to know and can't find out when they are busy at the studio.

"Why don't you ever imitate Cary Grant's voice any more when you telephone me?" she asked one afternoon.

"I don't have to now," he said, "because I know you won't hang up on me. That's why I used to do it then."

About the third night after their arrival they decided they were strong enough to do a little dancing, and in a dreamy moment Tony wanted to know how Janet could be sure she was still interested in him.

"Funny you should mention that," she said, "because one of the ways I'd know whether I still really have 'it' for my husband is whether or not I still like to dance with him; whether when the music gets real soft, so do I, and whether I have that real gone feeling when I'm in his arms."

"Well?" he asked.

"Well, what?" she wanted to know.

"Well, you know what," he said.

"Yes," she said, and buried her face deeper in his shoulder.

Walking home from the movies one night they met an old New York friend of Tony's who said, "Well, so long, you old car thief." Janet was curious. As soon as they were alone she wanted to know about that. "That man was kidding, of course."

"No, he wasn't kidding," Tony told her. "It's true. I—I was a car thief in New York. Dum-de-dum-dum!"

Janet laughed, but her hand was at her heart and she was already wondering where they might find a lawyer to fight extradition. Then Tony explained. He put his arm around her and picked the shadowy places on the street to walk through while he told her the story. It wasn't automobiles he had stolen, he said. It was a trolley car—a full-sized, Third Avenue trolley car. He was nine years old then.

"But why?" asked Janet.

"It was a slow afternoon," replied Tony, "and I had nothing else to do. A bunch of us kids were wandering around and suddenly we found ourselves in the car barns on Third Avenue in the Sixties. Somebody said something about liking to go for a ride so I got in one of the cars and—it was so simple—a couple of gadgets to work and the car moves. Who could resist working them? First thing you know, I was running the trolley down the street!"

"What did the car people do?" asked Janet.

"They chased us—in another trolley," Tony said. "I slammed on the brakes and we all jumped out and scattered. End of story. End of criminal career. What's your reaction?"

"I think that before going to bed I'll have a chocolate fudge sundae," said Janet.

"Poor thing," said Tony, comfortingly. "I don't blame you. I'll have a salami on rye with cheese."

"I'm not going to try to do anything more about the way you eat," Janet told him. "I think you could digest granite with the right seasoning."

"Sure," Tony agreed. "The salami people pay me for the endorsement. If I tried to eat frou-frou salads like you I'd disappear like Judge Crater. By the way, who was Judge Crater?"

"A guy who disappeared," said Janet.

Tony stopped short and waved his arm at all of Palm Springs which lay before them, dark and sleeping under its rustling palm trees. "Between Janet and me," he announced to whom it might concern, "we know everything."

Among the friends they met there was Ed Trzcinski, one of the writers of Stalag 17. Tony did a nice portrait of him. Ed was so pleased that in return he offered to teach Tony enough Freud to enable him to psychoanalyze Janet. Tony refused.

"I don't want to analyze her," he said. "I just want to idolize her. And I know I can't have both."

"That's the nicest thing you've ever said about me," Janet told him. "I think."

There were serious interludes, too, during the vacation, like the afternoon Tony revealed to some of their friends that he and Janet were not at all unmindful of their future and the necessity of planning.

"We have a feeling that one day we might want to pull up stakes and maybe go to New York, produce our own picture abroad, or something like that," he said. "If that turns out to be the case we don't want to be walking around with a mortgage and a pair of worried looks. We want to be able to take off in a couple of days."

"So that's why you rent a house instead of buying, eh?" he was asked.

NOR HEED THE RUMBLE OF THE DISTANT DRUM

Two years ago I visited Sugar Hill, an off-Broadway night club. The tables were pushed close together and right next to me sat Dane Clark and Phil Foster, making the rounds stag. The lights were dim and a lovely Negro girl was dancing to the beating of drums. At the very climax of the dance, when all was still and expectant, Dane Clark yelled, "Tondelayo!" and convulsed the nearby tables. Later on they good-naturedly signed autographs and took pictures with us.

Marilyn Lenoff

"One of the big reasons," he replied. "We could slap enough money down now to 'go into escrow' on a mansion somewhere, but it wouldn't be wise. Outside of the fact that we want mobility, we want to be liquid. I mean we never want to have to accept a role just because we need the money for our obligations, real estate or otherwise. We owe it to our professional selves to keep out from under pressure and to determine all our moves by artistic considerations. We don't want any of our followers to have to see us do anything which is not suitable for us and which we would not do well.

"For instance, even though Janet and I partnered up for Houdini, and we fit well into our next co-starring picture, The Black Shield of Falworth, we are not a team by any means. Just because Houdini did wonderfully at the box office and they predict the same thing for The Black Shield Of Falworth, doesn't mean we should work together again—not ever if the right roles don't come up. We are essentially just two people who happen to be married, not an actress and an actor who married because it was a smart thing to do professionally."

Everybody said Tony had the right idea, but a girl who had been listening to him asked Janet if this reasoning suited her. "After all, you want your home and your homemaking now, don't you?" she asked.

"I have my home now," replied Janet. "It's a rented one, but if Tony and I hadn't been fortunate enough to be in pictures, and be making the salaries we do, a rented home would have been all we could afford anyway. And we'd have loved it!"

"Yes, but a home that isn't your very own, really your own, doesn't feel the same, does it?" asked the girl, persisting. "I mean nothing has a sense of permanence and you don't feel it's a place with all the things that, well—like the song goes, 'All The Things You Are.' "

"All those things we've got and we're still getting," Janet assured her. "We've got probably the only eight-room bungalow in Beverly Hills with only one bedroom. Don't you think that's individual? Everything except the dining room, living room and kitchen has been turned into a den, nook or plain hideaway. Of course we call them the bar room and the trophy room and what not, but they could turn out to be nurseries!

"In the meantime our little memories are accumulating, if nothing else. I love to be in the bar room sewing when Tony gets home from the studio. It's like a little ritual as he moves around, letting me know he's home in his own way, going about the business of forgetting his workaday world and fitting back into the role of husband and man of the house. He does it with a kiss, with a word about this and that, with the strange, gentle jazz music he likes to turn on every night. I'll say, 'Will you have a little glass of wine?' And he'll reply, 'Can't I have both?' And I'll ask, 'Meaning?' And he'll say, 'Meaning you.' "

What Janet knows about Tony, and likes to make plain, is that he doesn't think actors should be stable—like bankers. "The thought frightens me," he has said. "The minute you are settled, then you no longer want to gamble. To young people like Janet and me the picture business is still great adventure—like the wildcat oil business. We both know this may not be a sensible viewpoint but we are both for actors not being too sensible.

"I know I could be criticized for this but I don't mind. I don't mind almost anything reporters have to say about me. I'm lucky to get my name in print, if you ask me. Sometimes, however, I wish they wouldn't get off on a wrong kick like with that thing about Jerry Lewis and me feuding. You know how that started? Aw, what's the difference? If stories like that can get around about two old friends none of us has to worry about being too stable."

On the tenth day after their arrival at Palm Springs Janet and Tony went out to the pool to soak up a last dosage of sunshine. Charlie Farrell, their host, came by to lark around with them and bid them godspeed. A messenger walked out on the lawn paging, "Mrs. Tony Curtis," and handed Janet a package. Janet and Tony always open packages when they are delivered. She had to show it—an inscribed cigarette case for him.

"I hadn't meant to give it to you yet," she said. "The boy had to bring it out here!"

"Well, it's a nice present," he said. "But what's the occasion?"

She thought for a moment. "Oh, I haven't figured that out yet," she said. "Would St. Patrick's Day do?"

Tony responded to the best of his ability and then lay back in the sun again, closing his eyes. Janet leaned way over.

"I know," she said. "Him's baffled at me."

Tony reached up and around for her.

"Always," he said.

LOUELLA PARSONS' GOOD NEWS

Still a frequent twosome, Debbie Reynolds and Tab Hunter arrived together at Executive Suite première; denied all romance rumors.

Vera-Ellen, famous for her collection of costume jewelry, wore one of her most elaborate pieces to première. Richard Gully escorted her.

Pat Crowley came to the preem with Vic Damone. Pat has been making television appearances lately, getting a really big buildup.

June Haver and Fred MacMurray attended together, of course. Fred's most important picture, The Caine Mutiny, looks like a hit.

DALE ROBERTSON'S ROMANCE . . .

SHELLEY WINTERS, who exploded in Rome because she was so hurt over Vittorio Gassman, returned to Hollywood calmed down—at least on the surface.

She told me, "I just want to forget him. I don't want anything from him except support for little Vittoria. Thank God, I have my baby. I'm going to devote my life to her."

Right here is where I made the fatal mistake of asking Shelley if it is true she has fallen in love with another actor in Europe.

Shelley snapped, "I am no longer in the import-export business."

THE MORE I hear and see of Rock Hudson the better I like him. When première-time for Magnificent Obsession was rolling around (it's Rock's greatest picture) his studio asked him to take a famous glamour girl to the event.

Rock just shook his head. "Sorry, fellas," he said, "I invited Betty Abbott weeks ago and she's going to be my date."

Betty is the very pretty script girl at Universal-International whom Rock has been taking out pretty steadily. I asked one of his best friends if he thought it was a serious thing between Rock and Betty.

"Let's put it this way," the pal explained, "right now the big love in Rock's life is his career. He feels he is just beginning to get the right roles and he wants nothing to divert him from improving himself as an actor.

"He finds Betty wonderful company and she is very understanding of his point of view. I doubt if wedding bells have entered either of their thoughts. But as time goes on, and Rock becomes more firmly established—who knows? Betty may prove to be just the right girl for him."

SPEAKING OF the première of Magnificent Obsession, you should have seen the expression on Donald O'Connor's face when Julia Adams (the girl he's rumored to be "crazy about") walked right past him into the theatre on the arm of designer Bill Thomas!

Don had come stag because he thought Julia had a cold!

JOAN CRAWFORD wore what she described as a "little girl dress" of white embroidery to the surprise birthday party she gave for her press agent, Henry Rogers. But there was nothing "little girl" about the enormous diamond pin she was sporting—a real whopper.

The party was held in the private room at Chasen's cafe and it suddenly became the most glamorous "nightclub" in the world when the guests started putting on an impromptu show.

First to take over were June Allyson and director Chuck Walters who did an exhibition dance that would have done credit to the De Marcos or Veloz and Yolanda. Beaming proudly from a ringside table was Dick Powell, who thinks everything June does is perfect anyway.

Then Donald O'Connor and his sidekick, Sidney Miller, took over the mike. No one was surprised that this team was funny, but Don brought down the house when he sang, "My Secret Love" as beautifully as I have ever heard it.

Doris Day had first been invited to warble her Oscar-winning song. But she said she was too nervous to do it. So she sat nearby coaching Don with the words which he did not know.

Next came Jane Wyman really going to town singing "Sunny Side Of The Street" accompanied by the composer, Jimmy McHugh.

Joan's fifteen-year-old daughter Christina was permitted to come to the party and stay until ten o'clock. From the expression on her face at ten o'clock, methinks the young lady didn't care for that going-home routine.

Fred MacMurray was with June Haver. Who else? No matter how crowded the room, these two never seem to realize anyone else is around.

I continue to be amazed by the way the pregnant ladies of today get around—and in the highest fashion, too. Jane Greer Lasker, who looked as though she might have her baby the following morning, was radiant in a cute natural straw hat with a perky rose on top—and she danced every time the music struck up.

Another expectant mother, Frances (Mrs. Van) Heflin wore a cocoa chiffon cocktail dress that could have been worn by a Paris model. She and Van arrived in his low-slung Jaguar. "I love riding in it," said Frances, "but the getting in and out takes a bit of doing."

One of my favorite bits of the evening was watching George Burns do a soft shoe routine a la the old vaudeville days. It was quite a wingding Miss Crawford hosted—or should I say hostess-ed?

RAN INTO Dale Robertson right after his return from location on Sitting Bull in Mexico City and he was plenty hot under the collar over printed stories that he got into a saloon brawl down there over Mary Murphy.

"It was just one of those things that often happen to actors in public," Dale said. "An obnoxious drunk gets funny, passes some cracks and there's nothing left to do but take a poke at him."

Whether he got into a fight over Mary or not, my money says that she is the big romance in his life right now. These two have dinner almost every night in one of the quiet bistros and the way they look at one another isn't chilly.

Shortly after Dale parted from his wife there was a lot of noise that he would marry Cherie de Castro when he is free. Cherie is the cute chorus girl at the Moulin Rouge whose press agent started beating the drums that she was Dale's true love.

Dale settled this with, "Cherie's still married. So am I until my interlocutary decree becomes final in eight months. But even if we were both as free as the air we would stay that way!"

MOST OF HOLLYWOOD was on the police blotter for some happening or other this month. For a few weeks movietown sounded like one of Jack Webb's Dragnet episodes. Here are the facts, ma'am:

A few hours after about ninety guests and I departed Jane Wyman's house after a gala party, a housebreaker lifted $19,000 of Janie's jewelry and padded out of the house so softly that Jane, Freddie Karger, the two children and the servants slept through the whole thing!

P.S. A man was later arrested in Tia Juana and part of Janie's stolen gems were found on him.

JUST A FEW DAYS following the Wyman theft, a police ambulance was called to take Dr. Lew Morrill away from the home of his estranged wife, Rhonda Fleming. Lew had fallen and broken his leg in three places.

"We had been discussing our problems late into the evening and I asked Lew to get some firewood," redheaded Rhonda explained. "He slipped on a rock and was barely able to drag himself to the back door. He was screaming with pain."

Rhonda said she was "very sorry" about the accident, but she didn't see how it necessarily meant she should make up with poor Lew who, doctors say, will be laid up from seven to ten months. She filed for divorce the day after he left the hospital.

And Aldo Ray was actually picked up by the cops after he left the home of his fiancée, Jeff Donnell, and returned several hours later to pick up the script of Battle Cry which he had forgotten.

Attempting to slip quietly into the patio where he had left it on a table, and hoping not to awaken Jeff, Ray was suddenly seized by patrol guards who had been posted in the neighborhood after a series of robberies.

If Aldo hadn't beaten on the door hard enough to awaken Jeff and clear himself, he would have spent the night in the bastille.

WHETHER it was lost, dropped or stolen, the police were called when Mary Pickford's $20,000 canary diamond clip, surrounded by 250 baguette diamonds, was "missed" somewhere between the Mocambo and a private party.

WITH ALL the fuss about Donald O'Connor's reference to her pregnancy after she sang "Secret Love" at the Academy Awards, I asked Ann Blyth McNulty herself how she felt about it.

"I thought it was cute," laughed Ann. "Don and I have been pals for years. I was amused when he said 'Secret Love' had been sung by Ann Blyth and family."

So there—all you critics who panned Don!

THE RECONCILIATION between the Gene Nelsons didn't take although Gene did everything in his power to woo Miriam back after the Jane Powell episode.

Miriam dated Gene, and she thought seriously about it because of their little boy.

But she finally decided, "When love is really dead, and not just hidden under the embers, it is almost impossible to bring it to life again no matter how hard we try."

TAKE IT EASY, take it easy! Bing Crosby is not pictured as a hopeless drunk in The Country Girl.

Alarmed over the barrage of letters flooding the studio, Paramount is launching a campaign to counteract the rumors that Bing is soused throughout the picture with Grace Kelly and Bill Holden.

Head man Adolph Zukor says, "To calm all fears, we will show the finished film to a committee of churchmen before the release. This will assure all the fans who respect Mr. Crosby and look up to him that he will not be portrayed as an unsavory character."

Bing himself says, "I'm shown taking only one drink in the whole picture. It's really a theme of faith and two people's belief in a man who has lost his way and who gets back on the right path because of them."

Spike Jones' Easter TV show was seen by many stars' kids. Jane Powell took Geary, Jr. and Suzanne; Pat Nerney took daughter Mona.

Joan Crawford brought daughters Cathy and Cynthia, who wore identical dresses and accessories. (Note name tags worn by all the kids.)

Dale Evans brought Cheryl, Doe, Sandy and Rusty. They were the most colorful except for Spike Jones, Jr., who wore a gay checked suit.

I'M REALLY on my soapbox against Simone Silva, the brazen French girl who posed nude-above-the-waist with Robert Mitchum at the Cannes film festival, coming to Hollywood for a film career.

And while I'm on the subject, I think Mr. Mitchum's conduct was unpardonable, too, and if his excuse is that if he hadn't been in the pictures he would have been forced into a creek, I say he should have fallen in the creek!

Somebody is going to have to bring this young man to terms before he brings another major scandal on Hollywood. He has been very, very lucky in having the friendship of a powerful producer to keep his career going. And, he has been lucky in having a wife like Dorothy, a very fine woman.

But to get back to this Simone person. She impudently stated in Cannes that she did her outrageous act because she wanted a career in Hollywood.

When she arrived in New York she "obliged" the photographers by doing a modified version of her Cannes striptease. And, in Hollywood, she stated at the airport, "My bosom is larger than Jane Russell's or Marilyn Monroe's and I shall become just as famous."

This is what we are looking for in Hollywood?????? I shan't even mention the name of the sensation-seeking producer who signed her and I hope by the time you read this she is on her way back to France.

MADLY IN LOVE with brewer Philip Liebmann and wanting to be with him all the time, Linda Darnell (usually a doll to work with) was as snappish as a cross puppy making Night Music.

If an actor missed a cue or muffed a line, Linda would break into nervous tears and then time would have to be taken out while her make-up was repaired.

When a reporter asked her if she and Liebmann, a very attractive young man as well as a rich one, would be married when the picture was finished, Linda snapped, "Wait till the picture is finished and find out."

Unless present plans go way astray, I'm betting that Linda and Liebmann (head man of the Rheingold Beer Company) will be married by the time you read this and on their way to a honeymoon in Europe.

PERSONAL OPINIONS: The supposed feud between Ava Gardner and Italy's leading glamour girl, Gina Lollobrigida, in Rome was strictly a phony, just for the publicity on Barefoot Contessa. Gina is said to have visited the set and Ava refused to meet her. For the record (straight from my Italian spy) Ava wasn't even working this day. . . . They held a private showing of The Caine Mutiny for me and I can tell you that Robert Francis, the newcomer who plays the boy, will be a terrific hit. Watch for this boy, he's going to be great. . . . Ooops! William Holden's "asking price" has jumped to $200,000 per picture since he won the Oscar. . . . Cleo Moore is too pretty and too talented to permit her press agent to keep harping on the fact that she is "the kiss girl" whose long smooch with disk jockey Jack Eigen got him fired from his TV show in Chicago. . . . Isn't Kirk Douglas ever going to get a screen role which will permit him a haircut? Kirk has the longest bob in town. . . . 'Kinda cute the way Lex Barker is teaching Lana Turner to economize, something Lana has never heretofore gone in for. Lex told her, "We can either take a two weeks vacation in Honolulu or build a new room on the house for the kids. Which do you prefer?"—and Lana settled for the new room! . . . Frank Sinatra wants to turn director and I love Frankie's reply to someone who asked him, "What makes you think you can be a director?" He said, "The same thing that made me think I could be a singer—and an actor!"

EASTER IN Palm Springs was plenty hot (110 in the shade—and no shade)—but plenty of fun. The William Perlbergs had a big party on Saturday night which became Virginia Mayo and Mike O'Shea had to build an additional room onto their home to accommodate baby Mary Catherine, ended up remodeling entire house to include porch in photo. But the O'Sheas say it's worth it, plan to have more kids. Complete story of their wacky, wonderful life on page 36.

even bigger than expected when Lindsay Crosby showed up with eight of his Loyola school pals—and they all had dates.

Lindsay's old man, Bing, is like a mother hen whenever Lindsay and his cronies are around. "I have so much fun with the kids," Bing told me, "I've called off my trip to Europe."

One of the prettiest girls in Lindsay's group was Danny Thomas' daughter, Marjorie. She's a student at Marymount and so attractive.

Mary and Jack Benny and Kitty and Mervyn Le Roy were also among the guests who had a time with the kids.

THE LETTER BOX: "Chalene," of New York, writes: "I want Dale Robertson to know he hasn't lost a single fan by his divorce. In a magazine Mrs. Robertson is quoted as saying, 'I had the feeling from the beginning that he regretted our marriage.' Looks like she didn't expect the marriage to last and with her thinking like that, how could it? She blames everything on him. Gallantly, he has nothing to say against her. We're for Dale!"

Dorothy McDonald, The Plains, Ohio, doesn't go for Peter Lawford: "I always think of him as Petah Lahwfahd. Don't you?" Not necessarily. Many fans are crazy for Petah.

Emily MacMasters, Sanford, Florida: "I am completely through with Vittorio Gassman, his conceit and his heart of rock." You and Shelley Winters, Emily.

"I wish Suzan Ball and Dick Long to know that they have made the heart of the world beat a little more tenderly because of their inspiring love story," writes Sally del Valle, from Havana, Cuba. "They more than make up for such sordid romances as Zsa Zsa Gabor and that man, and many others I shan't dignify by naming."

Mrs. Donald Wallisch thinks Montgomery Clift was robbed because he didn't get the Oscar for his "inspired" playing in From Here To Eternity. "Clift is the screen's greatest actor," says Mrs. Wallisch. William Holden isn't bad either, Mrs. W.!

That's all for now. See you next month.

TV TALK

Brando can be funny . . . Ray Milland is unhappy . . . Wally Cox becomes a ladies' man . . . Ed Murrow is shy.

You hear lots of things about Marlon Brando, but you hardly ever hear about his sense of humor. Well, he has one, all right. And he doesn't always duck when his fans approach. One time, when he was holed up in his apartment in New York and the newspapers were full of how he was dodging their reporters, he was playing a little game with a few of his fans who wanted his autograph. They found their way to his door and he answered it right away. He wouldn't open it of course (he's not that friendly), but he talked to them through the keyhole, claiming he was too short to open the door. And then he climbed up and chatted through the transom, claiming he was too tall! He may be a crazy, mixed-up kid, but he has his fun. All his friends consider him a great wit, in fact; and Wally Cox, his old pal from grammar school days, just wishes he could be as amusing . . . Wally, of course, is a real wit, on the screen and in private life. If you can cock your ear close enough to hear his whispery voice, it's mighty rewarding. His friends are devoted to him, and like nothing better than to have him around entertaining them. He sometimes picks up very old-fashioned books in his meanderings around town and arrives to read them out loud. With his dead-pan delivery, the dullest, most Victorian prose in the world turns into something that could wow 'em in vaudeville. His hosts also like him because he's so wonderful with children. He has that knack of talking to them that makes them love him as much as he loves them. The main reason he likes kids so much is that he's jealous. He would love to have some of his own. And, seeing as how Wally has turned into quite a ladies' man, he just might do what he's done on Mr. Peepers and get married. In the meantime, though, he's got his mind on making a movie. But he won't make it in Hollywood. He insists that it be made in Europe so he can have some fun along with his work. Wally has only been to Europe once (last summer, when he joined Marlon there for two weeks), but he fell in love with it, and he's eager to return . . . Gary Merrill is looking seedier and seedier, and no one can figure out why. Even when he goes to the theatre on an opening night, he's got a few days' beard and sideburns that can't be beat. If he were playing a part that required them, everyone would understand. But he's not . . . You hear lots of talk about some celebrities who keep their wives in the background because they want to keep their professional lives and their private lives far apart. Perry Como does it. But Garry Moore is even more insistent on the sanctity of his home than Perry is. The main reason in the Moore household is Mrs. M. She doesn't care for show business, not one whit; for all anyone knows, she's never even looked at one of Garry's shows. She just ignores his career and doesn't even use the name "Mrs. Garry Moore." She's Mrs. Garrison Morfit (that's Garry's real name). Garry absolutely refuses to have any reporters or photographers anywhere near his wife and children. One other reason for the curtain: Garry's afraid his sons will let the publicity go to their heads, and he wants them to grow up as nice, normal boys . . . Everyone knew that Dorothy Kilgallen was going to have a third baby, but no one could have told it from looking at her. She remained impeccably groomed and quite slim. And she started gadding about town again about ten days after the little boy arrived. Dorothy looked wonderful, too. She and her husband, Dick Kollmar, have an elegant town house. Dick prowls all over town every Christmas to find something special for one of their favorite rooms in it. It's their "Americana Room," and he picks up real art treasures for the little woman to put in it . . . Some of Steve Allen's friends wonder if Jayne (I've Got A Secret) Meadows is quite the girl for him. They can't quite envision the gay Jayne scrambling eggs. But Steve's a sensible young man and he knows what he's doing. He certainly knows what he's doing when it comes to careers. His has never been in better shape . . . You'd never realize it to look at him on TV now, but Robert Montgomery used to be a brat of a boy. When he was very young, he lived in a boarding house; and he used to have a cute trick of lying in wait for the boarders to come home at night and then jump out, yell at them and run away down the dark halls. It's hard to believe that little boy has grown up to be a big movie star, movie producer, television star, television producer and adviser to the President of the United States! . . . Peg Lynch's real-life husband (she's the author and star of Ethel And Albert, of course, looks as little like Alan Bunce, who plays Albert, as any man could. He's one of those Scandinavians who look so young for so long. Odd Knut Ronning (yes, that's his name!) could pass for a man of twenty-five if he wanted to—the slim, blond type. He looks, in fact, very much like a pale version of Montgomery Clift . . . Audrey Hepburn has gotten so fancy now that she calls shops from her elegant dressing room at the theatre and asks that they bring her a selection of clothes to choose from. The shops do it, of course, even in the pouring rain. Speaking of Audrey's dressing room, her co-star and constant companion, Mel Ferrer, only wishes he had one as elegant. Audrey's was redone and refurbished until it was almost as grand as Rosalind Russell's. But Mel had to fight to get a decent chair in his . . . Ray Milland has never liked his TV show, Meet Mr. McNutley, very much—and that's putting it mildly! He insisted on some changes at first, and they made it a little better. But he's still not happy. Why does he do it? One reason is obvious: money. The other: Milland just loves to work. He can do more than almost any other actor, and he thrives on it. He also doesn't let it take away his social pleasures. Milland can find time for both . . . You know that black-sequinned dress Jack Benny wears when he's masquerading as his old friend Gracie Allen? Well, it's one Rita Hayworth once wore in a movie, believe it or not. We don't know how much it had to be altered where! . . . When Edward R. Murrow is praised for his modesty, whoever says it is telling the truth. Ed's favorite memento—out of thousands—is a silver box from the CBS newsmen who worked with him all through the war. Where do you think they had their signatures engraved? On the bottom. They knew Ed as well as anyone did when they wrote them there rather than on the top where people could see the names. And Ed appreciated the modest gesture just as much as they knew he would. Ed's modesty probably doesn't have anything to do with it, but do you know that he still, to this day, sweats when he delivers a speech? Even when he's talking to a group he knows, the beads of perspiration roll down his face. And he gets as pale as a ghost. No one can understand it. After all, he's been on radio for nearly twenty years, and on TV for three. But the nerves in the man are painfully visible every time he starts to make a public address. Did you know, by the way, that Ed is the highest-paid man at CBS? He makes a lot more than the president or even the chairman of the board!

At last on the screen!

South of the border in a small hotel, Gene Tierney and Aly Khan found privacy—and a new security in their love.

BY ALICE CRAIG GREENE

"I certainly consider myself engaged," Gene told reporters at the Rosarito Beach Hotel in Mexico, added that they'd marry soon.

Unlike Rita Hayworth, Gene is not a homebody, thoroughly enjoys Aly's extensive traveling and social life with the international horsey set.

■ The playboy of the eastern world went to Mexico to join his fiancée, American movie actress Gene Tierney.

For a couple of years the world press has been wondering aloud if the love of Gene and Aly Khan would come to marriage. Now the formal answer has come from an obscure, sun-drenched little resort about twenty miles below the Mexican border, in Baja California.

The Rosarito Beach Hotel has a reputation for being the most deserted hotel in the world—even when it's full. People go there not to be seen. Although all facilities of a busy resort hotel are encompassed in the attractive, sprawling white buildings, most of the guests don't use the swimming pool, the tennis courts, the bar or dancing salons.

Word of the discretion of the management and the anonymity to be found there, has spread among people who want to disappear a little while.

A group of such people drove to the doors of this remote little spot on the afternoon of March 28. Two Cadillac limousines (rented previously from a San Diego taxicab company by telephone from Mexico City) and a black Jaguar two-seater sports car had waited at the Tijuana airport. The Jag was so new it had no license, only a windshield sticker. At two-twenty that afternoon a couple alighted from the Pan American plane from Mexico City, on which they were registered as "Mr. and Mrs. Melvin Taylor, independent worker and housewife."

Hollywood's worried about Lanza; this time he's really

OUT OF SHAPE

■ Mario Lanza weighs 252 pounds. He owes an estimated $165,000 in income taxes for 1952. His wife has ordered him out of their Beverly Hills home several times lately. He is estranged from his parents, too. It would seem that things can't get much worse for this popular singer who was on top two years ago. Nonetheless, there are chances for him still —if he will only take advantage of them.

From Las Vegas, Mario Lanza has received some good offers—payment of his tax debt plus a salary of $25,000 a week—if he will get into shape. So far, he has refused to make the necessary effort.

Columbia Pictures considered Lanza for the re-make of One Night Of Love, but they insisted that he get psychiatric help before they were willing to take a chance on him.

Now the Lanzas live on a small weekly allowance from his royalties at RCA Victor. The rest goes to the Government for unpaid taxes. Victor is releasing recordings Lanza made with Ray Sinatra in 1949 ("Lolita" is the first one). And that's about the only way you can hear Mario Lanza sing these days.

she calls him baby

The luggage, Mrs. Tierney and William were put into the Cadillacs. Aly and Gene got into her Jaguar (a present from him) and the caravan started south. Half an hour later, the Cadillacs—now with Aly—drove up to the Rosarito Beach Hotel.

Manager Roberto Bravo came out to greet the newcomers, and was astonished to recognize the prince, who had made no reservations. His hostelry was unaccustomed to serving royalty and he suffered a moment of panic before assigning the party to the Presidential suite—actually three connecting living room-bedroom suites at $54 a day each, one for Aly, one for Mrs. Tierney and one for William.

All Bravo could think of in those first hectic moments was how sportily the prince dressed—a sweater, a sports coat, a scarf and tight-fitting black pants like Mexican charros, but without the usual bright braid down the sides of the legs.

About an hour later, the black Jaguar drove up, and Manager Bravo recognized Gene Tierney. She wore black slacks, a heavy black coat and big black glasses. But the familiar and unusual beauty of the famous redhead wasn't really hidden by the superficial disguise. Gene was taken to her mother's section of the suite.

She remained until midnight when she and her mother drove to the international border to meet a car which drove them to the 20th Century-Fox Studio in Hollywood. Arriving at six A.M. Gene went to work on her new picture, The Egyptian. But by four the next morning she had rejoined Aly in Rosarito.

MEANWHILE, Gene's studio was rounding up a confused press conference. Fox publicist Peggy McNaught flew south Tuesday afternoon to try to organize it.

The famous pair appeared early in the afternoon to "meet the press." Gene wore a pale green flannel skirt with a matching cardigan sweater. Aly wore casual slacks and a sports shirt. They posed freely for photographers, although Aly requested, "No corny shots, please," as he once refused to pose with Gene when she sat on a playground swing. He put his hands into his pockets, but Gene put her arm through his as they posed.

Gene was more aggressive and informative than Aly. She displayed the enormous square-cut diamond, set in platinum (about $25,000) which Aly had given her.

"I knew I loved Aly a year and a half ago," she said. "He told me he loved me long before that. He proposed a year ago May, and I told him I thought it would be a good idea. It is untrue that Aly's father ever objected to our marriage. And I see no conflict in our religions. I certainly consider myself engaged, and," looking toward Aly, "we're very much in love, Baby and I—

"We probably will be married within six months, I imagine in Europe." She added she would take her two children, Daria and Christina, with them and would give up her career when she married.

Gene refused to allow her statements to be recorded on the sound film of newsreel cameras. "I get paid for doing that at the studios, so why should I do it for nothing?" she said.

A photographer asked Aly whether to call him "prince" or "mister."

PERFUMER

(Continued from page 19) called everything, anyway. Usually, they refer to me as the 'dashing playboy.' I don't really give a damn what they call me. I race horses and I travel. My suitcase is my home. But I wish you could come along on the tours I make for my people to see the work I do. I've visited many countries as an emissary for the world's ten to eighteen million Moslems.

"I wish more of your people could come to the Middle East, and more of my people could come here. I'm a believer in getting together for a better understanding."

Aly said he hoped to stay in Mexico a week or so and then return to "my domicile in France" after a trip to Venezuela. In August he plans to be in Saratoga for the horse sales, and he'll see his two sons, one at Harvard and one at prep school.

He refused to speak of their romance or marriage plans. "No, I won't talk about that. This is an extremely personal thing. I'm entitled to some privacy. That's why I sought out this place, particularly."

When Gene refused to speak for the sound film of the newsreels and they declined to take pictures of her without sound, she hurried off to her new Jaguar with Aly following. She got in behind the wheel, said, "Jump in, Baby," posed for one photo, and then headed north.

There was speculation as to whether the couple would marry while they were in Baja, California. But although they made inquiries about the possibilities of marriage there, they learned that for the marriage to be legal in the States, a six months' residence was required. Gene's mother echoed her opinion that they would be married on the Riviera within six months.

After the first twenty-four hours of excitement, with the press, photographers, and curiosity seekers swarming about the usually quiet resort, with Aly angrily phoning periodically to demand privacy, they got the peace they wanted.

They had all their meals in their suite. They only came out for one walk on the beach each day. Completely absorbed in their talk, they walked hand-in-hand or with their arms around each other. It was a week of just being together.

Manager Bravo had no complaints about his royal guest and party. The only thing Aly complained about, he said, was that there were too many phone calls. Six of these were person-to-person from Dick Haymes in New York, the husband of Aly's former wife, Rita Hayworth. Aly would not accept the calls. Speculation was that this was in regard to a proposed meeting with Rita over a final financial settlement on their daughter Yasmin. But apparently Aly didn't intend to let anything interfere with his vacation. (Of course he did go to New York later to help Rita when she was accused of neglecting her children and to straighten out the terms of the settlement.)

Manager Bravo pointed out, "We don't have the kind of service these people are used to. They have put up with our facilities very graciously. They are wonderfully understanding, nice people. Naturally, when someone like the prince visits us, expenses go up. We have to hire extra people to expedite service. We must have a wider selection of foods. But they presented no real problem. It was a pleasure to have been host to them."

When Manager Bravo offered Aly horses to ride, Aly said he would let Bravo know, but that he liked only fine horses. After looking over the stable, he suggested he would prefer to walk. And did.

As a reporter remarked one day, when Gene had to go to Hollywood for shots on The Egyptian, "That guy almost walks you to death. Three miles down the beach, three miles back, at full speed. Then jumping up all those steps. He's in excellent physical shape. Not the usual 'international set' type. Quite a wonderful guy. He likes races, gambling, horses, travel—but he has a deeper side, too."

Aly also has a keen grasp of world affairs and politics. Most interesting was his report of traveling for his father through the Middle East and India, on hospital projects, school programs and general improvement for their people. The famed birthday donation for his father's weight in platinum—except for a small token acceptance by the Aga Khan—was put into a fund to back small business enterprises. On Aly's travels, he had to be a bystander officially, but behind the scenes he worked actively, feeling that the Moslem world must find an alliance with the West.

One of his hardest tasks, he said, is to find names for every one of the children born each year to the people of the ruling house—no matter how remote the ties of family blood. It amounts to about 2000 names a year. Another chore is to sign all licenses to marry and okay all divorces.

On Wednesday night the couple drove down to Ensenada to put some miles on Gene's Jaguar, to look around the picturesque Mexican town, sixty-four miles south of their resort hotel, and to listen to Mexicans shout tequila-flavored love songs at the sky. They didn't return until nearly midnight. They shopped, saw all the little bars and hotels, and wandered almost unnoticed along the streets.

On Friday, Gene reluctantly flew to the Mojave Desert for some final location shots on her picture. But she returned as quickly as she could. Saturday the couple drove to Ensenada again, and despite Aly's avowed aversion to fishing, went fishing.

> A lot of folks in my home town, soon as they heard I was on TV, went out and bought sets. That may not sound like much, but it does when you realize that there wasn't any station!
> —Herb Shriner

"If you want something on me no one else has," she laughed, "you can say I came down here and had more fun than I've ever had in my life. I went out on a boat and went fishing. I threw my line overboard and pulled in a fish, threw it again and pulled in another. Six times—and I pulled in six fish!"

They were expected in Tijuana for the races at Caliente Sunday, but they didn't return in time. They slept late and spent the afternoon wandering in the shops.

They returned to Rosarito Sunday night and had another day together before Aly checked out Tuesday morning, April 6. Gene had checked out the night before. Aly left the hotel with his man William and the chauffeur of the hired limousine.

Somewhere along the lonely stretch of highway, Gene met the prince in her Jaguar, for when they reached the border, Aly was driving the sports car behind the sedan. It took only a few minutes for border officials to wave them across the line.

The limousine went on, and Aly drove the sports car north. Close beside him was the woman he loved, the woman who calls him "Baby." It might be a while before they could be alone together again. Gene would have to return to work and Aly would have to continue his trip.

But their ten days had reaffirmed their faith in happiness ahead. And the world finally had been admited to the secret of their love and their plans for marriage, as Gene said, "perhaps within six months, probably in Europe." END it's easy to avoid chafing on "those days"

All you have to do is give up hot, "chafey" external pads and turn to the Tampax* method of sanitary protection. Tampax is worn internally and positively will not chafe or irritate, no matter how warm the weather is. In fact, the wearer doesn't even feel it, once it's in place.

Tampax has many other warm weather advantages. For one thing, it prevents odor from forming—and what a blessing that is! Tampax also gives you the freedom of the beach. It can't "show" under a bathing suit; you even wear Tampax while you're swimming.

If you're planning on going away, just remember this: Tampax is extremely easy to dispose of, even when the plumbing is erratic. Get this doctor-invented product at any drug or notion counter in your choice of 3 absorbencies: Regular, Super, Junior. Month's supply goes into purse; economy size gives 4 times as much. Picture of the Month: THE CAINE MUTINY

■ The trial scene from the Pulitzer Prize winning novel, The Caine Mutiny, was turned into a hit play. Now Stanley Kramer has produced a film—in Technicolor—which is based on the whole book. It's a brilliant, beautifully acted job. A new actor, Robert Francis, is perfectly cast as Willie Keith, around whom much of the story revolves. He is a young ensign, assigned to the Caine. Among his fellow officers are Keefer (Fred MacMurray) a novelist and intellectual whose talk lays the groundwork for mutiny but whose weakness forbids him to act; Maryk (Van Johnson) honest, earnest and competent who, once the seeds of suspicion are sown in him about Captain Queeg, moves forward doggedly toward what may be his own doom. Queeg himself—a staunch believer in absolute discipline, petty about details, petrified to the point of immobility in the face of danger—is played superbly by Humphrey Bogart. José Ferrer is a shrewd lawyer under whose questioning Queeg breaks down and Maryk is exonerated from the charges of mutiny. There is romance, action and depth in The Caine Mutiny which, like the book, is slick and genuinely dramatic. Others in the large cast are Tom Tully, Katharine Warren, May Wynn.—Columbia

Ensign Willie Keith (played by promising newcomer Robert Francis) has a troubled romance with nightclub singer May Wynn before reporting for duty.

Stationed on the broken-down destroyer-minesweeper Caine, Willie meets Lt. Maryk (Van Johnson), rugged, competent officer of a worried crew.

Lt. Keefer (Fred MacMurray), an intellectual with little ability to carry his plans through, believes Lt. Comdr. Queeg (Humphrey Bogart) is unbalanced.

In a typhoon Queeg's erratic behavior forces Maryk to take command, leading to his courtmartial and defense by Lt. Greenwald (José Ferrer).

RAILS INTO LARAMIE They're trying to build a railroad out Laramie way but everybody's lying down on the job because Dan Duryea tells them to. He runs the town, owns the saloon and wants to keep those railway workers around as long as possible. The good citizenry demand Army troops, they get John Payne. What can one man do? Well, he fires everybody, thus threatening a general depression; he closes the saloon, tangles with Duryea's henchmen and incites general violence. Isn't a body in town doesn't want to run him out, but he has faith in himself. Even has the audacity to haul in Duryea on a murder charge. Isn't a man in town fearless enough to sit on the jury. So Payne calls for an all-woman jury (headed by Mari Blanchard), and justice is done in Laramie. Technicolor. With Joyce MacKenzie, James Griffith, Lee Van Cleef.—U-I

JOHNNY DARK "Safety and strength for six," is the motto of the Fielding Motor Company, and President Sidney Blackmer will stand or fall on that. Well, he's standing, but business is falling off due to his reactionary policies. Build a sports car, his stockholders tell him. Never, he sneers. One day chief engineer Paul Kelly trots out a beaut of a sports car design by Johnny Dark (Tony Curtis) and Blackmer says, Okay, make it. But sell it? No sir. Blackmer just wants a sample model with which to placate the stockholders. Little does he wot that said car is being entered in a race from Canada to Mexico. Wot or not, that car restores business to its former prosperity. The race itself is thrilling, full, as they say, of chills and spills. Between times test driver Don Taylor and Curtis chase Piper Laurie, Blackmer's granddaughter. Technicolor, with Ilka Chase.—U-I

PLAYGIRL Seems that when a pretty girl comes to New York she takes her life in her hands. Anyway, that's what happens to colleen Miller. Arrives all agog to be met by nightclub singer Shelley Winters. Shelley rushes her into an evening gown and there she sits in a cafe with men ogling and social Richard Long implying it's okay to take money from guys who like to throw it around. Shelley says it's okay, too, but the way her life's going she's no judge. She's in love with publisher Barry Sullivan whose wife won't leave him. Barry turns Colleen into a cover girl and makes Shelley so jealous she goes gunning after him. Scandal ruins both girls' careers. Jaded? Bitter? They'll tell the world! Playgirl is supposed to be slick but even with a happy ending it comes out sordid. With Gregg Palmer, Kent Taylor—U-I

THE MIAMI STORY Swiftly paced, suspenseful, The Miami Story has a documentary air which lends even more excitement. Luther Adler heads a gambling empire so successfully that the police can't pin anything on him. A citizen's committee is formed and a lawyer on it remembers Mick Flagg (Barry Sullivan), ex-gangster whom he saved from the chair. Flagg is leading a farmer's life with his son (David Kasday) but that changes in a hurry. He sets up a flashy front in Miami, poses as the head of a powerful Cuban mob and then warns Adler that he's moving in. And does he move fast! Well versed in underworld rules, he knows how to handle all the punks, henchmen and molls that come his way. Evidence piles up against Adler who, in a desperate move, kidnaps Flagg's son. But he can't win any more. John Baer, Adele Jergens, Beverly Garland are among the cast.—Col.

APACHE When the last of the Apaches went down into the reservation there was one, Massai (Burt Lancaster), who rebelled with such violence and pride that he became a legend. In irons along with Geronimo, on the way to imprisonment in Florida, Massai escapes. He wanders dazed through a midwestern city and with the endurance of a fanatic, walks back to his reservation. His girl (Jean Peters) welcomes him. Her father (Paul Guilfoyle) betrays him to the authorities. Massai escapes again. Vengeful, he wreaks havoc at an Army post, rides off into the mountains with Jean. He plans to kill her but her loyalty is evident and they live together, always on the move. A scout (John McIntyre) one of his greatest admirers, is nevertheless relentless in his search for Massai. One day he finds him. Massai, who now prefers peace, meets that day like a warrior. Technicolor.—U.A.

WITNESS TO MURDER Try to report a murder these days and you're liable to wind up in the loony bin. Mum's the word, I tell you. Case in point is Barbara Stanwyck, who spots George Sanders strangling a lady across the street. (That is, Sanders lives in an apartment across the street and does his strangling with the blinds up.) Barbara calls the cops (Gary Merrill and Jesse White) but by the time they arrive that corpse must be in heaven because it sure isn't in Sanders' apartment. I couldn't have been dreaming, says Barbara, and what wise, patient smiles that statement evokes! Only one who believes her is Sanders. He sneaks into her apartment to type himself threatening letters, even boasts of his crime, feeling free, since Barbara's generally considered daft. When he tries to wipe her out, though, those smart California cops realize whose lid is flipped.—U.A.

LUCKY ME Here's a gay Technicolor musical (in CinemaScope) with a new score and old situations. Doris, Phil Silvers, Eddie Foy, Jr., and Nancy Walker are stranded in Miami after their act flops at a local theatre. Starved, they walk into a swank hotel, order dinner. Naturally, they can't pay and wind up in the kitchen. Noted songwriter Robert Cummings is a guest at the hotel. He's writing a musical, will produce it on Broadway if Martha Hyer's father, Texan Bill Goodwin, will back it. You know who gets to star in that show—Doris, of course. How? By a series of coincidences whereby she meets Cummings, mistakes him for an auto mechanic, blows up when his identity is revealed, softens, rehearses, blows up, relents, etc. Anyhow, the songs are swell and the atmosphere is cheerful and sometimes a lot of fun. You'll be crazy about Doris.—Warners

GORILLA AT LARGE Here's an old fashioned thriller in CinemaScope. Starts off with a gorilla thumping his chest while Anne Bancroft dangles above him on a trapeze. Scares the customers blind. Anne decides to put Cameron Mitchell in a gorilla suit so she can fall into his arms. Those tricks never work. When Anne falls that's no fake monkey grabbing her! Things get awfully complicated. No sooner does Mitchell get his suit than park employees start dropping dead of broken necks and gorilla scratches. Who done it? The motive, I can tell you, was blackmail. But as to who done it, even detective Lee J. Cobb doesn't know. Could it be Raymond Burr, owner of the park and Anne's husband? Could it be Peter Whitney, the gorilla's silent keeper and Anne's ex-husband? Could it be the gorilla? You'll see. Cast includes Charlotte Austin, Lee Marvin, Warren Stevens. Technicolor—20th Century-Fox

HER TWELVE MEN All the well-bred grace and charm that made Greer Garson famous are back in Her Twelve Men, the story of an exclusive boarding school for boys whose parents may be wealthy but not altogether wonderful. Greer is an inexperienced teacher, and the first woman to be admitted to the faculty. She meets with some hostility, especially on the part of Robert Ryan, another instructor. Inevitably, romance develops between them despite strenuous courting of Ryan by local glamour girl Barbara Lawrence. Essentially, though, this film deals with the lonely boys and the way in which Greer wins their love and respect. Particularly touching is young Ronald MacDonald's performance and the moment when Tim Considine, neglected son of tycoon Barry Sullivan, turns from a tense troublemaker into an appealing child. Cast: Richard Haydn, Rex Thompson, James Arness. Technicolor—MGM

PRINCE VALIANT (20th-Fox): Bob Wagner, James Mason, Janet Leigh, Debra Paget star in this swashbuckling, romantic tale of medieval chivalry. CinemaScope and Technicolor.

MAN WITH A MILLION (U.A.): A hilarious Technicolored British comedy with Gregory Peck starring in Mark Twain's story of a guy without a penny to his name and a million-pound banknote in his pocket.

ROSE MARIE (MGM): This one has Ann Blyth to sing "Indian Love Call" and be pursued through the Rockies by Mounties Howard Keel and Fernando Lamas—plus Bert Lahr and CinemaScope to make the chase more fun.

LA RONDE: Delightful French comedy with Anton Walbrook, Jean-Louis Barrault, Simone Simon, Danielle Darrieux as some of the lovers in a series of Viennese romances. English subtitles.

FRENCH LINE (RKO): Jane Russell sings, dances and clowns her way through this Technicolor musical about a girl too rich to be married. With Gilbert Roland.

NIGHT PEOPLE (20th-Fox): Swift-paced, suspenseful film about an American soldier kidnaped by the Russians in Germany. Gregory Peck, Broderick Crawford, Rita Gam. CinemaScope.

DRIVE A CROOKED ROAD (Col.): Mickey Rooney does a top acting job as a naive auto-racer inveigled into assisting a bank hold-up by beautiful Dianne Foster.

EXECUTIVE SUITE (MGM): June Allyson, Bill Holden, Fredric March, Barbara Stanwyck, Shelley Winters, Walter Pidgeon, Paul Douglas are among the exciting people involved in the business (and love) life of a big corporation.

TOP BANANA (U-I): Phil Silvers stars in this saga of a burlesque-to-TV comedian. With good tunes, lots of girls, the movie is as funny as the Broadway show.

RIOT IN CELL BLOCK 11 (A.A.): Filmed in Folsom State Prison with hundreds of actual prisoners appearing in mob scenes, this is one of the tensest, most exciting convict movies ever made.

NEW FACES (20th-Fox): Eartha Kitt in Technicolor is the most fascinating thing to happen to movies since sound. Surrounded by most of the Broadway musical's original cast, including Ronny Graham, Robert Clary, she slinks her way through "Monotonous," "C'est Si Bon," "Santa Baby," other hits.

No time for tears

There's never been a lovelier wedding than Suzan Ball's—nor a more beautiful sight than this courageous girl walking down the aisle.

BY LOUIS POLLOCK

■ There are always some who will cry at a wedding. But when Suzan Ball, as nervous and triumphant as a child taking her first steps, chose to make first public use of her artificial leg to walk down the aisle at her wedding the eyes of all two hundred guests at the El Monticido Presbyterian Church in Santa Barbara, filled with tears.

Yet an old studio friend of the bride and the bridegroom (Dick Long) even in her weeping, whispered to a companion, "There shouldn't be any crying here. The kids have never done any crying. If everyone knew the whole story, the real story, of Suzan's fight and her victory, they'd be cheering!"

Only three months before, Suzan, still hopeful after a year and a half of fighting to cure cancer of the bone in her right knee without amputation, heard the final shocking news. She had lost. Efforts to effect a cure by modified surgery (Continued on page 79)

the Heart is Everything

Here at last is the warm and wonderful story of Doris Day and the men in her life!

■ She'd just turned fifteen and life was over. She was lucky, they told her—she and the others who'd cheated death. This was true, yet the truth failed to sustain her. Last week she'd been dancing, now she lay like a strange block of cement in plaster casts. How could a gay, harmless evening lead to such blackness? How could the years of her life add up to this? Some day, when she was an ancient eighteen, she might walk again, on crutches or with a limp—if she stayed lucky. Against wave after sickening wave of disbelief, her face turned toward the wall, but monstrous contraptions held her body fast. From under the closed lids, hopeless tears welled and soaked slowly into the pillow.

The girl in the bed was Doris Kappelhoff, whose legs had danced from babyhood to the rhythm in her blood. The rhythm she owed to her father. A teacher of German in the Cincinnati schools, his spirit fed on music—but real music, as he called it. Anything less dignified than Brahams offended his soul. The popular records Doris loved were trash to him, and he had no patience with them. Nor much more with the vagaries of childhood. Brought up in the strict Teutonic school, he followed the same pattern with Paul and Doke. (To him she was always Doke, maybe in simple affection, maybe in protest against the foolishness of naming her after Doris Kenyon, her mother's favorite movie star.) Just as popular music spelled trash and no arguments, nightmares spelled nonsense. When she woke screaming against phantoms of terror in the dark, her screams would be choked by the voice of paternal authority. "Go right back to sleep and stop imagining things." Rigid amid the clamor of her pounding heart, she'd wait for her mother's footsteps, her mother's figure in the doorway, the blessed comfort of her mother's arms, shutting out all danger.

Why the Kappelhoffs separated is their own business, which is how they kept it. That they were temperamentally unsuited seems fairly clear. That tensions must have mounted to an intolerable pitch seems equally clear, since in their circle, man and wife stuck together, if sticking were possible. They parted in '35, when Doris was eleven. Whatever the cause, any rupture in a child's background affects the child. Alma Kappelhoff eased the break by fostering friendly relations between her estranged husband and his children. Growing older, Doris grew in understanding of her father and wrote to him regularly. But she remained the child of her sunny, outgoing mother. (Continued on page 71)

At thirteen Doris Kappelhoff and partner Jerry Doherty were dancing professionally (and successfully) in summer shows.

At fifteen a near-fatal accident ended Doris' dancing career. Restless and unhappy, she felt silly when her folks insisted that she try singing for a local music teacher.

But within three years Doris was singing with Les Brown (seated), working with music-men like Louis Prima, Andy Russell, Jimmy Dorsey. Re-named after her lucky song, "Day After Day," she changed names again by morrying trombonist Al Jorden.

With Romance On The High Seas a hit, Doris became star singer for Bob Hope. Terry and Grandma joined her in California and Doris' famous grin appeared again.

Living together for the first time in years, Doris and Terry got to know each other again. Without disturbing his deep-seated love for Grandma, Doris grew closer to her son. Gradually, she felt her six-year-old turning to her for love and comfort.

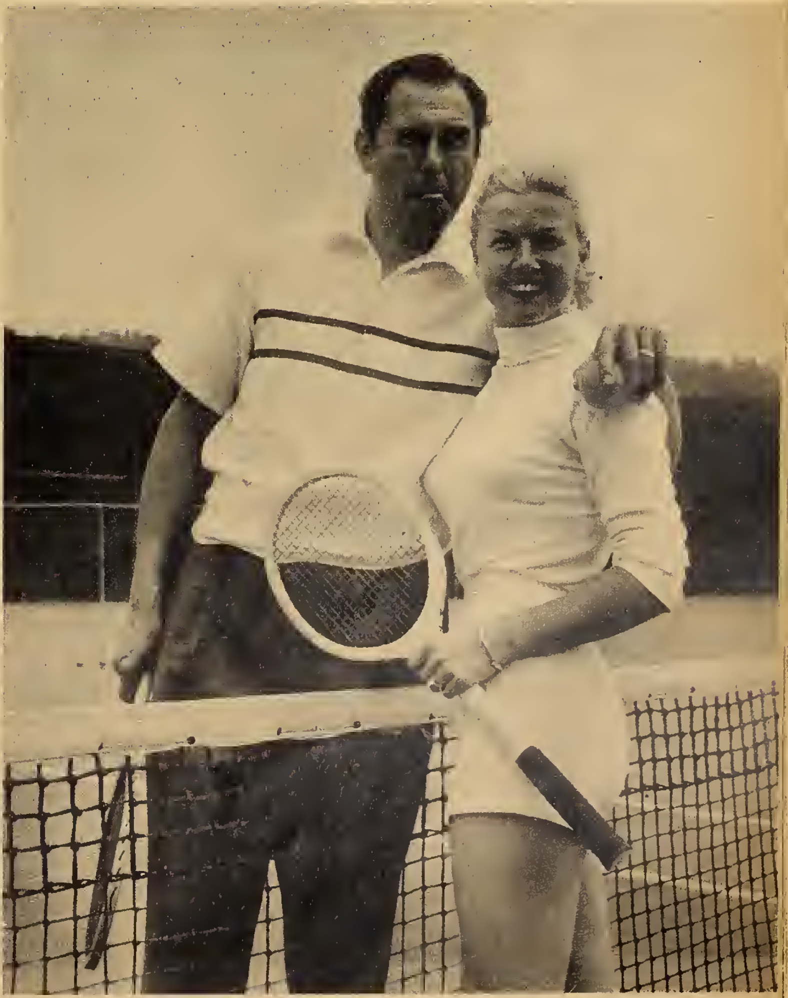
The life story of Doris Day is the story of an impulsive girl who twice loved too well

In 1947 Doris sang on The Hit Parade with Frank Sinatra. Her marriage to Jarden had failed, leaving her with a son, Terry. For the second time Doris fell "insanely" in love, married George Weidler.

Doris followed George to Hollywood, had one happy year before the marriage collapsed. Heartbroken, she wept singing "This Love Of Mine" in a cafe, sobbed through first interview with film director Mike Curtiz (above).

Content with her home and career, Doris nonetheless felt incomplete. "When you're not married," she said, "you're lonely." She dated a lot but found peace only in her new religion, Christian Science.

—and now is learning to love wisely!



Both Terry and Doris fell in love with Marty Melcher. For the first time, Doris let her romance grow slowly, made sure that trust and friendship were present, too. They married on April 3 (Doris' birthday), in 1951.

THOSE LUCKY LADDS

Home from Europe, Alan plans a fishing trip with David.

Well-off, Alan could retire to his beloved ranch right now, still afford the cars he promised Alana and David "when you grow up."

"Alan never believes he's here to stay," Sue sighs. But her husband doesn't have to worry. He's the original Man Who Has Everything!

BY JACK WADE

■ It had been a great day—and there was nothing wrong with this particular night, either. The California moon hung like a gold medallion in the velvet sky, dappling the pool below with sequins. A breeze from the sea teased the olive trees on the terrace of the big house, which was dark because it was well past midnight. Before a wide glass expanse framing this view two very tired but extremely happy people, Alan Ladd and his wife Sue, lounged back on a love seat, silent and thoughtful.

They had been awake since six o'clock that morning, when Alan restlessly got down from his (Continued on page 86)

Everyone's got to have a hobby. So some stars do the town and some do sunsets in oils —but Virginia Mayo does nothing at all but sit still and think about Mike!

BY TONI NOEL

"I'd rather stay home!"

This was a marriage that couldn't possibly last, as any counselor could have told them and probably did tell them. There was the difference in their ages. Virginia is not yet thirty; Mike is in his mid-forties. A serious handicap. A religious conflict was expected. Virginia has always been a Presbyterian; Mike is a devout Catholic who says, "Maybe going to church once a week satisfies some people, but I need my religion. I live with it." Two strikes against them already, some of the gossips were saying. Sounds pretty ominous, doesn't it?

Add the fact that, at the time of their meeting, Virginia had never even been in love and Mike was still married, though long since separated from his first wife. Their chances for a successful marriage looked slimmer and slimmer.

There would be a career conflict, too. Although Mike insists that any male held together with spit and baling wire could have achieved stardom during the lean war years, he was unquestionably at the top of the heap when he met Virginia. She was merely another import from a Broadway chorus then. But when they were able to marry, five interminable years later, O'Shea had given way to heroes returning from the war and Virginia was forging right to the top of Warner Brothers' star list. Obviously no male ego could survive a belt like that; there had to be trouble.

Finally, they were as different temperamentally as two people could be. O'Shea is a big Irishman, possessed of every implausible, inexplicable facet of the classical Irish personality. He has the gift of laughter, but he's a brooder, too—and a thinker of subtle thoughts, shatteringly forthright in his expression of them. He's restless, jumping with nervous energy, happiest when he works with his hands—but he also lies awake until five in the morning, reading alarmingly intellectual books.

This mass of contradiction is Virginia Mayo's man. Virginia, a model of repose and tranquility, has a remarkable facility for enjoying herself most when she's doing precisely nothing. No one ever sees her edgy or disagreeable. Even when she tackles something new and difficult, Virginia is relaxed, happy, at home in the world.

"People are always asking me what I do between pictures," she once told a reporter. "And they think it's peculiar when I tell them that I just sit. I know actors and actresses who work harder at their hobbies than they do at the picture business. I love my husband, my home and our life together, and my hobby is thinking about them." An uncomplicated, refreshing girl—but hardly a suitable wife for an explosive Irishman like O'Shea. This was a marriage? This was a farce, as any fool could plainly see, and it wouldn't last six months.

But thirteen years after they met, eight years after they married, Virginia and Michael are as happy together as can be. In totting up the odds against the marriage of these two, the cynics overlooked one important point. Far from thinking love is corny, they like it. Their love for each other is an unmistakable and unabashed pleasure.

When the O'Sheas were entertaining at lunch on a recent Saturday, Mike and one of the guests chanced to be discussing cigarettes. Virginia (Continued on page 90)

To Daddy With Love...

other side of Frankie:
the guy who still hurries home to his brood—the father who's a hero to his kids—and deserves to be!

by Hedda Hopper

■ I got stood up by Frank Sinatra. We had a date for three-thirty one afternoon. I was helping Art Linkletter as fashion commentator at a tea party for the American Cancer Fund, but when I noticed that the hour of my date was at hand and the party still wasn't over, I sneaked out and left Art holding the bag. After rushing home, I got a phone call from Frank. "I'm terribly sorry," he said, "but I can't make it."

Well, you could have heard me scream two blocks away!

Then he explained. He wasn't finished with a recording session at NBC, and he had a date in a couple of hours that he just wouldn't break. And with another girl, yet. What was more humiliating was that this "other woman" was only thirteen years old, and Frank was taking her to her confirmation at the Church of the Good Shepherd in Beverly Hills, and later with five of her friends to dinner at LaRue.

"I can't stand her up, Hedda," he pleaded.

I couldn't compete with the other woman in his life, because she was Nancy with the laughing face, his oldest daughter. It was through her "pull" that he now owns an Oscar. Here's the inside story.

His three kids presented him with a St. Genesius Medal (patron saint of actors) with a tiny Oscar in bas relief on the back and this inscription: "Dad, we'll love you from here to eternity." In case he didn't win the award, they wanted him to have their Oscar.

But Nancy had her own idea. She didn't confide in her brother Frank or her sister Tina, but just before the awards were announced, she slipped her hand into her dad's and said, "This is from me and Saint Anthony." It was a Saint Anthony medal.

Well, that did it. With Saint Anthony and Nancy on his side, Frank's Oscar was in the bag. He later told me: "Saint Anthony is her dearest friend. She seems to get a lot done with him. I sometimes suspect she has a direct wire to him."

I simmered down about being stood up and made a date with Frank for the following day. He arrived on the dot, but before he came there was a telephone call waiting for him. I said, "You'd better get rid of it because this is going to be a long, tough grilling."

He returned the call, came into my den, sat down, and said, "Okay, shoot! What's on your mind?"

Then it was his turn to be amazed.

"I'm not going to ask you a lot of foolish questions about Ava Gardner," I said. "I'm not even going to ask what your plans are when she returns from Europe; what kind of jewelry you're buying; or whether you're house hunting. This story I want is about your children."

Frank relaxed, and the sigh that emanated from his small frame all but smothered both of us. This was a subject about which he could become eloquent. In fact, he glowed. He lit up like a Roman candle. "Imagine Hopper not wanting to know the intimate details of my

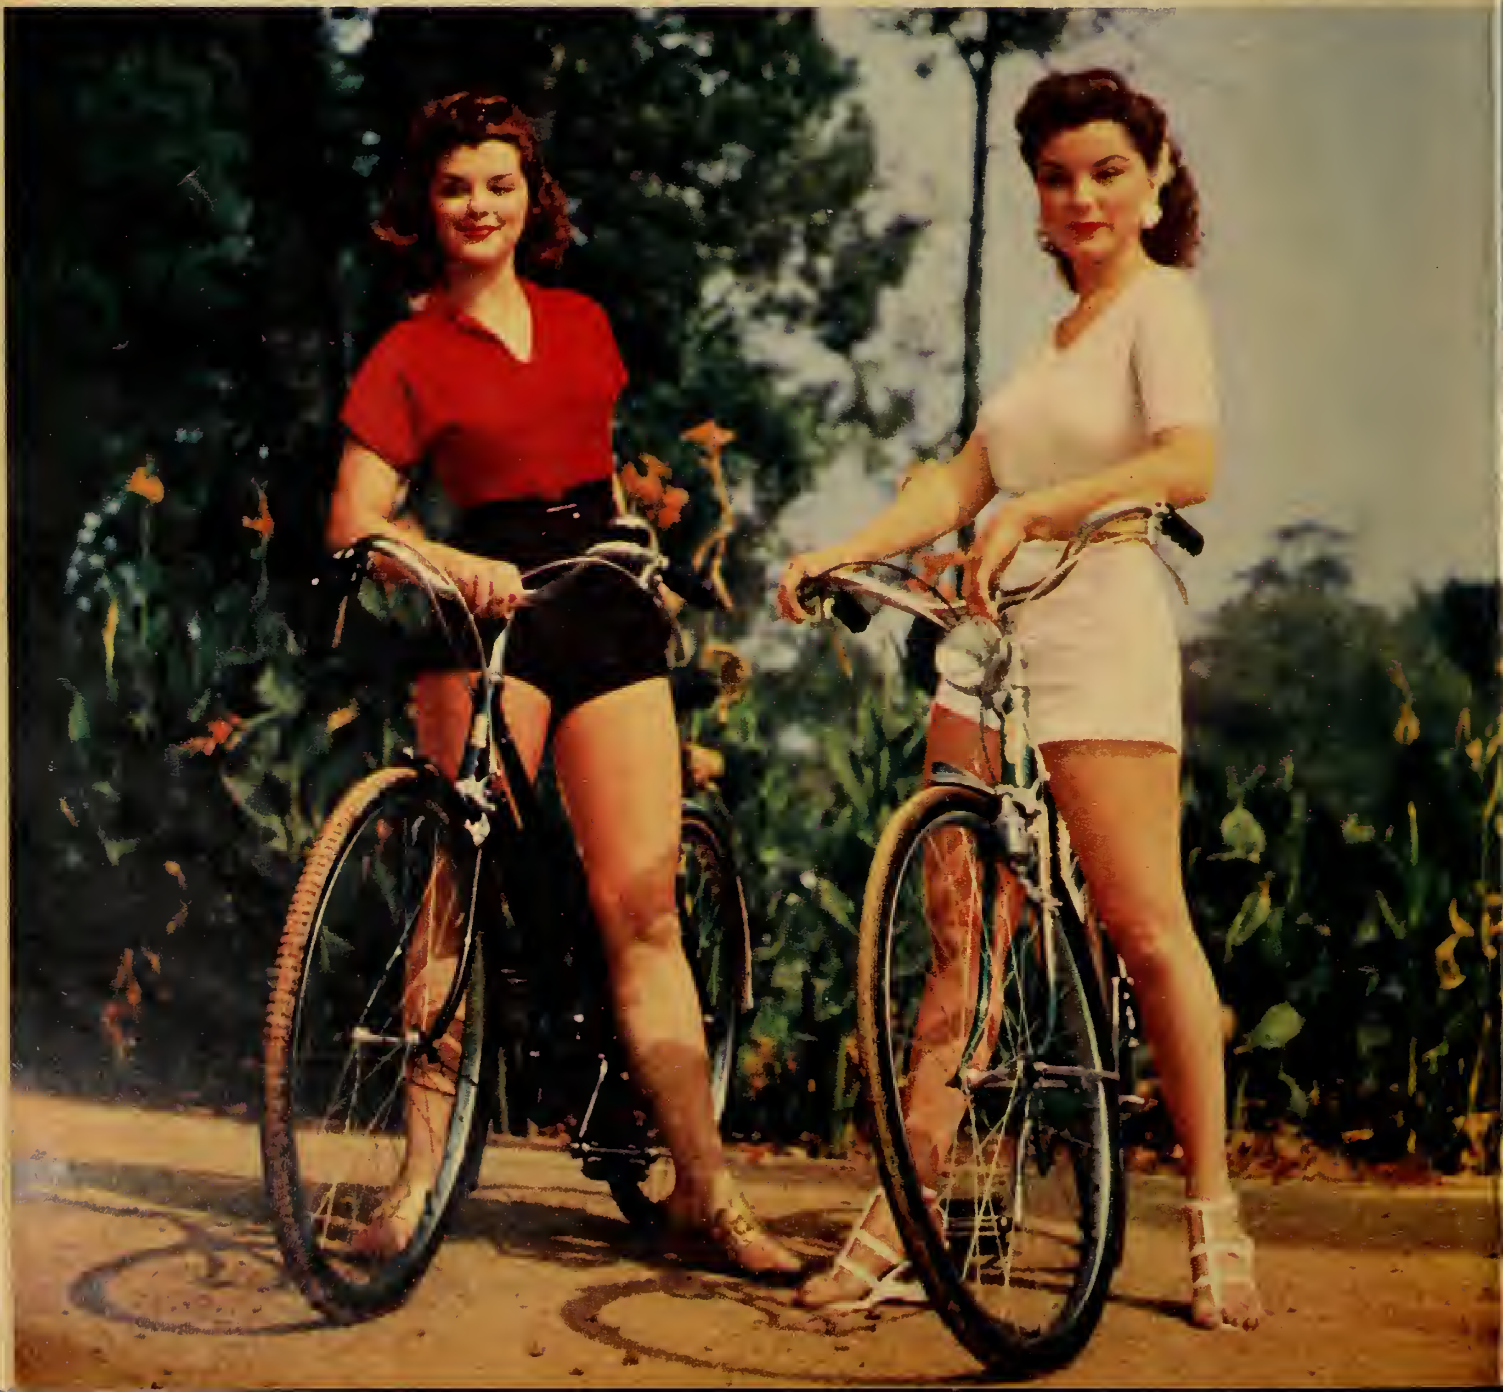
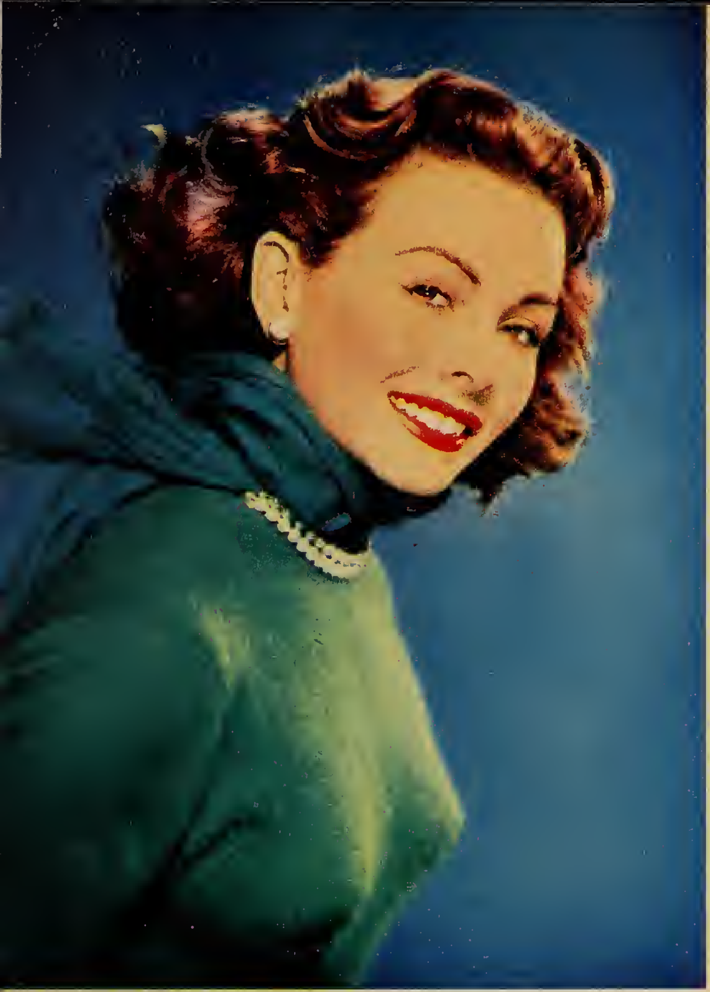
Sweet on Sweaters

Sweaters go everywhere now—from a sunrise walk to the Sunset Strip—on stars and starlets—and on you!

■ BLT (Before Lana Turner) movie stars appeared in satin gowns with trains—or a few scraps of expensive lace. Girls-who-never-left-home wore a shapeless woolen something called a sweater. But ALT (you figure it out) things changed. You can still spot a star in silk, but you're more likely to see her in a sweater—and anything but shapeless! The sweater today is all things to all girls—a touch of childhood or a dash of sex-appeal. Most stars, like most girls, wear them because they are pretty and practical and mixable—and because, as these photographs show—you can go anywhere in a sweater!

In combed cotton T-shirt, Lisa Gaye joins sister Debra Paget for a bike ride. Debra's sport sweater is of light wool. Her bike by Schwinn.

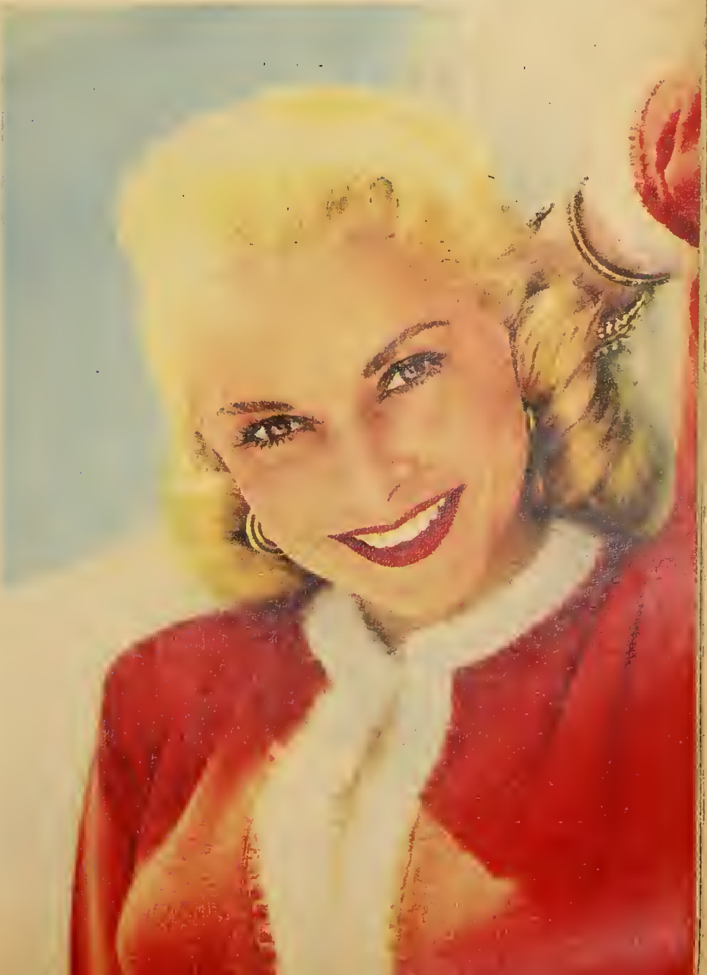




Jeanne Crain's classic sweater can be worn on any casual occasion. Popular with school girls as well as stars, the pearl and scarf accessories add style. Jeanne is in Warner's Duel In The Jungle.

Sophisticated and smartly designed, Mamie Van Doren's striped sweater and matching gloves are perfect with tailored, solid-color suits or straight line skirts. Mamie's next picture is Francis Joins The WACS.

Simple and stunning, Joanne Gilbert's black evening sweater is dressy enough for any but the most strictly formal occasions. Other evening models feature elaborate embroidery, jewels, sequins.



Janet Leigh's angora-trimmed novelty sweater can be worn with party slacks or a full skirt or carried in warm weather instead of a jacket. Her next is U-I's The Black Shield Of Falworth.

In 1945 Norma Jean Dougherty enrolled in modeling school.

TOLD FOR THE FIRST TIME:

the secrets of Marilyn's life as a Model

by Emmeline Snively

■ For fifteen years I've been running the Blue Book Models School in Hollywood. I've watched our girls make the big jump to stardom after working with us, but the graduate I'm most proud of is Marilyn Monroe. Not only because she is today the most successful and well-known of all my students, but because she started with the least.

When Marilyn came to me back in August, 1945, she had no money, no background, one sharkskin dress, a man-tailored, teal-blue suit and a bathing suit.

Her name was Norma Jean Dougherty and she was married to a merchant seaman. She was cute-looking, but she knew nothing about carriage, posture, walking, sitting or posing.

A photographer I had worked with, Potter Hueth, brought Marilyn around to the school in the Ambassador Hotel.

He explained that he had inherited her from another photographer, David Conover, who had shot Marilyn's first portrait while she was working at an aircraft plant out in Burbank. Before going into the Army Conover had brought Marilyn to Hueth's studio on Pico Boulevard and Fairfax. He had said, "Here's a cute girl who photographs very well. Maybe you can get some work for her."

Potter looked at Marilyn and said, "If you're willing to work on speculation, I'll take some shots of you."

Marilyn smiled and asked, "What do you mean by speculation?" And Potter explained that he couldn't afford to pay her in advance for posing. "If any (Continued on page 76)

Marilyn's first portrait was taken by David Conover, who discovered her working in an aircraft plant. Note her too-curly hair; later she had it straightened.

Photographed as a wholesome, All-American girl, Marilyn had some success but often lost work when editors complained that her "smile was too high!"

Hair bleached and smile lowered, in 1946 Marilyn moved into the "sexy sweater-girl" phase of her career.

←Blonder, more voluptuous, Marilyn stands before a collection of her old magazine covers.

POPULAR AND VIVACIOUS, TERRY IS A MEMBER OF HOLLYWOOD'S MOST EXCITING YOUNG DATING CROWD. THAT'S WHY EVERYONE IS ASKING THE $64 QUESTION can a glamour girl live happily at home with mama?

Chipping in her share of family expenses, Terry is delighted with the Kofords' new home near her studio and classes. She had only one disappointment: Dad decided a pool would cost too much—and what will he do with it if Terry gets married?

Wanting to "follow nature's way," Terry used dark grey carpets, lighter walls, pale ceiling in her bedroom, accented one wall with pink and grey paper. Mom added satin stool in vain hope that Terry wouldn't flop on bed when answering phone.

by Marva Peterson

If you read about Terry Moore in the papers—and who doesn't?—no doubt you'd expect her to be the wackiest of the wacky, a flighty, supercharged girl who lives every moment as if it were her last. She would seem to be the kind of girl who rents her own apartment, furnishes it sharp and snazzy-like, and races her motors until all hours of the morning.

But Terry isn't like that. She lives at home with her parents, attends the Mormon Church each Sunday with Greg Bautzer, Hollywood's perennial escort, and remakes her own clothes. Terry's way of living is closer to that of the average American single girl than practically any movie star you could name.

Of course she's seen at ritzy nightclubs and photographed at all major previews, but these are professional requirements. Give Terry her choice of dating spots, and she always picks home, the eight-room, white clapboard house in Westwood. She loves to bring her dates there.

Terry and Rita Moreno double dated Eddie Fisher and Joey Foreman, one of Eddie's pals, on Eddie's last visit to Hollywood.

"Shall we make the rounds?" Fisher asked, trying to live it up as befits a man of his mounting income—$450,000 last year.

"You mean hit the spots?" Terry inquired.

Eddie nodded. He didn't really want to. He was just being the sporting gentleman.

The Kofords' new $25,000 house in Westwood is only slightly larger than their former home, stands in a similar suburban neighborhood. Only major change in their way of life was hiring housekeeper.

A good cook, Terry loves to feed friends, will use any excuse to putter around in charming red, white and blue kitchen. The specialties of the house are roast lamb, lemon pie and cider—no liquor is served.

The old-fashioned, paneled den is the room to which Mom and Dad retreat when Terry and her friends take over the livingroom. Cosy and quiet, it has a fireplace, outdoor exit, only television set in the house.

"Date Hangout," the brick patio where Terry's gang spends many evenings, boasts a barbecue, starlight and a brick floor for dancing. Concrete lampshade on right conceals a loudspeaker for the record system.

continued

Her mother takes care of Terry's needs in the evening gown field by remodeling her wardrobe at home.

"Just make sure I have room for my shoes," Terry asked when the Kofords started house-hunting. She owns seventy-five pairs of flats and heels.

According to Mom, one of Terry's troubles is forgetting to plan ahead just what she wants to wear and do.

Terry usually does her own hair before a date, uses the time under a dryer to study for her night courses at UCLA, catch up on her reading.

On this date, Terry took out her tape recorder and the two couples went to work recording songs, jokes and corny patter.

Between sessions, the hostess served peanuts in the shell and a chocolate drink of sorts called Hemo. Real wild Hollywood party.

As Terry and Eddie began to break peanut shells, Mrs. Koford rushed in from the den.

"For Heaven's sake, Terry," she scolded, as mothers have scolded since time began, "how many times have I told you to spread out some newspapers on the floor? The studio has scheduled a picture layout at home tomorrow, and I'm not going to spend all morning vacuuming a lot of peanut shells!" Terry did as she was told.

"She's a good daughter," Mrs. Koford declares. "Really is, Making her get enough rest is probably the only big problem I ever had with her. It used to be that if I said, 'Come home early, Terry,' she'd die with embarrassment.

"Now she appreciates it when I remind her escorts to bring her home at a reasonable hour. She's learned how awful it is to try to work the next day if she's tired. That's why she likes to date here at home.

"Of course, she's not perfect. Who is? Right now I'm having such a time trying to get her to plan ahead. What she wants to wear, who's coming for dinner, what sort of food to serve.

"Some of the candid photos taken at previews and formal dinners have just about convinced Terry that she should always try on her gowns at least a day ahead of time.

"And then we've had a little trouble about food and dinner guests. Terry's just got mobs of friends, and they're always dropping in, and we just love it, and I try to keep food on hand for any emergency. But we've been caught short quite a few times, especially on Fridays, not having enough fish for Terry's Catholic pals.

"All in all, she's a good child. And we're happy that she prefers living at home with her parents to getting a place of her own. So many girls these days, as soon as they (Continued on page 85)

Whatever I am a part of, whatever I put my hand to, if there has been any dishonest aspect to it at all, it will fail somehow. Maybe the venture will appear to go through but if it does the knowledge that the gain involved wasn't rightly come by is enough to give the whole thing a bad taste.

Casual dating is fine for some men—but is Bob Wagner happy this way? Or is there another reason why he sidesteps romance?

BY ALICE FINLETTER

Forbidden to Love?

Once a man-about-town, Pete Lawford has left his title of Hollywood's most eligible young bachelor vacant for Bob.

Gossip columns had Bob engaged to both Mona Freeman and Terry Moore at various times, but he denied stories.

Bob's newest, possibly most serious interest is Jean Peters, but something seems to be holding up this romance, too.

■ Bob Wagner is single by choice—but whose choice?

He has never made noises like one anxious to settle down quickly although he does take out eligible girls. Recently there have been fresh rumors that his bachelorhood is enforced by contract. That nice, new contract of his that pays him thousands every month.

Last year when he was earning $350 a week, Bob Wagner suddenly began to draw more fan mail than any other player at his studio—with the exception of the exceptional Marilyn Monroe. R. J. Wagner, Jr., had developed a tremendous following, mostly among teen-age girls.

When contract renewal time rolled around, Wagner's agent was in an enviable bargaining position. He blithely suggested to Fox that "we give my boy a new deal."

Knowing that R.J.'s rise in popularity was no fluke, the studio agreed. How much did Mr. Wagner's agent think young Mr. Wagner was worth?

"I think," came the answer, "that the kid is entitled to a thousand a week for the next six months. After that he should get $1500 a week and then yearly options until he hits $4,000 or $5,000 a week."

The studio executive took a deep breath and whistled.

"Now, look," he began, "I agree the kid is hot right now and deserves more money. But who knows how long he'll stay hot? Most of his fans are bobby-soxers. Let Wagner get married tomorrow, and they'll drop him in a minute."

"You don't have to worry about his getting married," the executive was told. "He's a smart kid. He'll stay single until he's thirty!"

The studio man grinned. "Can you guarantee that?"

there's never been anyone quite like this explosive, unstoppable blonde-you've never read anything like the story of her rollicking rise to fame!

■ One night, a couple of years ago, a Hollywood choreographer named Bob Alton dropped into a spot called Macayo in Santa Monica, California, for a nightcap. Before he could order his drink, however, something made him yank his elbow off the bar. A sun-bronzed girl with a popcorn ball hairdo and the streamlined figure that Venus should have had was making the floor rock and roll with sensational modern jazz dancing of high voltage.

He asked the waiter to bring her to his table. "I just want to tell you how good I think you are," he said. "You've got a great future in dancing." The girl gave him a wry grin and her reply had a hollow ring.

"Thanks," she said, "but my dancing future just passed. This is my last night here. I'm quitting. I'm sick of nightclubs. I hate the noise, the smoke, the late hours, the guys making passes. I hate what people think a nightclub dancer is. Tomorrow I'm dyeing this hair back to brown. I'm changing my name. I'm starting a secretarial course and I've got a job lined up at Hughes Aircraft. I've been dancing for a future since I was six years old—but it's all over now. Believe me, I've had it!"

The disillusioned nineteen-year-old girl—who called herself Sheree North—could have told him a lot more. That she'd been married at fifteen, for instance, had a baby at sixteen and since her divorce at seventeen had struggled to make and support a home by kicking her legs—without much success and with a lot of heartache and disappointment.

Bob Alton nodded understandingly, although he didn't change his pitch. How could he? He was a top choreographer with a string of hit shows behind him both in Hollywood and on Broadway. He'd seen discouraged kids like this before, but he'd helped (Continued on page 80)

If you knew Beedle...

a Man of Mystery to his fans—and Hollywood's most popular actor!

BY STEVE CRONIN

■ "I guess I'm the most accident-prone guy in this entire country. I can sense when something's going to happen, especially to me." Bill Holden was explaining that things do happen to him, although they're not for headlines.

"One night a few years ago, when we had just bought a new car, Ardis and I decided to go to a movie." Bill is married to Brenda Marshall whose real name is Ardis Ankerson.

"I had a feeling that something would happen to the car, so I asked the parking lot attendant to let me park it myself. I left it a good distance away from any of the other cars.

"During the movie, I began to fidget.

"'What's the matter?' Ardis asked.

"'I'm worried about the car,' I answered.

"'Don't be foolish,' Ardis muttered.

"Sure enough when we got back to the car, the front right fender was completely smashed in.

"Only recently, on the night of the Academy Awards, I had that feeling again. I felt something was going to happen to the new Cadillac. And on the way home it did. Banged into a pole."

An actor who once flew to New York with Holden insists that Bill is psychic.

"He's in the wrong profession," Leon Ames insists. "He should be a fortune-teller. On this particular flight Bill predicted that the hostess would upset a tray of coffee cups on his lap. I told him he was nuts. (Continued on page 66)

Bill's wife, Brenda Marshall, gave up her career when Bill established himself. That took some time; after being in movies for 13 years, unobtrusive Bill was voted a Star Of Tomorrow!

A day to Remember

In the vice-principal's office Esther signed guest book.

Escorted by sweatered Knights (members of the school honor club in which Esther was a Lady), George Washington's most famous alumna headed for the athletic field to watch a gym class work out.

Everywhere she went, Esther was surrounded by kids who ducked out of classes, scrambled through windows to follow her. Nearsighted Esther wore glasses part of day, admitted she had once feared they would spoil her looks.

Autographing drums for members of the band, Esther recalled her own extra-curricular activities. She had taken the school's commercial course which allowed her to squeeze in as many as possible.

In the bungalow used for Student Body meetings, Esther took over the gavel. As a student at George Washington High she had been president of the Student Body and held office in half a dozen other campus and honor groups.

"I remember the basketball games I played in more clearly than my first screen test." Esther told the kids, but didn't join game in progress.

For a carefree day Esther revisited her high school and renewed for always her happiest memories!

■ Esther Williams' mother-in-law has a penchant for saving mementoes. No matter how old, faded or worn, if they mean anything to the elder Mrs. Gage they are wrapped in ribbons and tucked away. Otherwise Esther would have got away with it the night Ben came across the battered box under the window seat.

He'd been looking high and low for some canceled checks that would untangle his income tax work sheet, and now he was pacing the livingroom dramatically, hoping for help from his wife.

"They've got to be *some*where," he said. "You just don't throw things like that away."

Esther put her book in her lap and regarded him in her Wifely Manner. "You haven't thrown them away, dear. If you're your mother's son, they're still around here somewhere."

And so it was that, long minutes later, when Ben unfolded his big frame from a kneeling position (Continued on next page)

Greeted by school principal Dr. Paul Fisher, Esther was rushed backstage for the second "aud call" of the day.

Introduced by Student Body president, Esther noticed his height, told kids sadly, "When I was here, all the boys were so short!"

"Nobody's changed!" Esther said—but she had. She came late and was kept after school!

In front of a statue of George Washington Esther kidded with students. Later she told Ben that the old school hadn't changed a bit; it was still more fun than any other high school in L. A.

(Continued from page 55) in front of the window seat, holding a large, falling-apart cardboard box, he was wearing a remarkably evil grin.

"Ha!" he said.

Esther looked up from her book again. "What are you snorting about, sweetie?"

"You, too, are a string saver—Mother Gage," he charged.

"What are you talking about?"

Ben strode to the center of the room and gestured as though stroking a long beard. "Heah!" he shouted. "Lindy! Were you out theah with that Lee cur? If you were ah cain't see how you could be mah daughter!"

Esther's first thought, naturally, was that Ben had gone mad. And then, out of the past, came a faint recognition of those lines. Back in George Washington High School, in '38 or maybe '39, she had portrayed a character (Continued on next page)

Best part of day was chatting and lunching with favorite teachers like physical instructor Mrs. Segal (above, left); Esther's beloved "Spearsy" (above, right); Miss Fitzpatrick (below).

The Drum and Bugle Corps reminded Esther of the football rally she and 4 other girls had attended in bright pink sweaters—actually the team's red-and-white jerseys which the girls had swiped and washed!

(Continued from page 57) named Colonel Brewster in a musical comedy. It had been part of a football rally and Esther had been the colonel (because (1) nobody else would, and (2) because of her height) sporting a beard and a southern colonel-type hat. The play hadn't been exactly Noel Coward caliber. In fact, Esther had written it, and it had been pretty awful.

She came back to the present with a start, and jumped out of her chair. "Ben! Where did you get that? Give it to me!"

And Ben held the box above her head. "From whom was Essie Williams hiding in the cafe closet?" he mimicked.

Esther groaned. Her treasured Memory Book must be in there, too, with all the gossip columns from the school paper, the dance programs, the flowers. "Ben! Please!"

"I understand a guy named Randy Henderson took you bowling and didn't have to pay for you because your score was so low."

He finally lowered the box and gave it to her, on the condition that she answer some questions. "Who," he said, "was this Jimmie character whose name appeared on every page? And who were Frank and Kenny, the ones who always took half the dances away from Jimmie?"

"One at a time," said Esther. "Jimmie McKinlock was one of mother's pets. I went with him while he was still in school, a couple of terms ahead of me. I don't know about Frank and Kenny—it might have been Frank Cookson. If you'll give me that box, maybe I can find out."

"What about the poetry?" goaded Ben. He snatched a rumpled paper and read,

"Once upon a time I knew
A coy, petite young miss.
There wasn't a thing I wouldn't do
To earn from her a kiss."

"Help!" howled Esther, but Ben continued.

"However, she was not the type
To lose herself in love.
She was young and frivolous
And flight as a dove.

The first time that we e'er went out
I lost my head, I did.
And so I close with these three words,
I love you—Esther kid."

By that time Esther had collapsed in hysterics and Ben wasn't much better off.

"I know you're enchanting and all that," said Ben, "but tell me how you managed to collect a whole box full of poetry, all from different guys?"

"You might say I asked for it—in self-defense."

Ben grinned and lit his pipe. "Elucidate."

And so she told him how she used to wonder how to say no when a boy wanted to kiss her—the classic problem of the teen-ager. She had gone to her mother for advice and her mother had said "Talk about something else. Get their minds off the subject." Even the sixteen year-old Esther knew that bit of advice wouldn't work for thirty seconds. And said so. "All right," her mother had said. "You're smart. You think of something to say." So Esther cooked up a line of defense. The minute a boy began his overture she backed off and looked at him coldly. "Why do you want to kiss me?" inquired the young Miss Williams. This usually set him back two or three years and when he recovered Esther said charitably there was no hurry for his answer, that he might like to give it to her in the form of a poem. So she collected a ream of poetry (or a reasonable facsimile thereof) and the system, as a stall for time, worked.

Remembering all this, Esther slipped into a comfortable hour of reverie, poring over her souvenirs, sharing some of her memories with Ben, punctuating others only by a giggle. Husband-like, Ben wanted to know, what with all these slaves at her feet, hadn't Esther ever had a crush on any of them. Had she? There had been devoted Jimmie, but before he joined the Coast Guard she had been too young to be serious. And Don Schutz, the boy famous for being the only one with a car of his own, and Frank Cookson captain of the football team. She and Frank had double dated so much with Bud Fisher and Barbara McConnell. Whatever had happened to them all? And there was Randall Henderson, dear, sensitive, deeply intelligent Randy, who later had been killed in the war. There were dates with all of them and a certain fondness for each, but she couldn't remember a crush until she thought of Frank Reynolds. He had been the football hero and she recalled that after he made that ninety-yard touchdown she kept dreaming of it—and of him. There was the night she went to her first formal dance, wearing the peach chiffon handed down from her sister's wardrobe. She had walked into the gym on Jimmie's arm and there had stood Frank Reynolds. Esther believed this was a rare creature, a blond giant, and when she heard him tell Kenny, 'There's a nice looking dish—I'll have a dance with her,' Miss Williams stood riveted to the floor. Kenny had warned her about Frank, reputed to be the school's sophisticate, and tried to keep them apart. 'You're too innocent for him,' Kenny had said like a big brother.

Ferenc Molnar's "The Play's The Thing" . . . concerns a jealous husband who eavesdrops on his blonde wife and another man, and believes that the lover is describing his wife's physical charms—when, in truth, he merely was describing an ordinary peach. In all productions of this play, therefore, a peach is an important prop . . . When Ezio Pinza did this play last summer, the peach was on a table backstage.

Elaine Stritch was backstage, too, rehearsing for the play she was to do there the following week. She saw the peach, picked it up and ate it . . . Pinza heard the cue to produce the peach—as the climax of the play. No peach. He used the only piece of fruit at hand—a dark plum.

The New York Post

She remembered the football rally immortalized by the stunt she had dreamed up, in which she and four other girls swiped the team's jerseys for their song and dance number. It would have gone great, except that when the girls managed to get the jerseys out of the boys' lockers they considered one and all sufficiently gamey to deserve a tubbing. So they took them to Esther's house and dumped them into the washing machine. When they came out the red numbers had run into the white jerseys until the whole thing was a pink mess, with the numbers indistinguishable.

She spoke aloud to Ben. "Poverty Flats, we used to call it. Because the kids who went there came from such poor families. But I'll bet there was more fun there than at any other school in L.A."

"You were busy enough," said Ben, looking up from her year book. "From what I can find out by a casual study you were in the Tri-Y two semesters, a member of the Scholarship Society, and an officer—usually president—of your class, of the cabinet, of the Girls' League, whatever that is, of the Student Body, and of the Commerce Honor Society."

"I was so busy," Esther laughed, "I had to go to City College for my education."

"Some fireball," said Ben. "Here's one of your speeches, for some office or other. Listen: 'You and I know that what I say here will make very little difference in the way you vote. You want in your girl's vice president someone who will be your friend. If I have been friendly, perhaps you will trust me again to be your friend as girls' vice president of the Student Body'."

Esther grimaced. "Pretty corny, huh?" And Ben nodded.

She thought a moment and said, "I wonder if Spearsy's still there."

"Who?" said Ben.

"Miss Spear. She was my pet teacher—science. A wonderful woman. She used to be so interested in all the school activities, and she'd help us get out of scrapes all the time. She was my mentor."

"Why don't you call her up?"

It was as simple as that. Esther called Miss Spear, who was delighted and asked Esther to come to Washington High for lunch with the faculty. Esther asked if she could say hello to the kids while she was there, and Miss Spear said she'd arrange it—maybe an auditorium call.

The night before the appointed day, four-year-old Benjy began to run a fever. It began at 101 and climbed steadily. It was 104 by the time the doctor arrived, and he suspected German measles. "There," thought Esther, "goes Washington High, Spearsy and the whole day."

Instead of measles, however, Benjy developed a twenty-four-hour virus and all through the night Esther sponged him with alcohol to bring down the fever. At five A.M. he went into a fitful sleep and the next morning Esther was ready to call the school and cancel her date. But the doctor returned and said it was perfectly all right for Esther to leave for the day, the nurse would stay with Benjy. Esther flew into a pink orlon dress, jumped into her station wagon and drove the twenty miles to the school, through the city's worst traffic, with as much speed as the law would allow.

When she arrived the first auditorium call was over, and the second 'aud call' in progress. Doctor Fisher, Washington's principal, met her at the stage door of the auditorium and steered her backstage, where she was greeted by the teachers who remembered her. There was Spearsy, of course, and the two women fell into each other's arms. And there was Miss Fitzpatrick, who'd had Esther in 'home room,' and Mrs. Segal who'd taught her physical education. There was much hilarity and Esther was puzzled at the fact that all the teachers, after fifteen years, looked exactly the same as she remembered them. "I'm the one," grinned Mrs. Segal, "who advised you against a swimming career because it would be too strenuous for you."

"I've managed to last," said Esther. "Maybe because you put me into good shape for it."

"I see you're wearing glasses," said Miss Spear. And they laughed together, remembering how they had discussed the problem of Esther's nearsightedness and how she had worried about snubbing people. Spearsy had told her to smile at everybody she saw.

"Anyway," said Miss Spear. "I'm happy you're wearing them because it might have some influence on the girls here. They're as bad as you were—afraid it'll spoil their looks."

While they were speaking a girl's voice drifted backstage, a youthful voice thanking the students for bestowing an office upon her. And Esther thought of the many times she had stood on that very stage, asking to be elected or grateful that she had been. Now a tall boy was introduced to her, Merle Lauderdale, president of the current Student Body. He went on stage to announce Esther to the students.

SHE JOINED HIM, almost buckling with nostalgia, and put on her glasses to hide the mist in her eyes. "I'm not wearing these to look intellectual," she told the assembled kids. "I'm nearsighted, and without them I can get into a lot of trouble." She told them Spearsy's advice to smile at everybody. She thanked Merle for his introduction and remarked upon his height. "When I was here, all the boys were so short," she said and fondly stroked the sleeve of Merle, who blushed and hurried to his seat.

Esther told them a lot of things that made them laugh. She told them of the day she was honored by membership as a 'Lady' in the Knights and Ladies organization, and given the prized sweater with its emblem. Esther was wearing a blouse that day which had been worn to the last straw by her two older sisters. The back of one of its sleeves had been steadily ripping all day and was now left in plain sight by the sleeveless Ladies' sweater. Her only recourse had been to wear her long-sleeved Tri-Y sweater over everything, and the temperature that day had been just over 100 degrees—so Esther had been dissolved by both the honor and the heat.

She turned serious, too, and told them that the old cliché about high school being the best years of their lives was true. She said she remembered her first dance, and the basketball games in which she played more clearly than her first screen test or her first movie. And she told them that while she might kid about studying, and grades, it was true that she had been a Sealbearer and that if they didn't mind her giving a bit of advice, nothing is worth doing (or any fun) unless you do it well.

THE TEACHERS backstage smiled happily at the sage counsel being handed out by G. Washington's celebrity, and afterward steered her through the school. It all looked dear and familiar to Esther, and every few minutes another teacher would approach her, and Esther would remember another friendly face out of her past. They took her to the vice-principal's office where she signed the guest book, then to the bungalow where the Student Body holds meetings and where Esther herself had so often presided.

By the time she sat down to lunch in the faculty diningroom, all of Washington High, including those students who had missed her because they were in the first 'aud call,' knew that Esther was there. She found time to write this last group a note of apology, to be put on the bulletin board, before she was whisked away to the drama class. Here the Thespian Club stood her on the stage and she worried that they might ask her to spout Shakespeare, which, Esther explained, is not her forte. She stood a moment longer while a breathless boy with a complicated camera knelt to take her picture. "Gee!" he said. "I thought I'd never catch up with you. They told me there was a celebrity in 'aud call,' but I thought it was the County Supervisor or something, so I didn't go. Gee, I darned near missed you!"

When Esther left the drama class and headed for a gym class on the field, the students could no longer be controlled. Wherever she passed, boys and girls broke out of classrooms, even jumped out of windows, in order to join the mob fol-

KEEL-HAULING KEEL

Or: How a girl with a fast line roped Howard into a fishing lesson.

Ever see the modern version of keel-hauling, an ancient seamen's punishment? First you find a peaceful, sleepy movie star (as above).

Then (but only if you're Angel Moro, Howard's singing discovery and therefore enjoy privileges) you wrap him in rope.

Having thus convinced—and choked—him into agreeing to teach you to fish, you spend at least twenty full minutes learning the art.

By then you're tired and Howard is wide awake—so you hold the net while he reels in. (You feel sorry for the fish.)

When Howard, too, is ready to drop, you give him back to his wife, who has been hoping he wouldn't catch any fish she'd have to cook.

And at last comes the well-earned reward for the weary fisherman—a hearty meal, definitely not of the seafood variety!

lowing her. Doctor Fisher, the principal, was worried for Esther's safety, but she smiled and assured him she was accustomed to such things.

It added up to a great day for Esther and, despite the crowds, even included a long talk with Miss Spear. It was after four in the afternoon when Esther got home, to find Benjy much improved, and soon big Ben came in the front door.

"How'd it go?" he wanted to know.

"Just wonderful, thanks to you."

"To me?"

"If you hadn't found that box of souvenirs, I never would have got started on the whole project."

"Glad to be of service," said Ben. "But I never did find those canceled checks I was looking for. Maybe if you could bring yourself to graduate from high school now and marry me—you could help me look for them!"

"Sure," said Esther, pulling a cluttered drawer out of a table. "Like I told the kids today, school days are the carefree days." END

forbidden to love

(Continued from page 48) "Of course not," R.J.'s agent admitted. "But I know this boy, and I can tell you that he's strictly married to his career. You've got the privilege of renewing his contract—or not renewing it—every year.

"If he elopes or does something crazy and loses his fan appeal by 1955, don't pick up on him. Let him out."

The Fox executive nodded. "Wagner's a shrewd young man," he said. "He's got a level head on his shoulders. We like him and we think he's going to be around a long time. You've got your boy a deal."

That's the inside story of R. J. Wagner's $1,000-a-week contract, a contract about which there have been many rumors, the outstanding one being that it contains a clause forbidding Bob to get married for the next seven years.

It is no secret that studios like to keep their young and upcoming stars single. Janet Leigh, for example, was asked by a prominent producer not to marry Tony Curtis lest she injure his drawing power at the box office. Janet told the producer to go whistle and eloped to Connecticut with Tony.

Similarly, Marilyn Monroe's studio is wondering whether or not her recent marriage to Joe Di Maggio will cost her any fans. Marilyn was married while she was suspended and there are many who insist that she would not have married if the studio had quickly come to terms on a new contract and a rewrite of Pink Tights.

When Bob Wagner was asked if anything in his contract prevented his getting married, he declared, "Absolutely not. I can get married any time I want to. Only I don't want to get married. Not right now, anyway. And for a very good reason.

"I just don't happen to be in love.

"When the right girl comes along, a girl I can't do without, someone who's the greatest—then, that's it. I'm done and gone. No one's holding me back."

"No one but yourself!" someone remarked. "Let's face it, R.J. You know that any man can stop himself from falling in love. Just as soon as he finds himself slipping in a certain direction, he stops seeing that particular girl. Isn't that the way you've been operating? Isn't that what happened between you and Debbie Reynolds?"

R.J. furrowed that smooth, unlined forehead and a look of meditation came into his hazel eyes. He's not one to talk first and think later.

"No," he said after several moments. "I don't think I've been operating that way at all.

"Right now my career happens to come first with me. I'm twenty-four years old and I know that I've got a long way to go to become a good actor. So I'm concentrating on that for the time being.

"What I'm trying to do is to live a decent, balanced, respectable life. I'm trying to avoid entangling alliances. That's a pretty difficult job in this town, because you start taking a girl out and right away the papers have you headed for the altar.

"About Debbie, all I can say is that it never was serious. No matter what they say, I'm pretty sure she's still my friend.

"I don't think I've ever antagonized any girl I've dated. I never build the friendship into a big romantic thing because I'm just not ready for the responsibility that love and marriage demands."

If any girl is sore at R.J., one would expect it to be Debbie Reynolds, whose fondness for him allegedly went unreciprocated.

Debbie was asked if she thought R.J. had put a check rein on his emotions, whether he was going high hat, whether he was fickle, and about the other gossip circulating about young Prince Valiant.

"I think I know R.J.'s character pretty well," Debbie said, "and he's as sweet a guy as I've ever met. He doesn't make false promises, and he doesn't hold himself in, and all that stuff about high-hatting old friends is just a lot of bunk.

Jane Russell asks: "Now that I'm a producer, what's with these temperamental actresses?"
Mike Connolly in The Hollywood Reporter

"I know that they're saying something about him and Jeff Hunter, but those two are still very close friends. Jeff was originally slated for the role of Prince Valiant, and then R.J. got the part, and I guess it was sort of strange because R.J. likes to visit with Jeff and Barbara and I guess he was embarrassed. But Jeff understands and I know Barbara does.

"You hear people say that R.J. doesn't have time for old friends any longer, and they make it sound as if he's grown snobbish. But what they don't realize is how hard he works. He has been in one picture after another—he's had to learn to fence for Prince Valiant, to brush up on his riding for Broken Lance—and I've seen him when he has rehearsed every Sunday for two or three months. I remember one time in particular that will give you some real insight into his character.

"I was having a shindig for the Girl Scouts over at my house, and I asked R.J. to come because one of the Girl Scouts thought he was the most. She was simply dying to meet him.

"R.J. said he would try to make it, and I knew he really would. But Sunday came along and we had the party and no R.J. But you know what he did?

"He phoned me and apologized for not showing up—'I'm awfully sorry,' he said, 'but I've got to stay home and practice my fencing.' And then he asked to talk to the Girl Scout and (Continued on page 62)

(Continued from page 60) he explained everything to her—that he had to turn up on the set the next day and that he had difficulty in handling the swords. He talked to her and treated her as though she were his closest buddy.

"That shows you the kind of consideration R.J. shows everyone. And it's not affectation, either. It's genuine with him."

WOULD DEBBIE classify R.J. as the "love-'em-and-leave-'em" type?

"No," she went on, "R.J. is completely honest. He doesn't shoot a line or pull any fast passes or anything like that. A girl knows right away that he's tremendously enthusiastic about his work.

"I remember one time over at my house I was trying to teach him a dance step. He just couldn't seem to get the hang of it. He was really impatient with himself.

"He has a bad eardrum, you know, and he suffers from terrible headaches because of his water skiing accident, but he just kept going until he got it.

"I don't think anyone in Hollywood can say one disparaging thing about R.J."

From a girl who has drifted out of Bob Wagner's life that's praise indeed. But it tallies with what other girls say—Terry Moore, for example, who was linked with Bob in a phony engagement story.

"He's strictly a fun date," Terry explains. "Never gets serious, never discusses marriage, loves his golf, his Jackie Gleason records, his hardtop Mercury and, of course, his work."

ASKED THE SECRET of his success in handling girls, Bob grinned boyishly and said, "I've got a sister and I've been brought up to treat other girls with kindness and respect. That's all I try to do."

"But isn't it on the level that you won't let yourself go, that you won't permit yourself the pleasure or danger of falling in love? After all, R.J., you've dated a lot of girls in and out of Hollywood. Haven't you met a single girl who'd make a good wife?"

"I've met a lot of girls who'd make fine wives," Bob answered. "Only not for me."

"How about Jean Peters? Wouldn't she make you a fine wife?" That one stopped Bob cold. He'd just finished making Broken Lance with Jean. They had been on location together in Arizona. He had taken her to the preview of Prince Valiant, and they'd managed several dates.

"Sure," he said, "if I could find someone like Jean I'd think about marriage pretty seriously. There's a girl who's got everything: a sense of humor, brains, looks, ability, the whole works."

Writer we know says he quit his studio because of a difference over money: they didn't want to pay him any.

Mike Connolly in
The Hollywood Reporter

"But you've found Jean! Why look for a copy when you've got the real thing?" Bob changed the subject.

IN HOLLYWOOD Jean Peters is known as the mystery girl. When she first hit town, Jean (who is three years older than R.J.) was completely candid.

She had won a popularity contest at Ohio State. The prize had been $200 and a trip to Hollywood. The studio had tested her and given her a contract, and Jean didn't mind telling all about her past.

Her father had died when she was ten and she and her mother had run a tourist camp. Jean had learned how to lay bricks and sew her own clothes and repair electric lines and refinish furniture.

In Hollywood she moved into a small bungalow with a grandaunt, Cis Francomb, and was cast in her first movie. And then bang. No more news about Jean Peters.

The story is that while Jean was on location in Mexico, one of the most powerful men in the movie business flew his own plane down there just to see her.

An attempt was made to hush the story of this trip, but it was impossible because just about that time Lana Turner went AWOL and flew down to Mexico to visit Tyrone Power, also in Morelia.

The reporters and photographers had a field day, and the story wafted back to Hollywood that Jean Peters and the producer were extremely affectionate. That belief still exists—which may be one reason the friendship between Bob Wagner and Jean Peters is probably destined for nothingness or, at best, pleasant memories.

OF COURSE Jean might drop her producer and Bob might stop playing the field. But such a change is not likely.

R.J. is having a ball these days, and he doesn't want romance or marriage to slow or complicate the amazing progress he's made. But he's facing a dilemma about which he says, "They've got me in the middle, and it's kind of puzzling. If I go out with one girl a few times, I become a romance item. If I go out with several girls then I'm a regular Romeo. It's one of those heads-you-win-tails-I-lose deals.

"I've got to be careful, so I date in out-of-the-way places and I stay away from parties, or if I do go to some affair like the "This Is Your Life" party honoring Prince Valiant, then I show up by myself. That way there's no talk.

"Funny thing, when you're just beginning in pictures everyone wants to help you—your old friends, the grips, even the commissary waitresses. Then you get a little success and something happens.

"Guess you'd call it responsibility. People expect you to change. Suddenly you find yourself on the defensive. Right away you're accused of being snobbish and deserting old pals and every date becomes a great love affair.

"Barbara Stanwyck, who's one of the nicest women ever, told me when we were making Titanic that the more successful an actor becomes, the bigger target he makes. She sure was right.

"All of a sudden I'm protecting myself from rumors and gossip and enterprising press agents who try to marry me off in print to their clients. Me, who's nothing!

"They say I'm playing it careful, that I'm ducking marriage, that I'm afraid of love. All bunk.

"I'm counting on marriage—not right now, but in the future. And I'll probably wind up marrying some girl who's in show business or some girl with a goal in life.

"I like girls who're enthusiastic, who know what work is all about, but they've gotta have a sense of humor and like outdoor sports. I'm golf-happy, you know.

"But before I can think of marriage, I've gotta save some dough. That's why I've got a business manager who limits me to a few bucks a week and stashes the rest of it away. After taxes and agent's commission and a few of my ritzy sports coats, there's not too much left.

"But I'm not complaining. No, sir. I'm the luckiest guy alive and I'm grateful to everyone who ever gave me a helping hand.

"And it's not true that anyone has forbidden me to get married. I'd never put up with such a silly ruling. But neither am I going to let anyone stampede me into a wedding.

"I've seen what fun the Hunters get out of life—Jeff and Barbara and little Chris—and that's for me. But the time's got to be right, and I've got to find the right girl."

"How about Jean Peters?"

R. J. Wagner grinned. "The most," he said. "Absolutely the most." END

sleek and slim

■ You will have a glamorous figure in every silhouette when you wear Stephanie's Slim-Thi two-way stretch panty girdle and waist-length bra. The girdle features a long leg for special thigh control. The high waist and firm front panel give a sleek line. Small, medium or large in 15-inch and 17-inch lengths, about $2.98; extra large size, about $3.98 (with zipper, about $4.98). The bra whittles your waist and emphasizes smooth figure contour. The bra cups are miracle-lined for permanent uplift and support (wash and wear as much as you like—always retains the shape). There is comfort in the five-inch center front Lastex panel (two elastic girdle tabs hold it securely). Adjustable shoulder straps. White only. About $1.98. See other Stephanie bra, page 66. (Continued from page 39) life," he grinned. "Thank you and I'll never get over it."

"How did your dinner party with little Nancy come out?" I asked.

"I've never heard so much girl talk in my life," he said. "Nancy looked beautiful at her confirmation. I had ordered baby orchids for her and her friends. They were at each place at the table. I didn't get to say a word all through dinner. They just yacked away about school and boys—'he's a drip,' somebody else was 'even more of a drip.'"

"I'll bet they were too excited to eat," said I.

"Not on your life," replied Frank. "They lapped up everything from soup to nuts to ice cream."

I'd heard many stories about Frank and his kids from our mutual friend, Al Levy. "I know he's prejudiced," I told Sinatra, "but are the stories true?"

"That all depends on what he told you."

"Well, for instance, that when you were singing in Miami and little Nancy was sick, you telephoned her every day."

"That's true, but I phone the kids almost every day when I'm away. And when I'm in town, I go by to see them five nights a week. We watch television together and have musical shows, and lately I've been helping them with their painting. There's a new gimmick on the market—portraits of people like Liberace and Bob Hope, with sections of the face numbered to correspond with different colors of paint. I help the kids blend the colors. You'd have had hysterics watching what we did to Hope the other night. He never would have recognized himself."

This is the only painting Frank has had time for lately. His old friend, the late Perry Charles, got him started painting clowns, but he's been too busy lately with his career for the hobby.

Al Levy had told me that little Frankie is the spitting image of his old man. I questioned Frank.

"He's so like me it's frightening. Only a little rounder in the face. If I stand in front of the fireplace with my hands behind my back, he does the same thing. He composes his own music and sings, too." Frank laughed. "He kills me. When I do a television show, he'll quote everything I said the next time I see him. He's very show-wise and talks stage lingo. 'Now about that joke, Dad,' he'll say.

"He loved Anything Goes, the television show I did with Ethel Merman, but he's quite a critic. The day after the program, he said, 'Dad, that bit you did dressed in women's clothes was very funny.' He thought the chase scene was the best part of the show.

"The kids' favorite TV shows are the comics—Skelton and Berle. They also watch the cowboys. When it looks as though Bill Boyd is about to kiss the girl, Frankie says, 'Oh, go on, kiss her. Get it over with and get on with the show.'

"He met Boyd once and has never gotten over it. He didn't have a word to say to his hero except a polite 'How do you do?' That's the way he is. When he gets really excited he's perfectly quiet. But an hour or two later, after he has thought it over, he starts yacking. He'll tell you everything that went on, describe the scene and re-enact the whole event."

Frank was off to the races on his favorite subject—his son—so I didn't interrupt.

"What I love about Frankie," he said, "is his great comedy sense and droll humor. He rarely laughs at anything he says, and seldom at anything anybody else says. But when he gets tickled, he falls apart. His eyes water, he breaks up. He laughs inwardly.

"I was having dinner with the children the night before they were to give their annual music recital. I asked Nancy what she was going to play. She replied, 'The piano concerto.' I was discussing it with her and didn't think Frankie was paying any attention. He's a dreamer, but when you think he's miles away he'll come up with something funny and let loose with a line that knocks you right out of your chair.

"Right in the middle of this serious discussion with Nancy, Frankie said, 'I gotta play that stinking Hungarian Dance. I did it last year and I don't want to repeat.'

"'What do you want to do?' I asked, after I'd pulled myself together.

"'I'd like to get up and tell some jokes or something.'

"'One-man jokes?'

"'One-man or two-man jokes.'

"'Well,' I said, 'maybe you and I could get some candy-striped suits, straw hats, and tell some two-man jokes.' We have a routine that breaks Frankie up. I'll say to him: 'Have you seen any new one-hundred-dollar bills?'

"And he'll come back with: 'Haven't even seen any old ones.' He reads his lines like W. C. Fields might have. We have another that Frankie thinks is funny. I ask: 'Why did you cut holes in the rug?'

"'To see the floor show,' he answers.

"I really think he wants to be a comic. He likes Red Skelton, and after a Skelton show he'll talk about Red's jokes by the hour. He can remember every joke on the show. Good or bad, I don't know, but he might be a comic—and if he is, he'll be a good one."

Frank took Frank, Jr., and Nancy to Academy Awards. When his name was announced he kissed them before running down the aisle.

"What would you like your kids to be?" I asked.

"I'd like that to come directly from them," said Sinatra. "I will guide them in whatever they want to do. Frankie seems talented in music. If later he wants to conduct or compose, I'll guide him, tell him where to go and who to see. But then he may want to be a mathematician. He's a whiz at figures."

"And where does he get that talent?"

"Not from me," said Frank. "He must get that from his mother. She's very bright at figures." (Still I didn't mention Ava.) "I can put numbers together, but when it comes to adding nines, I'm in real trouble.

"Like most kids, Frankie knows all about jet planes and automobiles, too. The other day when I went to see him, he said, 'Dad, those fins are much too high on your new Cadillac. I like the Nash better.'

"One day when I walked in Frankie was playing the piano. He didn't know I was there, so I stood outside the door and listened. Finally I walked over to the piano.

"'Oh, hello, Dad,' he said.

"'How are you, son? What's that you're playing?'

"It was something that sounded almost classical which he had composed. We discussed it a minute. Then he said, 'You know, I've been thinking about that new car of yours. I've given it a lot of thought. It's not too good. You know they haven't had a body change in those cars since 1950.' When he comes out with something like that, what are you going to do but laugh?"

"You've told me about Nancy and Frankie. How about Tina? What's she like?"

"They're all three a different species," said Frank. "Nancy's the practical one, the little mother; Frankie's a dreamer; and Tina is an explosive hellion. While Nancy and Frank both are rather complacent, Tina is the firecracker and a great flirt. She knows how to work a guy over—she'll be a heart-breaker some day. She's just about four feet high, so I was a little surprised when she asked me for one of my pink shirts. 'What for?' I asked. She explained that the kids in her class all do fingerpainting, and they use their dads' shirts with the sleeves cut off as smocks. Well, that figured. Then I asked, 'Why pink?'

"'Well,' said Tina, 'I like to use all the colors that blend well with pink, and if I get paint on the smock it won't look bad.' I took her a shirt, and you should see her in it. She all but trips every time she takes a step.

"My clothes are very popular with the girls. Nancy wanted to know if I had a long-sleeved yellow cashmere sweater. I found one and gave it to her. It was pretty horrible on her—came down to her knees. But all the kids wear sloppy-Joes, so she just pushed up the sleeves and liked it.

"Frankie hasn't asked for any of my clothes so far, but I have a suspicion it won't be long now. He's usually content to wear blue dungarees and scuffed shoes, but the other day he said, 'Why do I always have to wear dark blue or grey suits? Why can't I ever wear bright colors?' He dotes on bow ties."

All the Sinatra children, unlike the offspring of many movie stars, attend public school. That's the way Frank wants it. He feels they should be able to get along with all types of children, and judging from the number of their friends they seem to do a good job of it.

Frank left his family for the nonce and got onto another subject, about which he yacked just like his kids. "You know, Hedda, I've got a wonderful program lined up, and I want to shout about it. After Pink Tights, I'm going to do a musical with Gene Kelly. I've talked with Leland Hayward about the part of Ensign Pulver in Mr. Roberts, and to Stanley Kramer about a role in Not As A Stranger. I've got so much picture work lined up, I'm giving up nightclubs for the time being. I'm beginning to settle down."

"I've noticed that," said I. "Success is a great settler, isn't it? The thing I've noticed most about you lately is that you don't fly off the handle like you used to. How do you explain that, please?"

"I've got a new system. When anybody needles me, I ignore him and walk away. Things have (Continued on page 66)

(Continued from page 64) improved. But—and this is important—I'll never lose the feeling of hating to have my privacy invaded. We in show business (anybody in the public eye from President Eisenhower on down) are under a magnifying glass. Everything we do is reviewed. I've often wondered what kind of a world it would be if every working man's efforts were reviewed as ours are. If the plumber, say, who came to fix the pipe and didn't get it quite right got a big review about his error in his trade paper next day. We'd have the most neurotic world you can possibly imagine.

"If someone comes up to me and says, 'Could I see you for a minute?' or 'Could I have a picture of you?' I'm more than willing to comply. But let somebody snap his fingers and say, 'Get over there quick!' That does it! If I did it to them, they'd react the same way I do. There are at least five guys who love to needle me. They know my low boiling point. But since I know who they are and what they're after, I avoid them or try to smile and keep my temper in check."

"You've got to admit, though, that you've got a healthy temper."

"Sure I've got one—who hasn't? But after the thing is over, I feel twice as bad. You feel awful and think, 'Geez, I'm sorry that had to happen.' The thing to do is to see that it doesn't happen again."

It was then that I noticed a tiny bald spot on top of his head. "Hey," I told him, "you're getting thin on top. I've got the very thing for you. I know a man who's invented something wonderful to grow hair."

He screamed with laughter. "I know a guy who shrinks heads so it looks like you've got hair."

I insisted that my friend really had invented such a substance.

"Hedda, if you say so, I'll use it. It'll probably work so well I'll look like a poor man's John L. Lewis with big bushy eyebrows, too. On the other hand I might wind up wearing a wig if your friend isn't a good chemist. But say, I think I know where you can contact a guy who'll sell you the Golden Gate Bridge."

"All right, you'll be sorry when you have to wear one of those skull doilies like Bing Crosby."

Frank got up to take his leave, and I walked him to his car. "You know what?" I said. "Frankie's right. The fins on your Cadillac are too high. And why did you get a soft top? The way you drive, if you turn over there's nothing to protect you."

"Remember me?" he said. "I'm Sinatra, that reformed character. No back talk, no temper, no speeding. I've slowed down to a crawl."

He took off as though the entire Los Angeles police force were after him. END

if you knew beedle . . .

(Continued from page 53) "The very first time the hostess came down the aisle loaded with coffee the plane dipped. You guessed it—everything landed on Holden."

Ronnie Reagan, one of Bill's closest friends, tells about the time Bill was invited to talk at a Friars Club dinner.

"He decided to talk about his unhappy experience with the airline hostess," Ronnie recalls, "when amazingly enough, a waiter carrying a load of chocolate sundaes suddenly stumbled, and Bill found his suit full of syrup and ice cream."

Bill's wife says that very early in their marriage she learned that Bill was accident-happy. It started with the wedding. "We decided to get married over a weekend in Las Vegas. Bill was working at the time and said that as soon as he was finished, he and Brian Donlevy, his best man, would charter a plane and fly in.

"He had made arrangements with the Congregational minister and hired the bridal suite at El Rancho Vegas. We were to be married at ten P.M. in the chapel.

"At ten P.M. there were no signs of Bill or the best man.

"They had chartered a plane and had made an emergency landing in a mud flat some place. They finally reached Las Vegas at three A.M. By that time the minister was fast asleep and the hotel had rented our suite to someone else.

"We got another room and called the minister. He was a very sweet man. He came over and married us at four A.M. And then we had a champagne breakfast.

"The pilot then suggested that we'd better get going if we wanted to beat the fog back into Los Angeles.

"So Monday, the next day, Bill went back to work at Columbia, and I took off for a location trip to Canada.

"The day I got back, looking forward to our delayed honeymoon, Bill went on location to Carson City. Two weeks later he came down with appendicitis and went to the Cedars of Lebanon Hospital.

"The day before Bill was to be released, I came down with an emergency case of appendicitis, and they had to put me in the hospital. So you can see what happened to our honeymoon."

Bill Holden has been close-mouthed with magazines, another reason why his fans don't know too much about him.

Bill isn't exactly uncooperative. He is chary because some writers almost cost him his career before it began.

Bill's father, head chemist of the George W. Gooch Laboratories, wanted Bill to major in chemistry at school.

Bill didn't like chemistry. He used to spend summers in the lab analyzing the constituents of fertilizer. He decided when he was eighteen that this was not for him.

At Pasadena Junior College he took a course in dramatics. He played the role of Madame Curie's eighty-year-old father in the Playbox Theatre, then under the supervision of the Pasadena Playhouse.

A Paramount talent scout saw Bill in his role and offered him a screen test. Nobody thought the test was sensational, but Bill was signed for $50 a week, "because he's a nice clean-cut young man who looks like the boy next door."

In 1938, Columbia Pictures was conducting a nation-wide search for a Golden Boy to play opposite Barbara Stanwyck in the picture of the same name. More than 5,000 contestants had been interviewed before Paramount decided to let Columbia look at Holden's screen test. Columbia agreed to give Bill the role if Paramount would split his contract. Paramount agreed.

According to a close friend of Holden's, "This was when the fan magazines began to drive him crazy.

"Every single day at least half a dozen writers would interview the poor guy. 'How does it feel being a boy Cinderella? Do you sleep in the raw or in pajamas? What are you doing with all your money? Do you consider yourself the luckiest boy in the world?'

"If you remember Golden Boy, Bill had to play the part of a kid who was half violinist and half prizefighter. It was his first role, and he was scared silly. The studio assigned Cannonball Green to teach him how to box. A music teacher taught him how to finger the violin. A voice coach taught him how to speak. The make-up department curled his hair each morning. The kid was going nuts.

"In between, he had to memorize his lines. On top of all this, he had to sit for interviews. He was bewildered. After a month of this routine at fifty bucks a week, he just couldn't take it.

"'I quit,' he announced. That's when Barbara Stanwyck stepped in. She's the baby who saved him."

Barbara recalls, "I simply put my foot down and ordered the set closed. Like all beginners, Bill was a little unsure of himself, and I did my best to keep him relaxed and self-confident."

Barbara did more than that. She insisted that Bill be given the best camera angles, that his part be built up, that he be left some time to study his lines.

Bill has never forgotten Barbara's kindness. Each year on the anniversary of Golden Boy, he sends her a tremendous bouquet of roses.

"If I'm anything in this business," he says modestly. "I owe it to Barbara and a few other fine people who took pains to teach me."

Bill also insists, "I have absolutely nothing against any magazine or any type of magazine. I just don't have time to be autobiographical."

Bill is not only short on time, he is short on inclination. He just doesn't like to talk about some things.

His brother Bob, for example. Bill and his kid brother were inseparable all through their youth in O'Fallon, Illinois, where they were born and in Monrovia and South Pasadena where they were brought up.

Lana Turner's reply to a British correspondent's question as to whether she was considering starring in a movie to be made in Holland: "Could be—I get in Dutch easily!"

Sidney Skolsky in The New York Post

As a youngster Bill owned a motorcycle and was something of a daredevil. He used to take bets that he could stand on his motorcycle and balance himself while the machine rode down the highway.

His mother, a former teacher, was outraged by this stunt and absolutely forbade it. She told Bob to notify her whenever Bill pulled one of his crazy stunts. But Bob, who was four years younger than Bill, worshipped his big brother. He never told on him. And Bill in turn loved and protected his little brother.

In World War II, Bill volunteered for the Army Air Force and Bob for the Navy Air Force. Bill was stationed in Texas and California, and Bob went to the Pacific on the aircraft carrier Bunker Hill.

In Fort Worth, Texas, Bill lived off the base, and his roommate was Hank Greenberg, the Detroit baseball star.

A series of robberies had occurred in their neighborhood, so Lieutenant Holden was sleeping with his .45 under the pillow.

One night Greenberg, supposedly on leave, returned earlier than expected. He started to tiptoe into the room. Holden heard the footsteps, reached under his pillow for the revolver, and whirled toward the door. When he saw it was Hank, he slipped the gun back under the pillow.

"I never told Hank," Bill says, "how close he came to death at an early age."

On January 4, 1944, Ensign Robert Beedle was killed in combat on a mission over Kavieng, New Ireland.

When Bill received news of his brother's death in the Pacific, he was naturally quite broken up. Ardis had given birth to a son two months before, and Bill had written his brother that the child would be named Peter Westfield in honor of Bob, whose middle name was Westfield.

Although many actors talk constantly about their own emotions, Bill cannot. He could give no tongue to his sorrow about Bob, and he finds it difficult to talk about his deep love for Ardis and the children.

Even in matters that don't touch him so deeply, Bill is less than garrulous.

When he won his first Academy Award for his superb performance in Stalag 17, he was asked how it felt. "Lucky," he said.

"Where'd you get the name Holden?" he was asked. Bill's real name is Beedle.

"A newspaperman," Bill answered. "Took it from him."

Asked to describe his courtship of Ardis, Bill's answer is usually something like, "Who cares about that?"

A studio publicity agent, once assigned to Holden, used to ask him for news every few days. Bill would always smile and shrug his shoulders to signify that there was nothing new—whereupon the publicity agent began to call him "the mystery man."

Bill is by nature unassuming, modest and unobtrusive, so unobtrusive in fact, that in 1951 after he had been in the movies thirteen years and had made some thirty films, the theatre-owners of America voted him their second choice as "star of tomorrow!"

Billy Wilder, who directed Holden in Sunset Boulevard and Stalag, has a ready explanation for Bill's sedateness.

"He is interested in his performance," Wilder points out. "Not his publicity."

Another reason relatively little is known of Bill's personality is that he has never lived any of his life in the headlines.

"Things happen to me all right," Bill says, "but since they're never tinged with scandal, thank the Lord, they never make the papers."

Bill married the only girl ever linked with him in the gossip columns. He never took out many girls in Hollywood. Never had the time. Never had the dough.

In 1939 after he made a hit in Golden Boy, he took a house in the Hollywood Hills with Hugh McMullan, the dialogue director on the picture.

Hugh offered to get Bill a date with Brenda Marshall, a girl he had known in New York who was then under contract to Warner Brothers.

"Are you crazy?" Bill asked. "She's married."

"She's separated," Hugh explained. "And besides she's a really wonderful girl."

"Skip it," Holden said. "I'll stay home and read a book."

A few weeks later Bill was loaned out to Warner Brothers to co-star with George Raft in Invisible Stripes. Second day on the lot he ran into Brenda Marshall.

"Hugh McMullan," he began. "He's a friend of mine. That is, we live together. And we were wondering—well."

"Yes," Brenda helped out, "you were wondering what?"

"We were wondering," Bill asked, "if you'd care to take dinner with us one night."

"I'd be delighted," said Brenda, who was then earning $750 a week.

That's how it began. It moved along at a rapid pace.

Bill and Brenda fell in love. They wanted to get married immediately, but it took twenty-one months for Brenda to work out her divorce from director Richard Gaines and to obtain custody of her daughter Virginia, now sixteen.

During this time, Bill took his girl to the movies and to dine at drive-ins and the most inexpensive restaurants in town. Bill wasn't earning much money, and although the girl complained, he refused "to go Dutch on our dates."

The Holdens were finally married on July 13, 1941, and nine months later Bill volunteered and was assigned to the Air Force Training Command. He remained in the service four years, but he was able to see Ardis on furloughs. She agreed to retire when the war was over and Bill had re-established himself.

Seven years ago when Ardis gave birth to a second son, Bill, whose contract was still split between Columbia and Paramount, started asking for better roles.

"If I can't get them around here," he pleaded, "please loan me out."

That's exactly what the studios did. They sent Bill over to RKO for Rachel And The Stranger, to 20th Century for Apartment For Peggy, and then they began to realize that their boy-from-next-door had developed into quite an actor.

Bill was given a lead in Sunset Boulevard, nominated for an Acadamy Award, the lead in Born Yesterday, which won the Academy Award for Judy Holliday, and then two years ago, Paramount offered him a fourteen-year contract and the right to make one outside picture a year.

Bill hopes to set up his own independent company for these outside pictures and to make the first one with Audrey Hepburn, with whom he co-starred in Sabrina.

Bill Holden is popular with his fellow-actors, high praise in Hollywood. He has been elected vice president of the Screen Actors Guild, and whenever the group wants someone to speak for them, the honor falls to Holden.

Bill owns a large collection of guns, but when he goes hunting with Brian Donlevy or Richard Carlson he comes back empty-handed, although he's a crack shot.

Brian Donlevy likes to tell about the time he and Bill went hunting for coyotes.

"I explained to Holden," Donlevy says, "that the best way to shoot coyotes was first to shoot a wild burro. We'd stake out the burro. Then when the coyotes came to scavenge, we'd let 'em have it.

"Bill agreed and we took off for Death Valley one weekend. You wanna know something? We must've seen at least a half dozen wild burros. Only Holden didn't have the heart to shoot one of 'em!"

"Neither did Donlevy," Bill said later. "He should talk!"

Most Hollywood actors wandered onto the scene by accident. Not Bill. Besides his Air Force duty, acting is the only profession he's ever known—and he loves to work. Because of that he gets more work than he can handle. In the last two years he has made Turning Point, Stalag 17, Escape From Ft. Bravo, Forever Female, The Moon Is Blue, Executive Suite, The Bridges At Toko-Ri, Sabrina and Country Girl. No wonder he was tired the night he won his Academy Award.

He had worked all that day with Bing Crosby and Grace Kelly on Country Girl, and he just made it to the Academy Theatre. When he and Ardis got home that night, Bill flopped into an easy chair. Ardis covered her husband with a blanket, and Bill slept the whole night sitting up.

In the morning he was awakened by children's voices. He looked around and a bunch of neighborhood kids were in the room with him. Peter Holden, ten, was showing off the Oscar.

"See this?" he asked proudly. "My dad got it for being good."

Bill smiled, drew the blanket over his head, and closed his eyes, sleeping the sleep of those fortunate few who are blessed with accomplishment, love and peace of mind.

I believe

(Continued from page 47) pattern of conduct I must follow in my existence, and I don't suppose it is necessary to say that it also applies to my faith and the manner in which I practice it. I never think of myself as a pious man. Yet in my heart is belief fostered in the home in which I was born.

Everyone, I think, has some pattern of life which is best for him and wisest to follow. When he deviates from it something, I suppose it is conscience, tells him about it. The governing instinct is the feeling of well-being that fills us when we know we are living as we should. I was only a small boy when I first realized this. I don't suppose I will forget it if I live to be ninety-nine years old.

I LIVED IN Bakersfield, California, when I was nine years old and I had some cousins who lived just out of town. On Sundays we would visit, and sometimes we played ball. One such day, when the game was over I slipped the ball—their ball—into my pocket and said nothing about it. I knew I was stealing it, all right. I practically started to get sick the second I did it.

That night when we got home I felt so horribly guilty that I threw the ball into a corn field just to get rid of it—and rid of my guilty feeling, I guess. But when I went to sleep I started to dream about it; I dreamed I could see the ball lying next to some weeds in the field, and then I awoke. It was more than I could stand. I went to my father and told him all about it.

He got out of bed, we went into the field, and there I found the ball next to some weeds, just as I had seen it in my dream. My father started the car and we drove to my cousins' right then and there and I returned the ball. I will never forget the weight that untangled itself from around my heart and dropped off.

At Dubrow's dinery some cats were skinning an actress who's getting married for the steeeenth time. "Her trouble," one sighed, "is that she just can't be faithful to any one guy." "Oh I don't know," interrupted Betty Reilly, "she's had the same lawyer for all her divorces!"

Hy Gardner in
The Herald Tribune

I suppose that some people either have little or no conscience, or can turn a deaf ear to it. I think I knew kids like this. I can remember one who, when we were both about ten or so, wanted to let me in on a great scheme. He had found a way of sneaking into the church vestry unseen and he suggested that we steal the money from the collection plates on Sunday morning immediately after the offering.

By this time I was pretty well set on the sort of life I had to follow in order to be able to live with myself and stealing church money was not on the list. My declining didn't bother him nor did he give up the scheme; come Sunday he got away with $70, mostly in small coin.

A little detective work involving a check-up on which boys who belonged to the church were not at service at the time, and a further inquiry as to which of these had suddenly become prosperous, ended with the Bakersfield police force triumphant and my pal quite rump-sore. But only a couple of days passed, it seemed to me, before he was ready with new ways and means of breaking the law.

YOU'RE EITHER one kind or the other. I couldn't be the way he was, and for a fellow who was going to continue stealing

FATHERS AND SONS

It's a wise child who has Ty Power or
John Wayne for his dad!

■ When The Long Gray Line started rolling at Columbia, John Wayne stopped by to wish good luck to his son.

Patrick Wayne plays a cadet in his second screen role. His first was with his father in The Quiet Man. Whether or not the boy will make a career of acting remains to be seen, but he is always hanging around the set when his dad is working—listening, studying, learning.

Present at the meeting of the Waynes was Tyrone Power, star of The Long Gray Line. When Tyrone was Patrick's age, his own father, Tyrone Power, Sr., was also working in pictures. Tyrone, Jr., was eager to follow in his father's footsteps—on the stage—but his father advised against it. The thing for a young actor to do at that time, he believed, was to make a place for himself on the screen. He was confident his son could become a star.

To point up his argument, Power, Sr., writing from the location of The Big Trail, described the cast and added, "and there is John Wayne, a tall, good-looking youth who has never before been in pictures. But he is ideal for the part of the hero and will be a great success. His future, I should think, is assured."

A few months later, Tyrone, Sr., collapsed on the set of The Miracle Man. Early next morning he died in his son's arms. That was December 30, 1931.

Mr. Power's judgment has been sustained. Both Tyrone Power and John Wayne have fulfilled his prophecy.

probably it was just as well he wasn't like me!

I may be giving the impression that my reason for staying on the straight and narrow was my fear of getting caught. This is not the way it works out with me, I am certain. I know that in any wrong-doing I am hurting the other man. That seems to stop me more than the knowledge that I may be punished if caught. My punishment would start the moment I had done my deed and getting caught would have nothing to do with it. I remember taking some eggs from a grocery store and throwing them at someone's house. Later on I was nabbed for it, but I know I felt worse thinking of the mess I had caused someone else than I felt after my guilt was established and I was "messed up" myself.

It happened that in my parents' home there was a strict regard for what was good and what was evil; my father and mother were Baptists who subscribed fully, even intently, to every tenet of their church. Their way was the only way I knew from earliest memory and what they thought and did seemed right to me. One rule which I followed without question may be of interest in view of the kind of work I am now doing; none of us as children was permitted to go to Sunday movies and I was never inside a theatre on a Sunday until after I was seventeen years old.

It goes without saying that while other kids did go to movies on a Sunday I was in church. I didn't mind it much and I think the reason was not that I was naturally pious or anything like that, but that the custom was iron-bound; you didn't even discuss breaking it. I have always felt that a young child feels more secure if he has a definite program of life to follow, one which is laid out for him and from which he can't deviate, than he does if he is allowed to feel that he can choose what to do. He doesn't want that much responsibility yet and he senses that guiding a life as important as he feels his own to be is really a responsibility!

I don't suppose that my relationship to the church today is as close and uncompromising as my parents'. No man can measure his piety, nor should he, perhaps; but the faith into which I was born is the faith that I understand best and rely on. I pray as I was taught to pray, and I have always felt that my prayers have been recognized if not answered directly.

I have a pretty positive attitude towards religion. And more than this, I carry through with this attitude in my everyday life—I have no truck with negative views.

If, for instance, I have to meet someone —a producer or studio head, perhaps—in regard to some arrangement affecting my career, I always expect that we will get along well and that I will be treated fairly. I do not change this feeling even when, as they sometimes do, friends warn me that I am dealing with a particularly aggressive individual and will find myself on the losing end if I don't keep on my toes every second. In almost every case I have found myself treated well if I have expected good treatment. I have a sneaking hunch that if I were worried about getting cheated that is exactly what would happen.

This confidence that all will turn out for the best is something a fellow can use around Hollywood where so many things happen (or the printed gossip says they will happen) to confuse you.

If all the pictures I read I was in were actually filmed with me in the cast I would probably be the most often-seen actor in the business. If all the companies I was supposed to be with had actually signed me I would be working in no less than three studios at a time—most of the time. I never said or did most of the things I'm credited with. I wouldn't have had time for anything else! If this sounds all mixed up then you are beginning to get the general idea of the atmosphere around here.

To make it worse these reports about your work aren't the only kind that fly up about you; there are the more personal ones to upset you unless you learn to save yourself the headache of worrying about them by eliminating them from your mind. Before my marriage columnists had me romantically identified with actresses I had never even met. They would tie me up with one, and when this association proved to be obviously without foundation, they would merrily trot out another girl—and again a stranger, or at least no more than a casual friend—with whom I was supposed to be hunting full moons to sit under. And, of course, when I did get married, the experts really went to town.

Well, our marriage didn't go well. But I think both of us would have suffered a great deal more than we have if we had not learned to ignore negative stories about ourselves. If I am bothered at all by such stories today it is because the columnists always feel they have to place the blame for every marriage that fails. I do resent any such outside judgments. Equally, when they absolve me of any fault and imply that the fault is my wife's, I resent them. No one knows the situation but the principals in such a case—and no one else should know or pretend to know. When two people are immersed in personal difficulties of this kind, outside opinions delivered without any real knowledge of what is involved can be very cruel.

Something else I was taught as a youngster was to be resourceful, to make do with what I had when I couldn't get what I wanted. I mention this because I think the idea of it stems from the humility with which my people faced their Maker and their destiny on earth.

My father was a mechanic in the railroad shops in Bakersfield. He wasn't a rich man; he was better than just rich, he was a contented man. By this attitude he showed his sons and his daughter that life was worth the effort and that one didn't need much material bolstering to be spiritually happy, that is, to be really happy.

This teaching has been invaluable to me in so many ways; in small ways and in big ways. When I wanted a bow and arrow as a child I didn't have to have the fancy one hung in the window of the sporting goods store downtown. I made me a crude one out of a tamarack branch with arrow weeds for arrows and I was really happy. When I wanted to make good as an actor in Hollywood and didn't catch on it didn't have to be that or nothing. I was not only willing to learn my business all over, but I had fun doing it.

Now, to go back to my boyhood for a moment—after my tamarack and arrow weed archery my grandmother in New Mexico sent me a real Indian bow and arrow when I was twelve, and it meant more to me because I was now trained in its use. Similarly, when I found myself again recognized as a top picture star by the studios after some lean years, the time I had spent in going over acting fundamentals in TV and lesser pictures helped me to really take advantage of this second opportunity. In each case when I didn't get what I wanted I could have been so hurt as to do something foolish and really spoil my chances. I refused to let it mean that much to me and, curiously enough, I am getting a lot out of my career now because I was willing to accept so little before.

I might make one more point about my dependence on honesty as a sort of guide rail in everything I do. There isn't any business as crazy as the movie business is (or can get at times) and it takes all a fellow has to keep himself sane and well balanced. If you are susceptible to flattery, for instance—well, you're done. Because they can sure hand it out here.

Furthermore, flattery comes in unsuspected ways. The Charge At Feather River was my first "A" picture in eight years, but it turned out to be a huge success at the box office. For my second picture, The Command, the studio made big plans to assure another success. When I got the script I realized the writer had put in some mighty fine scenes for the character I was to play. They were great.

The temptation to play them was strong but I knew in my heart that I wasn't the man the writer had in mind when he wrote them and I couldn't live up to his hopes. Unless I could be myself in my part I wouldn't be much of anything. I told the producers and the writer this and I made sure to explain that it wasn't the writer's fault, it was the fact that he was stuck with a guy like me. They understood, and with a few changes I was able to play my role and be a lot more believable in it.

My particular defense against developing too much ego as an actor is to keep seeing myself as the small-town boy I was when I arrived in Hollywood, and to keep telling myself that essentially I am that boy and not much more. Any time I get too far away from the sort of fellow he is I am making a mistake.

Too many odd things can happen here for a fellow to lose his head over himself. One night I remember leaving Los Angeles on a Southern Pacific train bound for Dallas, Texas, to attend the world première of Texas, Brooklyn And Heaven. I was a star in that picture so I had me a fine bedroom on the train. But that's all I had. In my pocket was thirty-five cents and in my stomach was the hunger of all time. If a porter hadn't come to my rescue with a loan of five dollars I would have eaten the fancy cowboy boots I had brought along in my bag—I was young enough.

Yes, something had gone wrong with the arrangements. But the point is that something can always go wrong, not only with the arrangements about a train trip, but with your whole trip through life. Against such eventuality a fellow needs to know that his faith in his ultimate, his spiritual future is so strong that he will be able to ride out any kind of trouble. It's wonderful how much more secure you feel to know this about yourself! END

(Continued from page 31) Unwilling to disrupt their lives more than absolutely necessary, Mom kept the big nine-room flat that had always been home, and went to work. If they were shorter on cash, they were longer on freedom. Nobody now to keep Doris from spinning her platters, and whirling like a young dervish all over the house. Once, as she broke into song, Paul pricked up his ears. "Hey! Maybe you should make with the pipes instead of the feet." Cherishing this rare tribute from an older brother, she paid it no further mind. Dancing was what came naturally, and her feet might be her fortune. That's what they said at Hessler's Dancing School. That's what they said at school and church affairs, where she teamed up with Jerry Doherty. With Jerry she entered the contest staged by a local department store and they waltzed off with first prize—five hundred bucks. This windfall, their mothers decided, must be used for the children. What better use than to further their careers, what better place than Hollywood? Westward they traveled and reaped a small triumph. Impressed by the kids' comedy routines, Fanchon & Marco booked them for a series of summer shows. In high fettle, they returned to Cincinnati and school, practically professionals. A little more wrestling with stuff like algebra, a little more growing up and they'd be on their way.

A FORMER CLASSMATE who'd moved to the nearby town of Hamilton asked Doris over. A boy friend was coming with another boy to take them for a drive. The boys were cute, the moon was full, the evening lovely—until they reached the unguarded tracks, and from out of the peaceful night saw doom descending in the headlights of a fast freight. For a split second, for an eternity, they sat in frozen horror. Then it hit—ripped the hood away, dragged them a block and a half, came at length to a shuddering halt. Only the front of the car had crossed one rail—by which slim margin they escaped.

"Multiple leg fractures," the doctors told her mother. "She may never walk again. She may be crippled for life." With Doris they handled the facts more gingerly, but she was a girl who could read between evasions. So she lay alone, weeping for her shattered body and the dreams shattered with it.

As the slow months passed, however, as she moved from hospital to home, from bed to crutches, hope and resilient spirit took over. Unable to make with the feet, she made with the pipes—mostly to release her thwarted energies. Mom and Paul put their heads together, the result being a casual call from a friend who happened to teach singing. Casually, he asked Doris to perform. Feeling silly, she did. He said she was a natural. He said she had rhythm and feeling. He thought maybe they should work on her range a little. "You think he's kidding?" she inquired after he'd gone. "Why should he bother?" shrugged Mom, and went in to fix dinner. From the kitchen a few minutes later she heard the strains of "Tea For Two," which was normal, followed by another sound which wasn't. Her daughter beating out a jubilant tap routine on crutches.

Not until fourteen months after the accident could Doris navigate under her own steam, but she made the time count. At the same local shindigs where her hoofing had once drawn applause, she now hobbled up to sing, and professionals took note. Danny Engel, song plugger, boosted her to Grace Raine, WLW's voice coach, who offered to iron out the rough spots in her style. Providentially, Doris discarded the crutches just as Barney Rapp prepared to open Sign Of The Drum and called Miss Raine at the radio station. "Got anyone ready for bandwork, Grace?"

"Sure thing," said Grace with nary a quiver. "Name of Doris Kappelhoff—"

"The name I can't use, the girl maybe I can. Will you send her over?"

She sang "Day After Day," and just like that he hired her. "Now about this name—"

"Means something like churchyard," she told him helpfully.

"And that's where it belongs—"

"'Day After Day' was lucky for me, Mr. Rapp. How about Doris Day?"

So she made her professional bow—a slim, freckled girl with corn-colored hair and cornflower eyes. No beauty, but her smile broke like sunlight, radiating friendliness, and her voice held the same quality of warmth, as if she were singing straight to each hearer's heart. The customers liked her. They liked her well enough to pump up her courage. Greatly daring, she cut a record of "The Wind And The Rain In Your Hair," sent it to Bob Crosby, then at the Blackhawk in Chicago, tucked a note inside. "I love your band, I would like to sing with you." The answering wire came while she was at work. Mom phoned her. "It's signed Bob Crosby!"

"Yes, but what does it say? Stay home?"

"Now you know he's too smart to say that! He says, 'Come right up—'"

FROM CROSBY to Fred Waring to Les Brown and a ballad called "Sentimental Journey" which rocked the juke-set and spread the name of Doris Day from coast to coast. Only by that time she was Doris Jorden, housewife.

In later years she said: "Twice I loved madly. Insanity's the word for it—blind, starry-eyed worship." Not yet eighteen, inexperienced, romantic, impulsive, she gave her heart to Al Jorden, trombonist with Jimmy Dorsey, and retired to domesticity in a cottage on Cincinnati's Price Hill. As blithely as she'd set out to sing, she quit. Both instinct and training told her that, married, you devote yourself to your husband. What's an empty career compared to the glory of love? An eager, earnest bride, she proceeded to tackle the range with indifferent results. At ten she'd start cooking. At six she'd hover over Al with her mouth open. "Is it good?" No matter how the meat loaf tasted, the marriage turned sour. No alibi kid, she insists that the blame lay as much with her as with him. Nor could she regret the union which gave her Terry. The year after insanity struck she divorced Jorden and asked the manager of WLW for a job. He gaped. "But, Doris, you're bigtime now. We can't pay you more than sustaining rates—sixty-four a week minus taxes—"

"I need the money," she said.

Money was soon replaced by another problem. It took only the news that Day was again for hire to bring bandleaders flocking. But bandwork meant the road and separation from Terry. Emotions torn, she finally took the long view, signed with Les Brown, left her baby with Mom, and fared forth to seek security for them all. Whenever the outfit worked within hailing distance of home, Mom and Terry joined her, and for a while her hungry arms would be filled.

AT THE RIPE AGE of twenty-two, she met George Weidler, playing sax for Stan Kenton in New York, and Cupid fitted a second dart to his bow. Though one marriage had flopped, her illusions remained intact, her nature turned trustfully toward the sun of love. Besides, this was different, this was the true flame, the man predestined. Again she quit her job, this time to travel with her husband. Bookings landed them in Hollywood, the housing emergency landed them in a trailer. Anything was fine with Doris as long as she had George. She had him for a fast year.

Even when he pulled out with the band, leaving her behind to nurse the trailer, she refused to admit more than a passing cloud on their happiness. If he seemed moody at times, aren't we all? If he seemed to be drifting away, she was just over-sensitive. If they quarreled, they always made up, and the first year is the hardest. She loved him better than when she'd married him, and love conquers all. Having spent her first anniversary with loneliness, virus X and budget nightmares, she accepted a month's engagement from New York's Little Club.

The story has been told, and by no one more movingly than Doris. "Once I sang

TO EACH HIS OWN

The lean years
a few amazing habits!

■ With all the delicacies he has to choose from, MacDonald Carey's favorite food is peanut butter and onion—that's right, raw onion—sandwiches. Carey invented the combination when he was a struggling Broadway actor, doing research on the cheapest foods available in bulk with the highest nutritional value.

"You can live indefinitely on nothing else," says Carey. "It's a solitary life, but a healthy one." The onions cut the clinging taste of the peanut butter, and the peanut butter cuts the tang of the onions. "I used to have a small room in New York —just a bed, a chest of drawers, a sack of onions and a big tin of peanut butter that doubled as a stool," Carey continued, "and my outlay for food was under two dollars a week until the cost of bread went up."

Carey is back in New York, following production of Fire Over Africa which was filmed in Spain with Maureen O'Hara. Co-starred with Kitty Carlisle in the Broadway smash hit Anniversary Waltz, he now lives off the fat of the land with a superb French cook quartered in his kitchen.

Back in the pantry, under the truffles, escargots and pate de fois gras is a fifty-pound tin of peanut butter. He still likes it.

a love song in a nightclub with the tears running down my face. Because I'd lost a love that was very important to me. I told myself I'd given that love everything. I told myself I'd never love again." In her dressingroom she'd picked up a letter in the cherished handwriting. Unsuspecting, she opened it. The blow fell on a wholly vulnerable heart. George felt the whole thing had been a big fat mistake. It wasn't her fault, she'd been swell, he was sorry, and couldn't they be friends?

In the midst of her crumbling world came a knock at the door. "Ready, Miss Day?" Like a puppet on strings, she walked out to do her job, and did it—after a fashion. The audience stirred uneasily as a sob caught in her throat, the blue eyes welled and the tears flowed while she sang This Love Of Mine to the bitter end.

In four weeks she lost ten pounds. It was a crushed and miserable girl who returned to Hollywood, got rid of the trailer, moved to the Roosevelt Hotel. She and George had agreed on no divorce yet. Lawyers cost money. Neither contemplated re-marriage. Maybe deep down a spark of hope still lived. If so, it flickered too feebly to lighten her grief.

ONE DAY AL LEVY called her. "Meet me at nine tomorrow. We're due at Warners—"

"What for?"

"To see Mike Curtiz about a movie—"

"You're crazy, Al—"

"So I'm crazy, so meet me anyway—"

When you have an agent, you go along with his notions, crazy or otherwise. She was grateful to Al. With Marty Melcher and Dick Dorso, he owned Century Artists and from "Sentimental Journey" on, he'd been a Day booster. Because he believed in her, she signed with him, and his opening gun was an effort to sell her to Bob Hope. "Never heard of her," said Bob. "You will," Levy assured him. "When I do," cracked Robert, "bring her around." It would have been great to sing on the Hope show. Any job would be welcome. But movies! Movies took people who looked like Hedy LaMarr, who could act like Bette Davis. This would have been a laugh if she'd felt like laughing.

Meanwhile Mike Curtiz brooded over a snarl called Romance On The High Seas. With visions of borrowing Betty Hutton, he'd sent her the script. She called back to rave. "We're in business, Mike." Ten minutes later her agent called, unnerved. "I don't know, maybe she's got a hole in the head. Why?! Because she's pregnant. Till her baby comes, she couldn't work for a king. Including you." Wherefore Mike held his throbbing head in his hands. A million-dollar musical needs a million-dollar star. If not Hutton, then who? His buzzer rang. "Al Levy's here to see you with a girl singer."

"Tell him I'm busy."

For two hours he knocked himself out getting nowhere, then decided that food might generate an idea. In the outer office Levy jumped up. "Mike, this is Doris Day."

"Not now," he started, but there the girl stood, so he looked. In his own words: "A look costs you nothing. Often it pays much. I am used to artificial girls with lips rouged. This one looks nice and real. Her hair has a western windblown something. She also looks sad. I like her. I invite them inside. I ask her about experience. Usually, you listen for an hour how they understudied Cornell, how they just missed a Broadway hit. 'Nothing,' she says. 'In school, when I was nine years old, I played a duck.' Out of my eye I see Levy starts to sweat, he thinks she doesn't sell me but her honesty sells me. She is sexy, too, but in an unsexy way. Her sex sneaks up on you. 'If you feel sad,' I say, 'sing me a sad song.' She sings a song not so sad, "Embraceable You." The voice is good, but the heart is everything. I tell them, 'We'll test.' "

The tests run, he communed with himself in the dark projection room. "Mike, you need courage. Go ahead and gamble with the company's million dollars." But he staked his own reputation, too, by putting her under personal contract—a contract later sold to Warner Brothers.

WITHIN TWO WEEKS Doris was facing the cameras. To her, the whole business seemed unreal. She'd written her mother about the tests. "I don't know what'll happen, but I'm not going to worry. If it's meant to be, it will be." Such was her state of confusion that, phoning a few days later, she was about to hang up when Mom asked, "What about the movies?"

"Oh, I forgot. I signed a seven-year contract."

Which doesn't mean that she underrated her fabulous break. But a seven-year contract, with options, sounds grander than it is, since the studio can drop you at the end of any six months. Not till Romance and its fresh young singing star hit with a major wallop, did Doris feel any security under her feet. And once the rains came, they fell in a golden deluge. "It's Magic" climbed and crossed the million mark. Bob Hope called Levy. "Why didn't you tell me about Doris Day?"

"You wouldn't listen."

"Well, I'm listening now."

"Now it'll cost you."

"Now she's worth it," groaned Hope, and Doris became featured vocalist on his show. Three years after Curtiz took his calculated plunge, she entered the magic circle of Hollywood's ten top moneymakers.

Her professional triumphs are written in the history of records and radio, in a roll call of pictures down through Calamity Jane and Lucky Me. The coming of Terry and Mom eased her private hurts. In the warmth of home created by her mother, she was at last living under the same roof with her six-year-old, and her first objective was to woo him without disturbing his closeness to the Nana they both loved. Nana helped. When, by long habit, he turned to her, she'd refer him elsewhere. "Whatever your mother says is right." As for Doris, she took it step by patient step, respected his individuality, refrained from over-demonstraton, grinned "Hi!" when she wanted to cry "Darling!" One day he popped in with a skinned knee and ran to her, instead of Nana, for comfort. She bathed the knee, kissed him, sent him out to play and sat smiling to herself like a freckled mandarin.

But mother and son, however dear, couldn't fill her life. A career certainly couldn't. "When you're not married," she stated flatly, "you're lonely." To escape loneliness, she took a brief spin on the Hollywood merry-go-round, and dropped off with the taste of ashes in her mouth. Financial security wasn't happiness, success bore no relation to peace. These she found through two men. One had been her husband, one was her husband-to-be.

She met George to discuss their divorce, which wasn't filed till eighteen months after they separated. As they talked, she watched him with growing wonder. He was a man with quiet eyes who had exchanged tensions for serenity, irresolution for strength. "Something has happened to you!"

"Yes," he agreed. "Would you like me to tell you about it?"

His way toward inner harmony had led through Christian Science. In that crucial hour, he revealed a new attitude of the spirit which she'd never thought possible to him. At first she listened incredulously, then with mounting eagerness. He told her where to go for guidance. Before long the philosophy of Christian Science captured her, gave her life fresh meaning. Everyone seeks his own road to God. Through one channel or another, Doris' questing soul would have found hers in the end. She found it sooner because of George Weidler.

"Some day I'll meet the right man," she prophesied, "and he won't be a man who smites me off my feet. I've been smitten!"

MARTY MELCHER didn't smite her, nor did she perform any like service for him. Transacting most of her business with Al Levy, she'd seen his partner around—tall, dark, withdrawn—reportedly heading for divorce from Patti Andrews. Too bad, thought Doris, and dismissed it, a girl who's all for minding her own affairs.

The first date wasn't a date. To Melcher, it loomed as a pain in the neck. "I've been called out of town," Levy told him. "Will you take Doris Day to her broadcast tonight, see that everything goes smoothly?" Hooked, Marty canceled his plans as any agent must for a profitable client, saw the job through, prepared to drive the girl home. "I'm hungry," she said, without ulterior motive. "I'm hungry," is her theme song. Day or night, she craves food as though she'd been starved from birth.

They stopped in for a snack. Under her native friendliness, Marty thawed a little. He found this blonde Miss Huckleberry Finn (as she'd been tagged by her fans) easy to talk to. He found himself wanting to talk to her again, so he asked her to dinner. As dates multiplied and Hollywood linked their names, both scoffed, "It's just business." Maybe they thought so. Maybe, having been burned, they pushed away tenderer possibilities. Maybe they were just kidding themselves. In any case, Doris began leaning on him for services beyond the call of duty. "Marty, can you come over? The faucet's leaking." Mom started timing meals for his arrival. Terry shoved his chair so close that the other could barely bend an elbow. "What are you doing that for?" Doris asked.

"Because I like him."

According to Mom, it was the family doctor who opened her eyes. "Cardiac condition there," he commented, as fair head and dark vanished into the den with papers to sign. "And a good thing, too. He's the sort she ought to marry."

"Marry? Why, he's here on business!"

"I bet!" chuckled the medic.

THE ROOTS of trust and friendship grew deep before love flowered—or before they acknowledged it to the world. "We're not engaged," caroled Dodo. "Nobody planned, nobody promised anything. We're just in love. We're just going to be married as soon as we can." This announcement was preceded by a confab with Terry. You don't bring husbands into a boy's home without finding out how the boy stands, as if Doris didn't know. That night he opened the door to Marty with a flour-ish and spoke the words of the pure in heart. "Welcome, my intended father!"

Her decree became final in June, 1950, his the following February. Waiting till she finished On Moonlight Bay, they picked her birthday, April 3, for sentimental reasons, and a Burbank justice of the peace to tie the knot simply. If Mom hadn't shooed them out, they'd have skipped a honeymoon trip altogether. Lured by home and Terry, they docked it to a couple of days. Once formalities could be cleared, Marty adopted Doris' son as his own. Terry couldn't be bothered with formalities. The day after the wedding, he wrote his new name large and proud on his spelling paper.

This is the sound marriage Doris hungered for in her teens and at last achieved. Gone is the fever. They're homebodies, confining their social activities to a circle of intimates. "When you don't drink, know any gossip or care about hearing same, what's to do at a party?" she demands.

"I've had it," he counterpoints. "I'd rather look at my wife in blue jeans than any showgirl in sequins, and no entertainer can top Terry for my dough." Any man and wife must make adjustments to each other. Urbane, articulate Marty sticks them where they belong. "If you're adult, minor differences don't annoy you. It's the old story of the toothpaste cap. If it's off, let it stay off. Who cares?"

Both offer capsule explanations of their happiness. Says Melcher: "The principle behind marriage is closeness. Doris and I have a talent for staying close. She insists on it and I like it."

Says Doris: "He's my understanding husband and my favorite friend."

He's her boss now, too. In June she starts Yankee Doodle Girl for Martin Melcher Productions, releasing through Warner Brothers. There's a segment of Hollywood, smaller than you think, which enjoys sniping. Behind their hands they buzz that Doris got him the job, refusing to sign a new contract otherwise. As anyone who knows Melcher will confirm, this is the bunk. An astute operator long before Day ever dawned on his horizon, he has neither the need nor the make-up to ride anywhere on anybody's coattails. He's a solid citizen and Warners got as good as they gave.

MUCH HAS also been made of her recent illness. It was quite simple. Like thousands of women yearly, she underwent surgery for the removal of a benign tumor. Till the tissue is analyzed, benignancy can't be 100% determined. We daresay other thousands suffered just such an emotional shock as hers. Not being movie stars, the limelight left them to deal with their nerves in private. For Doris, still another complicating factor entered. Her faith advocates healing through prayer. Doctors insisted on surgery. In the end she bowed to their judgment, but the conflict tore at her. If during this period, Marty stood like a bulldog between her and the curious, what husband wouldn't? If she conserved her energy while making Lucky Me, she showed great good sense. On April 3 they celebrated her birthday and their third anniversary at Palm Springs, and Doris splurged on six evening gowns, indicating that her health and spirits are fine. On which pleasant note, it's pleasant to leave her.

With one added word. Life has given her plenty, including a bunch of hard knocks. Good luck never spoiled her; bad luck never soured her. Through both she kept her vision of warmth, clung to the human and ethical values which are richer than stardom. It happens in glamourland as elsewhere, but you've got to be equipped.

Marilyn was quite enthusiastic about this and Potter posed her with a Dalmatian dog and then dressed her in a farmerette's outfit and photographed her sitting on a bale of straw. He worked with another photographer, Bob Farr. He brought both Marilyn and the color photos to my office and asked if I might be interested in helping her.

When Marilyn first walked into my office and saw the bulletin boards plastered with magazine covers, she grew breathless and excited.

"Those are the prettiest girls I've ever seen," she said. "Do you think I could ever, ever, get my picture on a magazine cover?"

"Of course," I said. "You're a natural."

Actually, Marilyn was so naive, so sweet, and so eager to succeed that my heart went out to her at once.

I told her that tuition for a three-month instruction period in the school cost $100. I saw the look of disappointment well up in Marilyn's eyes.

"But you don't have to worry about that," I quickly added. "You can work out the tuition."

Then I began to interview the girl and jot down her measurements. In 1945, according to my records, she was a size twelve with a thirty-six-inch bust, twenty-four-inch waist, and thirty-five-inch hips. Her age I estimated at seventeen or eighteen.

Her hair is listed as "California blonde" which means that it is dark in the winter and light in the summer. I recall that it curled very close to her head, and was quite unmanageable. I knew at once that it would have to be bleached and worked on.

I asked Marilyn about her background and she confessed (again shyly), "I sing a little. That's all." She had no ambition at the time to become an actress, unless, of course, it was a secret desire.

She did have a pleasant personality, what we call an All-American girl kind of personality—cute, wholesome and respectable. There was no sultry sexiness about her except that her clothes were a little too tight across the chest. That sex build-up was to come much later, although I did realize immediately that Marilyn would never do as a fashion model.

Most fashion models are tall, sophisticated-looking and slim-chested. Marilyn was none of these.

The first day Marilyn attended classes, I knew she would do all right, because she aroused the good nature in people. She would walk in and in her cute, high voice say, "Hello, everybody." And everybody would answer, "Hello." There was something arresting and sincere about the girl's personality.

When I introduced her to a photographer, she would look him straight in the eye and cling to his every word. She was sincerely eager. She made everyone she talked to feel as if he were the only guy in the world. She did this naturally without design or premeditation. It's still her way. She's not obsessed with herself.

A week after Marilyn enrolled in my school, a steel company called and asked for a hostess at the industrial show, a girl to be pleasant and hand out programs. The salary was ten dollars a day for nine days.

I gave the job to Marilyn. The report came back that she was excellent. When the child was paid off, you know what she did? She gave me the whole ninety dollars. Took nothing out for carfare or meals or

"This," she said, "will take care of most of my tuition."

I knew at once that Marilyn was a fair and honest and very fine girl, and I decided to get her as much work as I possibly could. I sent her out to audition for some Montgomery Ward catalogue work. She didn't make the grade, but she wasn't discouraged.

"Maybe I'll do better next time." That's what she said, and those words really typified her spirit. It was upbeat all the way.

On several occasions I gleaned that all wasn't going too well between her and her husband. He had come home from an overseas trip and discovered that Marilyn wasn't the child he'd married. They probably had arguments, but Marilyn never discussed any of her personal problems.

As a youngster she'd been kicked around so much, sent from one orphanage to another, one foster home to another, that I guess she developed self-sufficiency. I've always admired her for that.

Most girls who attend my classes come with their mothers. They have someone behind them, someone to drive them to different jobs, a father to protect and oversee things. Marilyn had no one. Only herself.

I guess it was because of this that I took a strong interest in the girl. I concentrated on her. She gobbled up every bit of instruction. She was wonderful on hand positions, body positions, and simply great when it came to make-up. But I just couldn't do anything with her fashion modeling, probably because of her cute figure and her walk.

When Marilyn walks her knees lock. She's double-jointed in the knees. So she can't relax and that is why her hips seem to sway when she stalks into a room.

Even after 20th Century-Fox signed her and gave her further instruction, the child couldn't fashion model. I saw her when the studio loaned her out to model in a benefit fashion show at the Ambassador, and she still couldn't make it. This was in 1948.

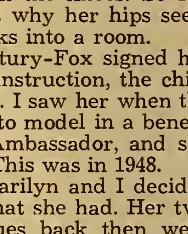
In 1946, however, Marilyn and I decided to do the best with what she had. Her two great photogenic virtues back then were her "cutie" figure and her face.

The photographers liked her. When they got an order from an advertising agency, they tried to work Marilyn into the pictures at twenty-five dollars a day.

Some of her first pictures with me were taken on location. Her hair was so frizzy that the photographer covered it with a bathing cap. The bathing suit pictures were sold to some Canadian magazines.

Marilyn's first cover was sold to Family Circle. For this cover, Marilyn was posed in a pinafore holding a little lamb. Practically nothing of her figure was shown.

IT HAPPENED TO ME



On the first day of my new job at the famed Hotel Del Monte, I was more than surprised to hear screaming and shrieking. I stepped around the corner to see what was going on and got belted in the face with a pillow. With a breathless apology Burgess Meredith and Paulette Goddard continued their pillow fight all the way down the plush corridor. I stood there, laughing with them while they enjoyed their honeymoon.

Ernest L. Poncetta
Salinas, California

I also got her photographic jobs posing as an airline hostess and an airline passenger. The Douglas Aircraft people thought she was just fine. At this time Marilyn was working under the names of Norma Jean, Jean Norman, and Jean Dougherty.

Her husband had gone back overseas, and several men were trying to date her. But Marilyn wouldn't go out with any of them. Many of my other girls whose husbands were overseas dated several nights in the week. But not Marilyn.

When photographers offered to drive her home after a sitting, she'd hold up her key ring, jingle it, and say cutely, "I've got my own transportation." By that time she'd earned enough money to buy a jalopy.

But I still couldn't get her to bleach her hair and have it straightened. Marilyn knew that once she started the process she would have to keep it up, and she wondered where the money would come from.

"Look, darling," I told her, "if you really intend to go places in this business, you've just got to bleach and straighten your hair, because now your face is a little too round and a hair job will lengthen it. Don't worry about money. I'll keep you working."

A few weeks later a photographer named Raphael Wolff got an order for a shampoo ad. He hired Marilyn with the understanding that she would do something about her hair. "I'll pay for everything," he said.

Marilyn was a stickler for naturalness and was still against any change in her hair styling. But she finally gave in when we all explained that blondes were more in demand photographically because they could be photographed light, medium or dark, depending upon the amount of light directed on them, whereas Marilyn's hair always photographed more dark than light.

We sent Marilyn to Hollywood hair stylists Frank and Joseph who did their best. First a straight permanent to make the hair more manageable, then a regular permanent at the ends after shaping. Then the hair was bleached and Marilyn emerged the golden blonde you know today.

From this point, she went into her bathing suit stage, and the demand for her was simply terrific. She averaged, I should say, $150 a week, and men began talking to her about going into "the motion picture game."

One afternoon I got a phone call from the Howard Hughes office. Hughes at the time was recovering from a plane crash. He wanted to know the name of the cover girl on Laff magazine. I told him and then called the columnists and told them to announce that Howard Hughes was on the road to complete recovery. He had his weather eye open again.

She asked if she should accept any of the offers concerning movie tests, and I said, "Before you do any movie work, I'm going to see that you get an agent who really knows the business." I sent Marilyn to Helen Ainsworth, a fine agent, and on my recommendation Helen signed her.

Helen sent her out to read at 20th Century-Fox. A color test was shot of Marilyn on the set of Mother Wore Tights. Darryl Zanuck looked at it and said, "This girl may have possibilities. Let's sign her."

She was signed the next day at seventy-five dollars a week. That's the true story of how Marilyn Monroe got into motion pictures. All those rumors that producers fell in love with her, that Johnny Hyde of the William Morris office greased her way, and all the other ridiculous rumors about how she got her start are simply not true.

It was her photographic modeling that brought Marilyn know-how, attention and a screen contract. Unlike several other girls I know, the screen contract did not go to her head. She was the same sweet, unassuming girl she had always been.

❷ Next, use short, light upward strokes of the Maybelline Eyebrow Pencil, to form beautiful, expressive brows. Taper lightly at outer end. Soften effect with fingertip.

❸ Apply smooth Maybelline Mascara from base to tips of lashes, brushing upward. (Hold a few seconds to set "up-swoop.") For an extra touch of mysterious eye beauty, blend a bit of Maybelline Eye Shadow on upper lid.

PUTTERING PEEPERS

Meet Wally Cox: creator of Mr. Peepers*—and a lot of other things!*

1. Whenever there's a story about my wanting to get married I get a flood of mail like "Dear Mr. Peepers, I am 19 years old and divorced and have three children."

2. I use the sink mostly for cooling off silver after I solder it. I made some tea, so far, and a can of soup once, vegetable. I'm generally invited out where I can't say no.

3. As a kid I liked to carve; darts, a flat baseball bat. I never have any fear of trying to make something. I make mistakes but I sort of learn by elimination.

4. Many sensitive people have been bewildered out of doing what they'd be good at by beard strokers who say you won't be any good until you're as old as they are.

5. I started out to make a set of silver of 12 of everything. I'll probably chicken out at six. After a few years of woodcarving I picked up some metal and I just puttered.

6. I made this Shepherd's Pipe out of a plain piece of bamboo with little holes cut out. There was a guy at the Village Vanguard who made them. I asked him how.

7. I'm making shoes . . . to have them made would take 16 weeks. That's flying in the face of Providence, hoping you'll be alive. I get the imprint of my feet on a latex mat

8. While I'm working I confine myself to practical daydreaming—what it'll be like if I get to go on that expedition next summer to the south Pacific to collect fish she'd worked with—a good thing, because the screen contract didn't last long and Marilyn had to take up modeling again. She posed for calendar art and sometimes calendars take a long time to get published. Four Earl Moran photographs of Marilyn are appearing on the 1954 Brown and Bigelow calendars. These were shot years ago.

Marilyn divorced her husband. She went to Las Vegas to see someone she referred to as "auntie" and stayed six weeks. When she came back she had her freedom.

It was only after that period that she began going around with Johnny Hyde. Marilyn has led a scrupulous life. She has made her own breaks without benefit of powerful relatives or friends.

She has always believed in work, believed so much, in fact, that unwittingly she antagonized several of the more jealous girls who were in studio classes with her. They just couldn't believe that any beginner was willing to work as hard as Marilyn did in order to get ahead.

Marilyn did everything she was told to do at the studio. She devoured every crumb of instruction. Usually late to most functions, she was the first to attend classes and the last to leave.

Studio photographers did wonders with Marilyn's nose. When publicity stills first came out on my ex-student, I was sure that a little plastic surgery had been done on her nose. It seemed to photograph smaller than it used to.

Photographers who had shot Marilyn said the same thing. Their photographs of her in 1945 had been rejected by magazines because "Marilyn's nose was too large and her smile too high." By smiling too deeply, Marilyn was accentuating the lines around her nose, thus highlighting what was not a very good nose—too broad and too curvy.

I've made many inquiries, and the truth is that Marilyn still has the nose she was born with. She's not happy with it and has talked from time to time about altering it. But as yet she's done nothing about it.

Cameramen at the studio say it gives them no trouble since Marilyn has learned how to bring her smile down and concentrate on her lower lip. I'm glad she's mastered this trick because I was the first one who suggested she do exactly that.

Nowadays when Marilyn poses for photographers the accent is usually on her figure, not her nose. But it wouldn't surprise me if she submitted to plastic surgery.

By nature Marilyn is a perfectionist, an open-minded learner. I think that accounts for the improvement in her wardrobe. It used to be charged that Marilyn had no taste in clothes, that she was overdressed. It was true and the reason was that she had so few clothes to begin with. As soon as she got a little money she indulged herself, bought frilly dresses with yards and yards of pleated material.

It's certainly understandable. The boy who's never had enough ice cream buys too much when he can afford it.

Students who know that Marilyn Monroe is my prize graduate occasionally ask me if there is any possibility of their "getting the same breaks Marilyn Monroe got."

My answer to that one is, "What breaks?"

Marilyn Monroe, I tell them, is a self-made success. Of course, she's endowed with charm, personality and a provocative figure, but thousands of girls are similarly endowed. What most of them lack Marilyn has in spades—persistence and fortitude.

These are two requisites for any person who wants to crash Hollywood. This is no town for the weak, the weary or the easily-defeated. END

...relieves dryness

no time for tears

(Continued from page 29) and bone-grafting had failed. Still two months short of her twenty-first birthday, Suzan fought back hysteria and told herself that her most important job was to have no truck with self-pity, and to try to make sense, and even happiness, out of her life as she would now have to live it. And this is the victory of Suzan Ball. She has baited the future with new and deeper interests, and has gotten exciting nibbles in return.

IT WASN'T EASY. Suzan was presumably convalescing when her physician, Dr. Francis Engleman, told her that the condition of the leg made amputation imperative and no time was to be lost. Dick was at her bedside when the surgeon made his report before leaving for the night. When another doctor confirmed the diagnosis, Suzan telephoned Dr. Engleman and told him he could operate in the morning if he wished.

Then she and Dick looked at each other.

"Do you want to talk about it?" he asked.

"No," said Suzan.

"Then let's don't," he said.

He reached for a deck of cards and began to deal gin rummy hands. They played till a nurse came with a sedative.

H. Dale Ball, Suzan's father, who had to give legal consent to the operation since Suzan was not yet twenty-one, had just arrived on her hospital floor early the next morning, when she was wheeled past him on her way to the operating room. She was wrapped in blankets and wore the green skull cap used for surgery patients. He had time only to call her name. She replied, "Hi, Dad! Dig this crazy hat!"

No, it wasn't a bit easy to make all the adjustments. When she came swimming up into full consciousness from the anesthesia to look at Dick, and to realize that she was an amputee, the thrust of proud girlhood (or she admits it might just have been desperation) caused her to say:

"Dick, it's over. I don't expect you to marry me now. You don't have to."

He stared at her for a moment as if she were a stranger—and she wondered if she were going to be. Then he spoke calmly. "You're an idiot," he said.

He told her that he had fallen in love with her and not with her leg. These weren't just words. Suzan was on crutches the first time he ever saw her, when they met in the commissary at Universal-International nearly two years ago. Her knee, injured in a dance rehearsal, was refusing to heal, and when he asked her what was wrong she told him cancer was suspected.

It was a disconcerting that won his fullest admiration for its honesty. It was one of the things he reminded her of at the hospital when he declared the operation would make no difference in their relationship. There were other reasons, which had their basis in their feelings about each other and which need not be repeated here, but when they had finished talking it was clearly established that their life together was just beginning, not ending.

SUZAN KNEW that her job from then until the date of their wedding was to regain her strength, attend rehabilitation school and learn to walk again—with an artificial leg—and to match her physical improvement with a proper mental attitude. But there was one thing she hadn't anticipated when she began to appear in public on crutches. People stared. And Suzan burned.

Eventually, she asked the advice of Boni Buehler, the airline hostess who became a double amputee when she fell off a speed boat at Lake Arrowhead last year and got afoul of the craft's propeller. Suzan met her at the rehabilitation school.

"What do you do when you catch people staring at you?" Suzan asked.

"There is nothing you can do to stop them," Boni said. "Your job is to ignore them—to make sure you don't see them staring."

It seemed like no advice at all and yet she found in time that it was possible to blind herself to such rudeness.

SUZAN HAD imagined that the process of being measured for an artificial leg and being trained in its use, would be a phase of her life into which Dick would not enter. But that is not the way it worked out. It was not the way it should work out, they both realized. Dick surprised her by his interest in her training. He went to the school with her and took her to the prosthetic company where the artificial limb was to be made. On one of these visits, he gave Suzan's morale a tremendous boost. An attendant passed by and Dick whispered to Suzan that he was sure this man was an amputee.

Suzan looked at the fellow who walked smoothly and, even while she watched, scooted rapidly up some stairs. She could see no indication at all that Dick was right, and she said so. Dick promptly called another attendant and asked him about the man in question.

"Hasn't that fellow got an artificial leg?"

"Oh, him?" came the reply. "He's got both of them off!"

Later they talked to the double amputee, a war veteran, and he sent her off with a Especially being a dancer and so graceful. You won't have any trouble at all."

"How did you know about him?" Suzan asked Dick later

He looked at her, half incredulous. "Why, I've been watching for amputees and I'm probably an expert at telling when I see one now," he told her. "I love to see them going about their business and their life like nothing has happened as you and I will go about ours."

They did go about their business. They talked about their wedding plans, their honeymoon, the sort of house they wanted. One would expect a sad note to creep into their talk, but the reverse was generally true. This spirit spread to their friends and made for warmer relationships.

When Suzan did get her artificial leg, both she and Dick felt oddly as if it were an increase in their family even before their marriage. They decided to christen the leg. It is now known as Throckmorton.

In various ways Throckmorton is beginning to develop a personality of his own. He has the tremors occasionally; he has a tendency to reveal himself in immodest proportions and in full gait he has a wicked swagger. More delicately fashioned than most people realize, he refuses to be forced into his duties but responds quickly and gracefully when the persuasion is smooth and rhythmical. Suzan had to learn all these things before she could trust herself to Throckmorton at the wedding. That she did learn them became known to the whole country through the news pictures of the event.

Guests at the wedding, incidentally, may have noted that they heard none of the traditional music. No "Because" or "I Love You Truly." Suzan and Dick had asked their old friend, Bert Barton, who plays at one of their favorite haunts in the valley, to play songs they had always loved: "Birth Of The Blues," "My Funny Valentine," the love theme from Romeo And Juliet and "Che Gelida Manina" from La Boheme.

They decided, too, that only a "no walk" honeymoon would be sensible for them, meaning that they would not go where it would be necessary to walk around to see the sights. It seemed wiser to choose resorts they could reach and leave by car with no need to promenade in between.

"For one thing, it would be silly for us to spend money right now," said Suzan, "since we are planning to buy a house and no place on earth would be as interesting to us as our own place. So why, really, go anywhere?"

For the new house Suzan will be ready with some new furniture, some left to her by her grandmother, including an eighteenth century wall clock, and a crowded apartment full of presents. One of the first wedding gifts to arrive was a pair of Steuben glass dishes from Ann Blyth and Dr. James McNulty, who wrote: "With love and all good wishes for a lifetime of happiness together."

In addition to her rehabilitation course, and a physical buildup program supervised by her nurse, Mrs. Kaye Biddle (also her matron of honor), Suzan assumed the job of personally writing the hundreds of messages and thank-you notes necessary. But the Thursday before the weekend of her marriage she wasn't one letter behind. "And I don't want to be because I want nothing on my mind on my wedding day but my wedding," she announced.

Suzan had her engagement ring only a few weeks before she became Dick's wife. It took so long to get it because he had gone to special pains to have an unusual objet d'art designed. It consisted of two separate platinum bands connected by a diamond, and with a space left open between the bands into which the wedding ring fitted. The wedding ring itself was platinum with sapphire baguettes.

At noon on her wedding day, with the wedding set for four o'clock, the calmness which had won praise from everyone suddenly left Suzan.

"I'm terribly nervous. I don't know what to do," she told her nurse and her mother, Mrs. Marleah Ball.

"Do you think it is really nerves or just stage fright?"

It was just stage fright. At the appointed hour Suzan was at the church getting into her wedding gown, a creation designed by Bill Thomas. It was made of rose point lace (imported from France) over ruffled petticoats of pink chiffon. This had been delivered by special Cadillac from the studio, since it could neither be folded nor compressed in any way, much less packed.

In the church when Suzan began her walk down the aisle on the arm of her father, were relatives and close friends from the studio. Among the guests were Julia Adams, Lori Nelson, Barbara Rush, Mala Powers, Jeff Chandler, Tony Curtis, Jeff Hunter, Rock Hudson and many more of Hollywood's younger set.

Outside there were more than 500 people. But these, too, heard the ceremony because of the foresight of the minister, Rev. Paul M. Gamons. Under the satin pillow at the altar he had placed a microphone which connected with a loud speaker outside. Besides that, he tape-recorded the rites as a surprise gift for the pair.

Dick's younger brother, Philip Long, was best man. Another brother, Robert, and Marshall Thompson, who is Dick's brother-in-law, were the ushers.

When the ceremony was over and Suzan came walking up the aisle on the arm of her new husband, her old studio friend who had said everybody should have cheered instead of wept, divulged an extraordinary bit of news.

"She didn't want anybody to know beforehand, but Suzan has had her artificial leg only six days," she said. "Everyone from her doctor to her milkman warned her not to do this. That's why she got nervous today. They didn't reckon on her spirit. Look at her!"

Everybody was looking at her. When she got outside the crowd did exactly what the woman from the studio had thought fitting. They cheered and broke into spontaneous applause. An hour later, Suzan entertained a small group of guests at a dinner party. Her surgeon, Dr. Engleman, gave an impromptu piano concert. Suzan sang. There was constant bright chatter with everyone recalling little incidents about the ceremony or coming up with belated pieces of information. Two of these were especially interesting to Suzan.

Somebody commented that they liked the way her hair curled on her forehead. Suzan beamed and said she was rewarded for fooling with her curls all week to get them to fall just right.

Someone else said that a part in a picture once offered to her, the role of an Indian girl in The Long Hunters by Robert Buckner, was still open. Suzan got excited and waved a hand to show her enthusiasm. "Keep that open for me until I get back from my honeymoon," she cried. "Because I'm still interested!" END

sheree north

"I hope you change your mind," he said, identifying himself, and talking her out of her telephone number.

Obviously Sheree North did change her mind. She's still dancing, more sensationally than ever. In fact, right now Sheree is the hottest new discovery in Hollywood. She has a juicy contract with Twentieth Century-Fox and a bright new career ahead. But of course a lot of things happened to Sheree in between.

First, Bob Alton talked her into ditching shorthand for the Broadway show, Hazel Flagg, in which Sheree's "Salome" dance shook the street from stem to stern. Since Hazel Flagg started from an old Hollywood movie, Nothing Sacred, naturally it came back home as Living It Up—and so did Sheree. Then Bing Crosby, faced with hopping up his TV debut, saw her shake 'em-and-break 'em dance with Martin and Lewis and decided what he could use was a dash of Sheree.

So, one night last January, with practically the entire USA looking on, the North wind blew up a storm. Dressed in a sexy leotard with fringe on the flaps, Sheree steamed up a million screens with movements that could have landed her in the paddy-wagon back when mother was a girl. That night the toll on picture tubes everywhere was terrific. But next day in Hollywood reactions were mixed.

Bing Crosby's office was swamped with calls demanding to know what ever got under his hairpiece to let a dynamite doll like that steal his show and turn it into a hoochie-cooch. But in the office of an agent named Henry Willson pandemonium of a different sort reigned. Every studio in town was screaming for Sheree North.

The one which screamed loudest—and bid highest—was Twentieth Century-Fox, for a special and urgent reason: Another sexy blonde had just walked away from Pink Tights to marry Joe DiMaggio and romp away to Korea, leaving an aching, glamourless void.

Dancing or standing still, Sheree is the type to make old men young and young men glad they aren't older. She stacks up a perfect 35-23-35 under her platinum mop, tip-tilted nose and chameleon green eyes that change with the weather. Right now the climate is extremely agreeable to Sheree because for the first time in her life she's got a solid future for herself and some home life with her baby girl. She never dreamed her legs would bring all this about, and she wears an expression of permanent surprise about what's happened where. Because Sheree has been around Hollywood for a long, long time. She was born there twenty-one years ago last January 17, in an apartment on Heliotrope near Melrose, almost in the shadow of Paramount studios. That was just as the sun was cracking through in the east.

"I guess that's why Mother named me Dawn," says the girl who started life as Dawn Bethel. There are other family matters, too, that Sheree has had to guess about all these years. Her father left her mother before her arrival and Sheree still doesn't know what her dad looked like, where he came from, what he did for a living, or even his first name.

With no father to guide her and the Great Depression at rock bottom, little Dawn Bethel didn't cut her teeth on a silver spoon. Her mother, June, had to work hard to support Dawn and her half-sister and brother, Janet and Don. Luckily, June knew a trade—jewelry appraising and designing. But there weren't many loose jewels lying around back in the Thirties, so she pieced out with practical nursing. At times they lived on relief.

Dawn and the other kids were left in the charge of her Grandmother Shoard, a doughty Scotchwoman. Keeping track of three scampering kids around Hollywood was enough to force any elderly lady to her wits' end, but Dawn complicated matters by changing her name almost every week. Because Dawn and brother Don resulted in household confusion, her ma fastened "Shirley Mae" to her youngest, who promptly rebelled.

"Even as a kid I thought that name was strictly from Dixie," groans Sheree, "so I tried a lot of others. It drove the teachers at Melrose Elementary School wild. They used to call home and ask if I had a split personality." Sheree re-christened herself "Cookie," "Emma" and "Bubbles" and a dozen more before she finally hit on Sheree North, which she likes best of all. "It just sort of sounds like me," she says, "and it's simple and easy to say. To date, nobody has associated her chosen name with the Arctic regions, either.

But, by any name, it would take a seventh son of a seventh son to predict that the skinny, eternally sunsuited, barefoot tomboy would ever grow up to dance right in when Marilyn Monroe swished out. A better guess would have been that she'd replace Tarzan. "Cookie" Bethel was rough, tough and hard to bluff. At five she used to shinny up the parkway trees and leap on the backs of surprised passers-by, scaring them silly. The cops around the Hollywood precinct soon knew what a distress call from Avocado Street meant; that snub-nosed Bethel kid had run off again. Usually they found her before midnight, off on some harmless adventure. But one time they took her to the station house.

That was when her cousin Harold got an Indian tepee for his birthday and decided it was so beautiful he'd just live in it. Sheree went along with the idea enthusiastically, swiped some frankfurters from home and trooped off into the Hollywood Hills to change residence. Things were going swell up in the brush. They found a dinky cave and pitched the tent nearby. A campfire was roaring and the weenies were sizzling. "Some old square who lived down below spotted us," Sheree hobos going to break in his house and called the cops." A squad showed up with sirens and searchlights and apprehended the squatters, who knew from their favorite gangster movies just what to do.

"Don't squeal!" hissed Harold.

"Me—sing?" shot back Sheree scornfully. So there was nothing to do but haul the tight-lipped pair down to the pokey and book them. Hardly had that escapade blown over before Sheree was in hot water again. This time she saw a cute Pekingese dog that belonged to a lady down the block, whistled it home and kept it. This brought the law down again, but Sheree wasn't cowed. Instead, with a curious sense of justice she rounded up her gang and picketed the rightful owner's house with signs which read, "UNFAIR TO CHILDREN AND DOGS."

After a run of episodes like those Mrs. Bethel grasped at any sort of straw to reroute her daughter into more ladylike channels. Sheree's artistic debut was nothing sensational; she was a blackbird in a pie at a grade school affair. (Sheree's platinum hair, by the way, is strictly out of a bottle—the real stuff is coal black.) Even that tiny taste of applause gave her ideas. It got so they couldn't take her to any kind of show because she'd break loose and join the act. Embarrassed, her mother offered to arrange dancing lessons if she'd lay off that sort of thing, and at six, she enrolled in the Falcon Dance Studios in Hollywood. There Ralph Falconer and his wife, Edith Jane, spotted talent and taught her to dance—even though Sheree and her mother had to paint, wax floors and help sweep out the studio for tuition. She never missed a lesson, hiking there after school and sometimes hitch-hiking because the Bethels moved all around. By the time she was nine, Sheree was sharp as a tack on ballet, acrobatic, eccentric and tap. Then, in the USO troupe which Edith Jane organized, Sheree sprang a sensation.

For her first bit of something for the boys Sheree danced out on a slippery floor in a skimpy costume, pirouetting daintily until her feet suddenly flew out from under her and she lit on her tummy. When she got up the straps holding up her costume had snapped. "I sure got a lot of applause," grinned Sheree.

After that it was amazing how many times little Sheree North had trouble with her costume. Petticoats would fall off, straps snap or buttons pop. Since Sheree was all of ten it was strictly innocent, and, she figures, part of her war effort.

Losing her tutu (little ballet skirt) became the inevitable finale of her dances and it always brought down the house.

All this time, Sheree progressed through a normal course of schooling although it was here and there. In fact, before she left at fifteen Sheree rattled through five public schools and three private ones. This was because her home shifted, but also because Sheree had individualistic ways. At Hollywood High instead of demurely knitting on the gym steps with the rest of the girls, Sheree chased out on the football field and tried to play halfback. The principal didn't approve of that at all and Sheree's stay there was brief.

Her mother's growing jewelry clientele put the Bethel family on a slightly easier street after a while but throughout her girlhood Sheree North had to rustle her own spending money. Her uncle taught her to drive his truck when she was eleven and not long after Sheree was helping a Sunday school boy friend to park cars in a lot near the church. Activities branched out to the Sunset Strip, where the movie stars played at night so Sheree gunned their cars around at the hamburger a night. "I was nuts about Robert Taylor then, and I always hoped I'd see him there," she sighs.

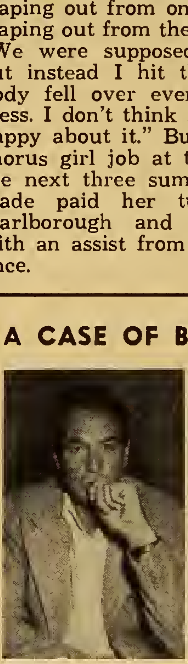
But Sheree made her first big money with her dancing. In her thirteenth summer she decided she was ready to be a professional, but the child labor laws stated otherwise. She didn't let the technicality stop her. With $65 a week at stake, Sheree put on high heels and bought a fake hair fall. Between those two props everything was already convincing. Even at thirteen Sheree was something to see.

So, even though the heels did wobble and the fake hair tumble off when she auditioned for dance director Val Rassette at the Greek Theatre in Griffith Park, he gave her a job. The first night of Rose Marie he thoroughly regretted it.

"I was leading a line of Indian maids leaping out from one wing, to meet a line leaping out from the other," recalls Sheree. "We were supposed to pass each other, but instead I hit them head on. Everybody fell over everybody else. It was a mess. I don't think Mr. Rassette was very happy about it." But Sheree got a steady chorus girl job at the Greek Theatre for the next three summers. The money she made paid her tuition at fashionable Marlborough and Greenbriar schools—with an assist from unemployment insurance.

A CASE OF BUTTERFLIES



In 1944 I was a WAVE stationed at Hunter College in New York. One evening when I was on duty in the officers' mess I was asked to stay late to serve dinner to a celebrity. A few hours later a tall, slender man came in and sat down at a table. I asked him if I could bring him a steak and he replied, "No, thank you, bacon and eggs will be fine. I have to speak in front of five hundred women tonight. That's an experience I've never had and I'm too nervous to eat much!" To my surprise and delight, I recognized the nervous man. It was Gary Cooper!

But she still roller skated home to lunch from work; that is, until a girl friend named Donna bought an old Model-T Ford. They shared the heap's upkeep, and collaborated on reconditioning. Yep, Sheree's a mechanic, too, although she admits, "We sure had a rough time getting the drip-pan off." But once they got the car rolling drastic events followed.

Until she was fourteen Sheree managed to keep free of boy problems. For one thing, she was plenty busy and also more the sweatshirt than the formal type. And after she became a worldly wise chorus girl, the boys her own age skittered away, awed by her glamour. She also thought she had a great crush on Ray Sinatra, Frank's first cousin. "That didn't raise my stock any with the fellows," admits Sheree, "but was I popular with the girls!"

Her heart really fluttered for the first time over a boy named Jimmy at Thomas Star King High, a football player, of course, and "a big, handsome, ruddy Scotch type with sandy hair—on the shy and she stumbled all over him in the outfit she swiped from her sister Janet. Jimmy's mother disapproved of chorus girls and just when Jimmy showed interest he had appendicitis and dropped out for the rest of the term. But about that Model-T and the drastic events—

"Donna had a project at Hermosa Beach and I went along to help. I hid a bathing suit in my notebook—black with white scallops. I made it myself and I looked just like Daisy Mae of Dogpatch."

The project was to wangle an introduction to a dreamboat Donna had spied on the beach. They chugged down and there he was, stepping out of a convertible. But Sheree was not impressed at first. "He looked too much like Jimmy," she says, "and I was on a dark, Latin type kick by then." But she coaxed a policeman to help them meet Donna's guy.

"We met him," says Sheree simply. "I married him."

His name was Fred Bessire, a twenty-five-year-old draftsman who worked for his contractor father, and things got very interesting for Sheree and Fred practically at once. In fact, that same day he asked her—not Donna—for a date, but she declined, loyally. Soon after, Donna gave up and Fred took Sheree out. "The third date I'd ever had in my life," she says. "We went to the Coconut Grove and I ordered salisbury steak and asked for a steak knife—it's just hamburger, you know." At the table Fred popped out a box with his mother's diamond ring in it. "It really laid a bomb with me," Sheree confesses. "I didn't know what was up until he asked me to marry him and then I said, 'Do you know what you're doing—because I sure don't!'" She got so rattled that she told him her real age—fifteen instead of the seventeen she'd fibbed about at first. But Fred said that was okay—they'd elope and keep it secret and she could live home until she was eighteen.

It might have worked. But after the ride to Las Vegas and back that made Sheree Mrs. Frederick Bessire, the secret didn't last long. They forgot about the legal papers, which soon dropped into the mailbox. Sheree's mother saw those and nobody had to tell her they weren't really legal. You can't get married if you lie about your age—even in Nevada. They had to drive back up and do it all over—with parental consent—in the Methodist church with a minister.

But it wasn't all moonlight and roses for Sheree after that. They lived at Fred's folks' and at Sheree's but she kept right on dancing for her living with sometimes bits on the radio and extra work at the movie studios. Almost a year later Sheree felt a little queer and went to see a doctor. "You're going to have a baby," he announced, adding, "any day now." This was a complete surprise to Sheree.

"I just didn't believe it," she says. "I didn't think anyone as young as I was could have a baby." She was practically shanghaied to the maternity home by her mother but remained unconvinced, refusing to take an anesthetic. But the doctor was right. Her daughter Dawn was a real and convincing baby. Five weeks later Sheree was dancing again. This time she had to. She had a child to support.

Her marriage broke up right after that, but because of various court hassles she had to get divorced two separate times. Only last September did Sheree's final decree arrive, and by then Baby Dawn was almost five years old.

Meanwhile, it was all up to Sheree—and for a long time the going was pretty rugged. It isn't much fun for a sixteen-year-old girl to run into disillusion in ter to support. But Sheree has always packed plenty of moxie. She went right to work. Luckily, her family could take care of Dawn while she was away.

She got chorus girl jobs at $50 to $75 a week around Hollywood's night spots. Sheree did whatever came up. She went to Texas to model at the Shamrock Hotel, down to Mexico to pose for a resort advertising booklet. She made commercial films at business conventions and some on the daring dance side. Just recently, these had to be shown in a Los Angeles court where a couple of characters were up for sending naughty films through the mails. The judge looked at seven of them and decided Sheree was sexy but still nice. "They really weren't very good," was his verdict, "but still not bad." Sheree said, "Now I can go to my PTA."

Of course art wasn't Sheree North's aim then. She was scraping to pay Dawn's milk bill. Things looked rosy once when a choreographer pal, Lee Scott, worked some dances with her and took them to MGM. Sheree got a utility dancer's contract because they needed a high kicker for Sally Forrest then. She worked in one picture called Excuse My Dust but she's not so sure she stayed in it. At least she's never had a look.

The best spot Sheree ever drew during those struggle days was at the Flamingo in Las Vegas. She had worked for Nils T. Granlund, both in his girlie lines and on his TV show, to win watches, bathing suits or anything useful. One day he offered her a job with his show in Vegas, as a specialty dancer, also helping on the routines and costume design. Although that resort didn't bring back pleasant memories to Sheree, she leaped at the $175 a week, board and room. She stayed for eight months, working up a nice little dodge on the side just for fun.

"I used to get in conversations with the Big Wheels around the tables," admits Sheree, "and casually mention it would be a nice night for a swim. It gets pretty chilly in Vegas on winter nights and they always thought I was crazy. So they'd bet me twenty dollars I wouldn't dive into the pool." With a bathing suit handy under her formal Sheree took them right up, raced through the icy wind and splashed like Esther Williams. Of course, she knew something they didn't seem to know. The pool was heated—it was really just like taking a warm bath!

Her salary, tips from lucky gamblers (one gave her $500 with a line of sentimental poetry thrown in) and a number of swimming pool bets piled up the first decent stake Sheree had ever had. She knew what she wanted to do with it—get out of this up-and-down life away from home. She had plans for the secretarial course when she took that job at Macayo. Even after Bob Alton found her there she went ahead with it for several weeks. What changed her mind?

"He was the first man who ever had real faith in me," explains Sheree. "He'd been through pretty much the same thing as I had—a divorce and a kid left to raise. I just felt he understood, that I should trust him and do what he said."

EVEN WITH THAT assurance there were times when Sheree's trip to New York for Hazel Flagg looked like another expensive wild goose chase. She had to buy luggage and winter clothes. Her salary was only $34 a week during rehearsals and they went on for almost two months. She'd never been to New York before and there were moments when Sheree North wondered if she should have her head examined for getting talked out of her respectable plans. Especially Christmas staring out the window of a third rate hotel on 54th and Broadway. She had the flu, and a mixture of wet snow and rain was slushing on the brick wall she saw from her cheap inside room. She was a few bucks from broke and 3000 miles from home and her baby girl. To make things perfect, it looked like her dance spot might have to be cut out of the show.

"That day," she says, "as far as I was concerned show business was no business!"

But the flu, the rain and the part cleared up. In fact, Sheree's part bloomed into a headline spot the minute she stepped on the stage and let go with her red hot burlesque of "Salome And The Seven Veils." One critic wrote, "I must be getting childish in my old age—but I swear I saw Gilda Gray dance last night, only she calls herself Sheree North now." Another announced, "An H-bomb seemed to hit the Mark Hellinger Theatre last night but it turned out to be only the North star." Sheree's name went up in lights and her shimmy-shaking picture out on posters—neither of which had ever happened to her before. She took bows at the nightclubs, played the benefits, made TV's Toast Of The Town, got interviewed and photographed—just like a movie star. "Also," recalls Sheree, "I got engaged in the columns to a lot of playboys and business tycoons I'd never met. When I was supposed to be out romancing I was really home in my room soaking my feet." All this excitement took twenty-two pounds off her figure but it was worth it.

When Paramount bought Hazel Flagg for Dean and Jerry's antics, nobody could imagine putting on the show without Sheree North. She threw herself so enthusiastically into that first movie break that she cracked an arch and had to go to the hospital. But Bing's TV offer made the foot heal fast. The furor raised by her TV dance wasn't such a surprise to Sheree. "I don't know why it is," she says innocently, "but I've always been very censorable." The movie offers which followed still make Sheree shake her cotton top in wonder.

Since then it has been all work and little play for Sheree North. For the last two months she has been tested at Fox from morning till night for "everything except my metabolism rate," grins Sheree, but that doesn't seem necessary. Already she has sung, danced and acted through the rehearsal scripts of two musicals, Pink Tights and There's No Business Like Show Business. Prospects for the first are still dubious, for after a thorough inspection it's plain that Sheree is not Marilyn Monroe at all. Actually, she isn't intended to be. She isn't anybody except herself, which seems to be plenty. There'll be room for both Sheree and Marilyn if Mrs. Di Mag should change her mind and come back to the stable. Both are super sexy blondes but there's little other resemblance. Sheree is primarily a dancer and strictly a funny girl. As for any feud a-brewing, that's silly. The girls have met but only to say hello, a huge thrill for Sheree as is meeting any Hollywood star. "I still get a stiff neck rubbering around," she admits.

Sheree's break happened so fast that she has been caught flatfooted glamour-wise. Until just the other day she was camping in a tiny cottage out in Sun Valley, a hamlet thirty-odd miles from Hollywood where rents are cheap. She rattled to and fro in a battered blue Plymouth convertible with holes in the top. She's been to just three Hollywood parties, two of them business affairs. She had to sew her own costume for the third, Darryl Zanuck's Return From Korea blowout for daughter Susan and Terry Moore. The only Hollywood escort Sheree has had so far is her agent, Henry Willson.

Some of this deficiency is rapidly being made up. Sheree has just moved to a new furnished house nearer the studio with a big backyard for Dawn and a nurse to look after her. Another thing Sheree did with her first pay check was to start an insurance policy for Dawn's education. Because Dawn, whom her mom describes as "a pug-nosed Jack Cole dancer type with a rosebud mouth," is still what Sheree's really living for. "My ambition?" says Sheree. "That's easy—to raise a healthy, emotionally secure daughter, and be the right kind of a parent." She admits she'd like a little help someday. While Sheree hasn't a beau to her name in Hollywood there's a man in New York (she admits under pressure) whom she has her eye on. She won't tell his name. "It might scare him away."

He walked in one afternoon at a young couple's apartment where Sheree was baby sitting because she felt lonesome for her own. "I liked the way he held the baby," says Sheree. "I'd like him to hold mine that way." But nothing's really boiling seriously yet.

Sheree keeps fit by working out with weights in a gym, riding and swimming. She takes a terrific tan (because she's really a brunette). She's also a health food nut with a weakness for yogurt and raw liver, but drinks and smokes when she feels like it.

There was a time when she could stay awake all night and once did for three days and nights, but now that she's an old lady of twenty-one she's softened up some. Mostly this is because nightclubs give her the shakes, understandably. The only time she's entertained so far in Hollywood was when she rounded up her broke chorus girl friends from the old days and bought them all the beef they could eat at Lowry's Prime Rib. That was one way she celebrated her new seven-year contract at Fox. Next morning she celebrated it in another. She went with Dawn to church, as she does every Sunday, and gave special thanks. Dressed in a neat tailored suit and modest bonnet, you'd never have thought she was Sheree North, the hottest thing on wheels in Hollywood.

Sheree's private life—when you examine it—is nothing to raise anyone's blood pressure, as her dances invariably do. But that's just the point. At an age when most girls are still dewy-eyed and dizzy, Sheree's already wise to the ways of show business. As she said, she's had it—the glitter and star dust—and now she wants a chance at some of the good things in life.

Sheree is not lost in the clouds about her luck. She knows how fickle show business can be. She's glad she decided against that job at Hughes Aircraft, but she's keeping her shorthand and typing in practice. And around her neck Sheree wears a tiny gold horseshoe that songwriter Ken Darby gave her.

"I think I'll hang on to it for a while," she says. END

Shrinks Hemorrhoids New Way Without Surgery

Science Finds Healing Substance That Relieves Pain—Shrinks Hemorrhoids

For the first time science has found a new healing substance with the astonishing ability to shrink hemorrhoids and to stop bleeding—without surgery.

In case after case, pain was relieved promptly. And, while gently relieving pain, actual reduction (shrinkage) took place.

Most amazing of all—results were so thorough that sufferers made astonishing statements like "Piles have ceased to be a problem!"

The secret is a new healing substance (Bio-Dyne®)—discovery of a world-famous research institute.

Now this new healing substance is offered in ointment form under the name of *Preparation H. Ask for it at all drug stores—money back guarantee.

Terry maintains that there are many advantages for the working girl who lives with her family.

"That's why," she declares, "I insist upon paying my share of the expenses and upkeep. Dad was against it at the beginning, but I put my foot down.

"The folks moved here from Glendale primarily for my convenience. It wasn't easy for them to pull up roots. After all, their closest friends lived in Glendale and we were very close to the church there. But Hollywood traffic was getting so thick that it began to take me ninety minutes to drive to and from work.

"I also began to take night courses at UCLA, and the family didn't like the idea of my driving home after dark. So we all got together and debated the pros and cons of moving.

"My brother Wally was away at college in Utah, so he didn't care where we moved. Mother, Dad and I decided to look for houses only in Westwood so that I'd be near 20th Century and the UCLA campus."

The matter of size and style came up for discussion around the family dinner table, but Terry's only request was for "a room of my own. All I want is enough closet space so I can store my shoes." Terry has seventy-five pairs of size 4B shoes.

> Well, TV sure has made strides. Although a lot of small towns are getting programs from stations that are so far away that the shows don't come in if the wind ain't right. Best thing I've heard about it is the dentist who has a television set perched up there in front of the chair, and he uses it regularly. What he does is to pull your teeth during the commercials so you don't feel the extra pain.

"And," she added, "I think a swimming pool would be dreamy. Don't you, mother?"

"That," recalls Mrs. Koford, "was completely out of the question."

"Some people," Terry's father explains, "might call us ultra-conservative, but my wife and I have never gone into debt for anything, and we didn't intend to change.

"We did manage to sell our Glendale house for a nice profit, and I suppose I could have easily bought a large house and let Terry pay off the mortgage, but that's not our way.

"We bought the house in Westwood mortgage-free, and I pointed out to Terry that she'd be getting married one of these days, and then what would her mother and I do with a large swimming pool?

"Terry's a sensible girl. She gave up her dream and we bought this house."

Actually, the new Koford residence is a slightly enlarged copy of their previous home. It has four bedrooms, a den and a livingroom. These two last rooms are so nearly the same size as their predecessors that Mrs. Koford had the walls painted the same color. So the family furniture fits smoothly into the new house.

Terry's three favorite spots are the music unit, the patio and her own room.

The music unit is built into a wall in the center foyer. The turntable and record storage are in Terry's bedroom, but loudspeakers are spotted all over the house and on the patio.

This patio is referred to by Terry as "Date Hangout." It features a barbecue, a sharp hillside permitting complete privacy, and a surface good enough for dancing.

"I go to a lot of previews," Terry says, "and to the nightclub shows afterwards. But honestly, there's no place in town where you can really dance. All the clubs have such tiny floors. You're squeezed and jammed. Not even room to breathe.

"But now after a big opening or something, our gang bypasses the late spots, and we wind up here. We dance and have snacks. Everything under the stars. Real dreamy."

Terry's interpretation of "snacks," you should know, means sandwich fillings without bread—cold cuts wrapped around sweet pickles, smoked oysters and cheese, strips of bacon around tomatoes, and of course, popcorn, peanuts and cider. Nothing stronger than cider is served. Despite this, every bachelor in Hollywood wants to date at "Terry's house."

"More fun there," Eddie Fisher says, "than any place."

Terry was asked how her life had changed since she moved away from the middle-class residential district in Glendale—just about as typical a city as you could find in America.

"In one year you've taken on the special glitter of a celebrity. Your salary increased, your fan mail quadrupled, you moved to Westwood. What has it done to you?"

"I'll tell you. It's like being placed on a conveyor belt," Terry confessed with a giggle. "First, one thing is added to you, then another. You change, you get molded, and in the end I guess you come out a full-fledged movie personality. But I don't ever want to lose my individuality."

After she moved to Westwood, Terry soon found that she needed two telephones, so the family has two unlisted numbers.

"Then," Terry explains, "I saw that I needed lots more clothes, especially formals. When you're photographed all the time, you can't be seen in the same dress two or three times in a row. Luckily for me, Mother's a good dressmaker and I guess I'm pretty handy with a needle, too. We borrowed my dress form from the studio and began a small remodeling campaign. It has worked out swell.

"You want to know something? Modern Screen ran three pictures of me with three different dates. I wore the same dress on all three occasions. Only the dress was remodeled and Mother and I were the only ones who knew it was the same dress.

"That's pretty good remodeling, because the people who read fan magazines are very sharp. They'll write and ask, 'Why did you wear the same dress to three previews?'

"This dress in Modern Screen started as a full-length formal with a big flounce and a pocket of flowers and a matching jacket. The flounce and pocket were stripped and the jacket discarded. Our third change was to shorten the dress to ballerina length and in place of the flowers, substitute a strip of mink and rhinestones."

Terry's mother takes care of the tremendous increase in her fan mail at home.

"She answers the mail and keeps my appointments straight and chaperones me on trips overseas and does so much for me that for the first time in our lives, we've hired a housekeeper. That's another change.

"In Glendale we never even thought of a housekeeper, but then Mother didn't have so much to do. Now we've got Sally Richards to help and she's more like a relative to us than hired help.

"My hike in salary has also made it possible for me to keep a pianist under personal contract.

"When I first began developing an act for Army camp shows I met Eddie Samuels. He helped me with new arrangements and my timing, and he went along when I flew to Korea. We've just finished working out a new act for Las Vegas."

All things considered, the most impressive additions from the Terry Moore conveyor belt have been the top echelon people she's met since becoming a star and the trips abroad she's taken.

Not only has she journeyed through most of Europe, Hawaii, Japan and Mexico, but now she numbers among her friends Mr. and Mrs. Darryl Zanuck, Mr. and Mrs. Fredric March, Shirley Booth, Burt Lancaster, Mr. and Mrs. Tyrone Power and a dozen or so high-ranking bachelors.

"There's no doubt about it," Terry says. "I've come a long way from Glendale.

"There was a time," she recalls wistfully, "when after a party I'd come home, drop off to sleep, and wake in my room surrounded by my old stuffed animals and pictures of me in high school.

"Now I come home and wake up in a newly-decorated bedroom, and it's hard for me to know whether I'm awake or still dreaming."

Terry's room today is one of the most satisfying manifestations of her new-found success. Ever since she was eight, she has wanted a room with rose velvet curtains and a wall of mirrors.

Vaguely her parents talked of giving it to her, but the years slipped by and there was always a more pressing need for the money. But when Terry insisted upon contributing to the household budget, her dad decided to give her the glamour treatment.

"She might as well have her fun while she's still with us," Mr. Koford told his wife. Mrs. Koford needed no urging. She covered one wall of Terry's room solid with mirrors. Then she explained one of Terry's pet theories to the painters.

"My daughter believes that it's more harmonious to follow nature's way. We'll use dark colors at the floor and let them grow lighter as we reach the ceiling." Thus the room offers a dark grey carpet, lighter grey walls, and a pale ceiling.

To cap all this, Mrs. Koford ordered an Artists Imperial wallpaper in pink and grey with a ballet motif.

Rather than buy a new king-size bed, she retained Terry's old twin beds and had one large headboard made. At a second-hand shop, she found the bench and footstool now beside the bed. She antiqued the bench herself and put the stool near the phone hoping that Terry would remember not to flop on the bed. Sometimes she does.

The redecorating involved a load of work and cost a pretty penny, but Terry's mom says, "It's worth it, because the child really appreciates it. Days when she's worked especially hard she comes home, bathes and hops into bed right away. She loves to study lounging on her chaise."

Terry says she's happiest with her walk-in closets that hold her seventy-five pairs of shoes.

"Honestly," she exclaims, "I thought I'd never have enough room for them."

Pleased as her parents are to have Terry living at home with them, they do have one unselfish, unfilled hope.

It's their fondest wish that the little star who twinkles so brightly around their house will find a husband and a home of her own. They are reconciled to losing her to love. All they ask is that the love be lasting. END

those lucky ladds

(Continued from page 35) berth on the Santa Fe Chief to stare out the window, virtually counting the ties as he clicked toward home. He had practically wrestled the porter for the bags as the train finally stopped. When Sue protested, he grumbled, "You don't want him to break his back, do you?" But it wasn't only that, she knew. Her husband couldn't wait to get his feet on home soil again.

He had raced up the ramp with Sue, Davy and Lonnie panting in his wake, expecting to find Carol Lee and Laddie at the top, of course, and Jerry with the family car. But when he rounded the turn into Union Station he couldn't believe what he saw. There must have been sixty of them—all his best friends—down to meet him at the unlikely hour of eight A.M., some from as far away as San Diego, all yelling his name, swarming over him, pounding his back, hugging the kids, kissing Sue. That was when he lost his voice and his sight, too, as his eyes filled with the stuff a man is not supposed to show.

"Come on," he had finally choked. "Come on out to the house. This is what I've been wanting so long I could taste it. Let's make it last." And so they had—all of them—and throughout the day twice their number more, streaming in and out of the hilltop place with the wide open door. There were big stars like Bing Crosby and Van Heflin, shy characters like stunt men to wring his hand and say they were glad he was home.

Now they were all gone. The kids were long ago in dreamland, and Beret, the dachsie, snoozed on the rug. But the spell lingered. Alan wasn't sleepy.

"Susie," he said at last, "you know something? We're just the two luckiest people in this whole wide world!"

As an actor, Alan is at the summit of a career he never dreamed could climb so high. Last year, he starred in Shane, one of Hollywood's great pictures. Hollywood's foreign press has elected him the most popular actor in the world and he collected the top star accolade in England where he was immortalized in wax at Tussaud's Museum along with history's great. In America Alan nestles securely near the top of all fan and box-office polls. At home Belle, his secretary, works furiously to keep up with mail which mounts out of control. Three Alan Ladd pictures are headlining theatres at this minute with two more on deck.

Privately, his picture is every bit as rosy. Alan could support his family comfortably if he never faced another camera. He doesn't owe a penny to anyone. Besides his luxurious modern house, he owns a dream ranch free and clear with two ranch houses. He is raising horses and chickens and the sale of eggs is now starting to show a profit. He has healthy annuities almost paid up, and some blue-chip securities. Most valuable of all, he has Sue and their family—four wonderful children, Carol Lee, Alana, Laddie and David.

Alan Ladd has just treated this family to a fabulous excursion—a grand tour of Europe lasting almost two years, all expenses paid by his employers, only because he had been working. The Ladds couldn't have a brighter outlook.

Yet the same night that Alan Ladd voiced his appreciation of all this an anxious frown furrowed his brow.

"Here I am back home," he worried, "and I'm out of a job!"

Sue Ladd didn't smile at that—maybe she should have. But she couldn't, even though they were both aware of the twenty-seven scripts stacked in his den, the producers who'd kept the phone hopefully hot even that first day home, the contracts at Warners and Paramount still in force and The Covered Wagon that had been put off and off until he could make it. Sue didn't smile because she knew—ridiculous or not—that worry was incurable with this strange, still unconvinced man. She remembered the first day he came to her agency office, after she'd caught him on a radio show and called him in. "Pictures?" he'd said, "Not me. I'm not the type for pictures." She'd talked him into a try, fallen in love with him, married him and helped him to the heights—but she'd never convinced him. Not she nor anyone else. No matter if he lived to a hundred, and won an Academy Award each year, Alan wouldn't ever actually believe that he rates what has happened to him. "I've got no business being an actor," he'd protested how many times? "I should be out somewhere shingling a roof."

"Come on, honey," she said. "Let's go to bed. You want to get out to the ranch early tomorrow, don't you?"

He was gone before she awoke, leaving a note pinned on the rumpled pillow. "I'll take you tomorrow," it read. Sue grinned. That was like Alan. Maybe something was not in apple pie order and Alan always had to have that place picture perfect. The ranch was more than his hobby. It was security, the first property he'd ever owned in his life. Now he was on his way to make sure it was still there.

He was on his way fast—too fast—on the empty highway. He turned into an oak-lined country road, screeched around the pistol-shaped signpost that read "This Gun Not For Hire." Inside Hidden Valley he slowed down to savor the familiar fields, barns, whitewashed corrals and gateposts. On the far side was Alsulana Ranch. He could just barely see it through the pepper trees. Soon he was rolling up the drive under those ancient trees, and Tex Richards, the foreman, was creasing his leathery cheeks in a welcoming grin. "How's it look, Alan?"

"It looks great," he said, "just great, Tex. Prettier than I've ever seen it. Maybe," he laughed, a little ruefully, "I should go away more often. I'll just mosey around," he added.

After that Alan sat on the big front porch looking out over the valley. Across the road in his pasture he could pick out the grazing horses, Judy, Alsuladd, Alanadave and old Lucky, his first, homeless horse and the reason, he used to kid himself, that he bought the ranch.

After a while he went into the ranch house. There was the coppered kitchen they'd had so much fun fixing up, the big oak table nicked with ranchware and, as he remembered, usually flooded with milk from knocked-over tumblers. In the bedroom he looked up and chuckled, remembering the day he and Sue had suddenly grabbed trace chains and whaled the too-new beams to make them look old. He walked out and strolled about the ranch. First up to the bunkhouse on the slope where the kids had grown up. Then over to the barn where he'd quartered the budding racehorse string that never bloomed. Down to the pool and barbecue, where he had once heard Jezebel barking and David crying. He had killed the coiled rattlesnake just in time. The chilling memory sent his eyes to the hillside where the bulldozer had been working that other awful day when Alana toddled away from her nurse. Jez was with him then and the boxer suddenly yelped and shot away like a bullet to knock Lonnie down just as the lethal blade swept over the spot where she'd been standing. Alan shuddered and felt a pang at the same time. There was a dog, Jezzie! She'd looked sick when he left, but he'd said, "Don't you die now, hear me? I want to see you when I get back." But on the boat he knew it had happened, although Sue tried to keep the news from him.

Something else was missing at the ranch—the blanket of flowers that covered the hillside. "Tex, what's wrong with the flowers?" he asked.

"It's a little early yet, Alan."

"Got to have flowers. Sue likes them." And so he ran up the highway to a nursery and loaded his car with everything he could find in bloom, spending the rest of the day setting them out. It was late when he got home with mud on his boots and jeans and an expression of assurance on his face. The ranch was in order and definitely still there. Next day Sue could see for herself.

That night, tired as he was, Alan stayed up until three o'clock wading through scripts. The next night it was the same. Daytimes he called his producer and director friends on the phone, catching up and asking anxiously, "Say, you haven't got a script for me, have you?" When one promptly replied, "I sure have. I've got two. When can I see you?" Alan rushed to Sue. "What do you know?" he cried. "I've got me a job lined up—maybe two!"

A week after the Ladds came home, Sue got a special kiss when she woke up. "What day is this?" her husband asked. "March 15," Sue said. "Income Tax Day!"

"You can do better than that, honey."

"Of course I can," she grinned. "It's the day twelve years ago that I became Mrs. Alan Ladd. All the bad things happen to you the same day," she kidded.

"All the good things," he corrected her,

BOGART BLOOPS

When Humphrey Bogart was making Beat The Devil in London, he was invited to receive the Picturegoer magazine award as outstanding actor of the year.

His wife, Lauren Bacall, had flown from Hollywood to see him receive the award, and arrived just as he started his acceptance speech. So Bogart hurried through it, his eyes constantly on his wife. He finished in record time and no sooner had he sat down to talk to Lauren, than shouts of "Retake, please!" arose.

His mind on his wife, Bogart had thanked Picture Post instead of Picturegoer. So, amid loud laughter, he rose and repeated his entire speech!

straight-faced. "Thank God for you—and for the income tax! Say, since you're dressed—will you do me a favor? I left my cigarette lighter in the car last night."

Sue stepped out to the garage. She didn't get to Alan's car on the contrived errand because another one blocked her way—a shiny black Cadillac. On the door handle was a huge, red bow and a dangling placard. "Susie—" it read, "Cuz I love you. It's yours, so go ahead and kill me—'The Daddy.' P.S. I know we can't afford it—but ain't it a beaut?"

Sue Ladd lingered thoughtfully, stroking the smooth new hardtop and reading that note over and over again. Alan had to make people happy—especially people he loved—but he also had to apologize for doing it.

Anyone who has ever known Alan Ladd appreciates the paradox of his makeup. The restless, ambitious guy has sought and fought steadily for everything Hollywood could give him but he has just as consistently backed away from the big treatment and crazy capers.

When you've been as poor as Alan Ladd has been you don't forget it easily. A kid who lost his father when he was a baby, rattled across the country in a creaking jalopy, Okie style, and knocked around depression-strapped California in transient camps under the stern discipline of a stepfather, does not develop a taste for high life. A boy who earned everything he got himself doesn't treat his acquisitions lightly. A man who watched the mother he adored die before his eyes with himself still unproved and a failure, is not prone to look on his success thereafter as license for a lark. Alan Ladd literally had holes in the soles of his shoes when the tide turned for him. He couldn't trip up a primrose path with the skin still rubbed raw.

Early in his career, Paramount sent him and Sue to New York for personal appearances and put them up at the Waldorf-Astoria. One night he ordered two hamburgers sent up to the room. But when he saw the $5 tab he couldn't eat his. It hadn't been long since Alan himself had been frying hamburgers and selling them for a dime in a shack he called "Tiny's." In those early days at Paramount the star of the picture was known to grab scenery and lift it before a razzing yell from the grips, "Hey, Alan—let's see your union card!" stopped him. It sometimes happens today, because Al still has that union card from the days when he was a grip, and lucky to be one.

When workmen are at Alan's house he hustles them beers and Cokes. Sue tells of the time when he accidentally slept late one morning. Around nine o'clock she called out, "Alan, time to get up!" Back came a hurried whisper, "S-h-h-h-h—don't let the carpenters hear you. They'll think I'm a bum!"

When the Ladds moved into their Holmby Hills house they gave two housewarmings—one for their star neighbors, another for Alan's real friends, the gang he had worked with for years. "This is the one I really enjoyed," he told Sue at the post-mortem. They are the people you're likely to see around his pool and his house today, the same ones who crowded around the train gate when he came home from Europe. They drop in constantly and Alan Ladd constantly shoves his collection of honors that Sue masses on a shelf, back into the corner. "Honey, please!" he begs. "They'll think I'm bragging."

This is no pose with Alan, as it is with so many stars. He packs an almost penitent urge to share his luck with the people he came from, the only ones with whom he feels really comfortable and secure. One out-of-work friend came to dinner the other night and Alan spotted a frayed collar. He left with six of Alan's best shirts. Another unemployed photographer showed up for a swim, borrowed Alan's best movie camera to take pictures of the Ladd kids. He couldn't give it back. Things like that happen all the time.

From his hunger days, Alan retains a pack rat urge to save things.

"Maybe I'll need them some time," he says. "But I guess the real reason is that I like things I can hold in my hand." Sue gave Alan a beautiful Audemar Piguet watch when they were in Switzerland, the finest made anywhere; only twelve a year are produced. He likes to look at it. But he wears "the watch," a plain gold ticker Sue gave him back when they first fell in love. He's got boxes stuffed with rings, cufflinks, and such, but he wears only his wedding band and his service ID bracelet.

> A Hollywood producer, incensed by complaints from a political group there, warned them: "I'll take it higher and higher and higher—until I get to the bottom of this."
> Leonard Lyons in The New York Post

You could go on and on, describing the ways in which Alan Ladd constantly reassures himself of his great good luck and at the same time backs away from flaunting it. But maybe his recent stay in Europe—the trip people said was bound to change him—shows it best of all.

Alan didn't want to go. "Why leave here?" he answered when foreign offers came. "This is the best place, isn't it?" In the end he decided to go but only because a European stay, en famille, had been Sue's dream. She was educated in Switzerland and France. She wanted her kids to know how the rest of the world looked, sounded, tasted and smelled. So when producers started upping the ante and including almost every trip expense from gasoline to toothpaste he consented to pry himself loose.

Even with the house rented, everything stored, his entire family aboard the Ile de France, Alan wanted to call the whole thing off when the boat docked at Southampton.

It was four-thirty A.M. and still dark when the British reporters climbed aboard, loaded for bear. Who, they demanded, did Alan Ladd think he was, coming to England to play a British war hero? Didn't he know that the red-bereted paratroopers symbolized England's wartime courage?

The battery of questions was a shock. He had thought that coming over was a piece of good will between the two countries. Besides, as he tried to explain that morning, the role in Paratrooper was about an American who came voluntarily to fight in the Red Berets because he loved England. But he was so shaken by the experience that when the reporters departed he had to go back to his stateroom and lose his coffee and toast. "Let's go on back home, honey," he told Sue. "They don't like me here."

But they did. Before he left Britain Alan had conquered the place almost as thoroughly as any foreigner since 1066. He was voted the most popular star in England. But perhaps he wouldn't have had the heart to stick around if something hadn't happened a few days after he arrived. Visiting Shepperton studio, he sneaked on to the set of Moulin Rouge to have a look at how they did things over there. A thousand extras and workers were crowded into the place and when they set up a shout he thought he'd stumbled into a scene. But the shouting was all about himself—a welcome from his kind of people. Alan watered up that time, too, and today tags it the biggest thrill of his trip. It was the assurance that he was welcome and wanted.

But if they had turned out the guard at Buckingham Palace in his honor it couldn't have banished the ache he packed for home. He saw new sights and like the rest of the family, he acquired an education he couldn't have bought at home. But, as Sue noted, "All the time we were gone Alan was trying to prove to himself that he'd never left home."

Hallowe'en came and even if the neighbors didn't know what he was up to, he decked out the big house they rented in orange and black streamers, carved pumpkins and lighted them in the windows. He sent the kids, Lonnie and Davy, out rapping on doors and yelling, "Trick or treat!" to the astonishment and confusion of the countryside. Two nice ladies thought they were burglars and called the bobbies.

At the Paris restaurants he tasted what Sue ordered, made a face, and tried to say "bifstek" in pidgin French. He outraged porters everywhere, although he tipped them generously, because he grabbed his own bags half the time, hating as always to have anyone do anything for him. Hotelkeepers were dismayed when he asked to fry his own hamburgers.

Wherever the Ladds rambled—through England, France, Switzerland, Italy, Germany, Holland and Belgium—everything Alan saw only reminded him of what he liked better at home.

The winter sports at St. Moritz only suggested Old Baldy back home. Monte Carlo was a glittering kick (especially when he put two bucks on the dice and walked out with two hundred) but to Alan it was just Las Vegas in dress clothes. Venice was swell, but he liked the Grand Canal best skimming over it in a motorboat as he used to on Balboa Bay in California. His favorite spot in Rome was the sports forum that Mussolini built to revive Italy's athletic prowess. That was where Alan headed late on moonlit nights, yanked off his shoes, dug starting holes in the cinder track and had Sue clock him in the 100-yard dash! Wherever they went, Sue had to find a U.S. Army PX and buy pancake mix and canned chili and beans.

To this day, Sue wonders what kept Alan from going over the hill for Hollywood when they came as close as Banff

WHEN IS A STAR?

Audrey has her Oscar, but Bogey says she has yet to pass the acid test!

■ "Audrey Hepburn is not yet a full-fledged star!"

That statement, believe it or not, was made by Don Hartman, top executive of Paramount, Audrey's own studio.

"Because," Hartman explained, "Audrey has yet to prove that she can carry a picture by herself.

"She is an immensely talented actress. Charming, winsome and all of that. But is her name box office? That's the only proof of stardom we have.

"She was wonderful in Roman Holiday, but although everyone who saw it liked it, we didn't make as much money on the picture as we should have made.

"In Audrey's second picture, Sabrina, we've cast her opposite two of the biggest names in the business, Humphrey Bogart and William Holden. If it does well, we'll probably see if Audrey can carry a picture by herself. That will be the acid test."

When Humphrey Bogart was asked if he considered Miss Hepburn a full-fledged movie star, he asked, "Which Miss Hepburn?"

Told it was Audrey, Bogey agreed with Hartman.

"It's much too early to tell," Bogart explained. "I've seen kids come along who were real hot for a couple of pictures and then flickered out. This kid's got class and ability. No doubt about it. But has she got that certain something the public is willing to spend money for? We'll just have to wait and see."

Bill Holden, however, has no doubts.

"In my book," says her fellow Academy Award winner, "Audrey Hepburn is a big star right now."

in Canada, to make Saskatchewan. When Carole Lee and Laddie took off for Hollywood from there, Alan gazed so wistfully after the kids that it wouldn't have surprised her if she'd had to chase after him across the glacial Bow River like Eliza crossing the ice.

But there was still The Black Knight to make in England. After that, he could have played two more pictures abroad if he'd wanted to.

By that time Alan Ladd had a one track mind and it led nowhere but home. The S.S. United States brought him there, and of all the 36,000 miles he covered, that last stretch from Le Havre was the best. Two foreign flag ships sailed more conveniently but as Alan told Sue firmly, "No more boats where I have to wake you up to order ham and eggs for breakfast in French." First thing he did aboard the floating bit of homeland was to roam around the ship treating his ears to American accents.

He was up at five A.M. to see the Statue of Liberty loom into view and his stay in New York amounted to four fast hours. That was enough to say hello to his pal, Lloyd Nolan, playing on Broadway, and to call Hannah, the cook out in Hollywood, and tell her what he wanted for dinner the night he got home—"Ham, cornbread and black-eyed peas."

ALL OF THIS is a montage of memories to Alan Ladd, very pleasant ones, but he's thankful they're in the past. "Look," he said, when he was told what a lucky guy he is to have had the trip, "I'm so lucky for everything I can't believe it. But the best luck is being right here where I belong. You planning a trip? People are people all over the world—they just talk differently. Sights are sights—and I've seen some great ones. But there isn't any sight better than this," and he waved his hand in a circle embracing the things that were unmistakably his, right where he could see and touch them if he wanted to.

It embraced a wiry little carbon copy of himself, named David, learning flips on the springboard just as his old man used to do. "Hit the board harder—and straighten out those knees," shouted Alan. It took in a dainty ten-year-old doll named Alana, watching all this gravely with her chum, Katie. "Can your daddy really dive, too?" asked Katie. "My daddy can do anything," came the withering reply.

THAT CIRCLE also took in a manly sixteen-year-old called Laddie who carefully polished a new Ford his dad had just given him. There was another one for Carol Lee (with apologies to his other kids, "I hope I can afford one for you, too, when you grow up.") It embraced the big, comfortable house where Jerry and Hannah were already fixing lunch in the kitchen and Belle, in the office, was filing papers for Ladd Enterprises, which will produce pictures.

It included the ranch out in Hidden Valley. In fact it swung all around Hollywood, where Alan Ladd had grown up in poverty and miraculously found his future and his fortune.

Sue came in. "Your agent's on the phone. He says there's an offer for you to make a picture in Boston."

"Boston?" teased Alan. "Where's that? If it isn't in Hollywood the answer is no Honey, you know I don't like cod."

"Now, Alan—"

"Yeah, I know. Tell him I'll call him back ”

ALAN SIGHED. "Sue's still the boss around here," he grinned. "I guess she always will be." And I thought of a remark a friend of Alan's once made to me. "There isn't a star in Hollywood who's handled his success better than Alan Ladd, and nobody's handled Alan better than Sue."

It's a case of two heads and two hearts together which have brought the good things that Alan meant when he swept his arm around and said "all this." The winning combo is no more likely to change than Alan Ladd is. If twelve years in the pressure cooker of Hollywood can't do it, a trip to Europe won't turn the trick. END

I'd rather stay home

It was so unexpected that everyone present was tickled, but Mike most of all; he chortled. Nobody has cornered the market on comedy in that household, and O'Shea's wife can always provoke him to laughter. "My old lady!" He shakes his tousled head in wonder and grins broadly.

WELL, WHAT ABOUT all the obstacles? A marriage doesn't survive them just because a man, his wife, or both occasionally entertain an amusing thought. You can't beat a sense of humor for adding spice to life, but you also can't bank on one to compensate for everything else.

That appreciable difference in age should

"I just knew I wanted to marry Michael the first time I met him," Virginia explains. "It was very sudden—I didn't expect it to happen that way. Because marriage means forever to me, I had always imagined it would take me a long time to make up my mind. But then," she adds after a pensive look into her past, "I never fell in love till I met Mike."

As for himself, he got clobbered just as quickly, with just as much finality. "First time I laid eyes on my old lady, I asked her to marry me. No kidding. It was over at the Goldwyn Studio, where I was making a picture called Jack London. I'd been working with nothing but dirty, bearded guys like myself, and when I saw Virginia standing there on the set, it was like the sweet breath of spring. So I walked over and said, 'You're the most beautiful thing I've ever seen in this crummy joint. Let's get married.' She said I talked like an idiot, and I told her I was an idiot but I wanted to marry her, anyhow. And I did—but not until five years later. I wanted to be sure she knew what she was getting, give her a chance to back out if she wanted."

Those are the words of a great cover-up guy. They didn't wait half a decade because there were any doubts in Virginia's moved earth and stone to secure a divorce from his first wife. They had been separated a number of years, an arrangement she found satisfactory. Their youthful marriage had been a civil ceremony, so there were not even religious bars to a divorce. Only perversity—but Virginia and Mike aren't the sort to talk about things like that. It's easier more pleasant, if Mike says in his elaborately casual way, "Wanted to give Virginia a chance to back out—"

THEY HAVE THAT in common. Virginia is so pleasantly undemonstrative that one Hollywood writer admits, "I've worked with her off and on for ten years, and I still don't know whether she likes me or not." And so with the O'Shea, voluble as he is. If people don't take the trouble to look below the surface, he isn't about to reveal the inner man for their idle inspection. When the aforesaid former wife elected, some years after the marriage of Virginia and Mike, to claim an imposing amount of back alimony on the grounds that Virginia's salary was community property, it became a test case in court. Everything Virginia has she gladly gives to Mike, but she thought the claim unfair and fought it. Unfortunately, she lost—which meant that a sum estimated at $25,000 went out of the family coffers. The whole town knew that Mike wasn't making such money, that it would have to come out of Virginia's earnings, and the O'Sheas let them have their day of speculation and gossip. Mike had sold a dear piece of property at a loss to put that money back. But only a handful took the trouble to find that out.

This is Carole's snapshot of Scott.

SNAP-HAPPY

While at the Cheyenne Rodeo in Wyoming I saw Scott Brady making some action shots for Bronco Buster. After the Rodeo I was thrilled when he agreed to pose for a picture, but I thought I was out of luck when the lock on my camera jammed. You can imagine how amazed I was when he walked over, took the camera out of my nervous hands, unlocked it for me and then posed for the picture.

Carole Hayes
Evansville, Indiana

Similarly, there was considerable talk to the effect that Virginia was bringing home the bacon while Mike stayed home and laid the eggs. One of the town's best writers, incidentally a friend of O'Shea, finally took courage in hand and approached him with the idea of doing a story on the subject. "Sure," said Michael—and the result was MODERN SCREEN's story, "Somebody Has To Stay Home." In it Mike made no mealy-mouthed attempts to justify his position. He pointed out that since Virginia was nearing the peak of her career and there was no large demand for his type at the moment, it would be pretty silly for her to stay home while he went out to work for less. These are the things Mike O'Shea will tell you if it makes a good story. He doesn't mention, however, the run-of-the-play contract he was offered to do Guys And Dolls on Broadway. You'd think he was crazy not to have taken it. Maybe so, but it's part of the O'Shea love story that being separated is insupportable to them, and Mike's going into a sure-fire musical could have meant nothing else. They talked it over, and the answer came out no. There would be another opportunity.

FOR THE AMOUNT of time and the consideration Mike gives to the career of his wife, he might seem careless of his own. He is not a careless man, but on occasion he has been exceedingly tactless. "I got a reputation for being very tough to work with, and I deserved it," he admits. "When a director tells you how to play a scene, you don't endear yourself to people in the business by telling him he couldn't direct traffic on a street corner. Even if you know right down to your bones that he's wrong."

"Mike doesn't do that when he works with a director he respects," interpolates Virginia. "It's just that he knows quite a lot about acting."

This talk was going on out on the patio of their home in Van Nuys. The O'Shea had prowled restively from a chair under the umbrella to a lounge to a seat in the sun, and now he disappeared entirely.

"Really, the stage is where he belongs." Virginia, wearing shorts, was stretched out lithe and relaxed as a cat. "Mike has that magnetism, vitality, stage presence—whatever you want to call it—that an actor in the legitimate theatre has to have. In Hollywood they can shoot the same scene over and over or dummy what they want, but on the stage you only have the one chance to walk out there and command your audience. It takes something special that Michael has."

The man himself ambled back from the corral, where he had been in animated conversation with his quarter-horse stallion. "Know what I want to do?" he inquired. "What I've been wanting to do since I came to Hollywood? Make a western. Not one of those razzle-dazzle shoot-em-ups, because that isn't the way the old west was. They were wonderful people, real people, those old pioneers. I read every book about them that I can get my hands on, and I'd like to do a picture about their kind of life. Know what they tell me in Hollywood? I'm not the type for a western. Me, that spent ten years on the rodeo circuit!"

WHEN IT BECAME known that Miss Mary Catherine O'Shea was on the way, her pop said, "Baby coming, guess the old man better go out and start working." And work he did. Maybe he set the right people back on their heels with the verbal persuasion of which he's capable, maybe he even accepted less money than he's worth—but all of a sudden the ball was rolling. O'Shea made a picture, It Should Happen To You for Columbia. Television discovered him; he's done a couple of dramas, made guest appearances and filmed the pilot of a thirty-nine-week series. And when he has ten times this amount of work, the O'Shea will be completely happy. Oh, sure, he'll tell you that somebody's gotta stay home, that they wouldn't starve on Virginia's salary alone, because he has that island-unto-himself Irish pride. But it's a curious thing that the sinus trouble and the stomach trouble with which Mike O'Shea is plagued disappears completely when he's working.

Another so-called "big problem," the religious one, has been conspicuous by its absence in the seven years that Virginia and Michael have been married. Virginia had eight hours of instruction in the Catholic faith from Mike's good friend, Bishop Fulton Sheen, but whether she'll become a convert, she does not yet know. The idea has met considerable opposition from both her family and her own church, understandably, and her husband is too sensitive to the importance of one's religion to urge her. Virginia says with finality, "It's my soul. I think I have to make up my own mind."

Though Mike doesn't want her pushed or pulled into anything, he's an incorrigible tease, likely to ask, "Virginia, what's my autographed prayerbook from the Bishop doing in your heathen bedroom?" She smiles back, knowing how he is, knowing he'd break his arm before he'd hurt her feelings. Knowing she could take up Yoga or Bahaiism, for all of Mike, just so long as she is happy.

With the appearance of Miss Mary Catherine, there have been some changes made. About $20,000 worth of changes in the house itself. A play pen in the dining room. "Still gotta enlarge the nursery," grumbles the master of the house. "Nowadays, we invite people for dinner, somebody ends up eating in the play pen!" A buggy on the patio. A charming addition to the household, Mrs. Young, the baby's nurse. And Dukie, Virginia's already-neurotic bulldog, verges on a psychosis because of the dulcet tones in which his mistress addresses her offspring.

Miss Catherine wears her red hair in a pony tail—about six hairs deep. She has her father's brilliant blue eyes, her mother's lovely, tapering hands, and an inordinately alert expression for one so young. Nobody calls her "Sam," of course, in spite of her father's predictions—not even "Kate" as yet. Virginia calls her "Sweetheart," her old man, "Little darlin'," and she responds to both with the broadest toothless smile in seven counties. Altogether a remarkable child is the Princess of Tara, who has never been known to whimper in the presence of strangers.

The O'Sheas would be the last people to suggest that their own formula for happiness is workable for everyone else. For one thing, in what other marriage would you find a combination of temperament so unique that there has never been a fight?

"Of course we disagree on things sometimes," said Virginia, who talks easily—if shyly—when the glib man of the house has wandered elsewhere. "I like to think about things, discuss them, before I make up my mind. It doesn't take Mike that long," she snapped her fingers, "to know what he thinks."

Then, if anyone as beautiful as that can be said to grin, Virginia grinned. "Like the flying saucers—I don't know whether I believe in them, but I've read and heard a lot and I just wanted to talk about whether they could be real. As far as Michael was concerned, it was a waste of time as a topic of discussion. When I carried my discussion one word too far, he roared, 'It's ridiculous—of course there aren't any flying saucers!' and stomped off. That was final.

"Sometimes there are more important things, more personal ones, but there still aren't any arguments. If we talk about something any time at all without agreeing, Mike starts getting nervous. Then I know that he's either going to give in, even though he isn't convinced, or lose his temper and walk away. Once he does that, it wouldn't do me a bit of good to go after him. I have to wait until he cools off and then explain that I didn't mean to argue, only to get things clear in my own mind."

Himself had meandered rather than stomped back on the scene and stood leaning against a wall, listening. "You don't keep a box score on who gives in more often. The way I feel—and Virginia, too, I guess—is that it boils down to a pretty fundamental question: which is more important, my marriage or proving that I'm right? You think about that a minute. Pretty simple, isn't it? I know people so insecure that they have to be right all of the time, regardless of where the chips fall. Me, I'd rather be married to Virginia." His volatile face was sobered, his voice nakedly sincere, as he added, "I wouldn't know what to do without her; my life revolves around her and the baby. Can you weigh being right all the time against that?"

They were both silent a moment before Virginia said in agreement with her husband's thought, "We don't make a big thing of it, that we never fight. But fights do leave scars, you know."

"They leave scars," Mike repeated. "Corny as it sounds, you can forgive someone you love—and really mean it with all your heart—but you can't forget something cruel that was said or done in the heat of anger. A little of love is killed, a little of closeness that's essential to marriage slips away. because you start putting up barriers so you don't get hurt in that particular way again . . . Nothing's worth that.

"Sometimes I give in to Virginia on a point when I know she's dead wrong; it doesn't matter. She's gonna find out for herself that she was wrong, but that doesn't matter, either—I don't want her dragging her heels over to me to say that she's sorry. Sorry for what? That she had a conviction? That's more than most have. Sorry she found out she was wrong? So she learned something. I let her have her way when it seems that important to her. She has let me have mine and I've really pulled a rock—but she never held it against me afterward that I was wrong."

"I guess you could put it this way," Virginia summed it up. "I love Michael and he loves me, and no difference of opinion is as important as what we have together and the way we feel about each other."

It's an old-fashioned working philosophy for movie stars, reinforced by one more secret. The latter isn't anything they talk about, though O'Shea said in passing, "One of those bums I was reading one night when I couldn't sleep said a man should always treat his wife like a perfect stranger." Meaning, of course, that he should continue to observe the courtesies, make that little extra effort to please. If you're lucky, you were born a good guy or a nice girl—and you can get along fine with your fellow men with no more than that. But the people one remembers with special pleasure show a little more thoughtfulness, a little more consideration. It's what the O'Shea's do for each other.

After the birth of the baby, Virginia was dissatisfied with her shape, silly as it sounds. The superfluous weight had been melted off by intelligent dieting but she felt that she was too soft. She began to take tennis lessons from her friend and former world champion Alice Marble. Mike was not far behind, the first day they walked on a court together. He knew from nothing about the game, so little that he asked if a high lob constituted a foul—but his old lady was learning, so Himself drifted over to the court. He listened with pleasure to the report that his wife would be a very good player. (When a bystander expressed surprise that anyone as dainty as Virginia could belt the ball so hard, Alice shook her head. "It doesn't surprise me. The first time I shook hands with Virginia, she nearly broke my tired old tennis hand.") He admired, in a spate of blarney, the two long-legged blondes as they stood side by side, tirelessly working on some stroke or other. The champ explained, the star listened, and then they dipped into a basket of balls to try it.

On the sideline the rusty-haired, bright-eyed guy sat. Just watching, maybe—but as the balls began to spray over the opposite side of the court, he rose and wandered in that direction. Probably there was never a more incongruous figure on a tennis court than Mike O'Shea in his battered Stetson and high-heeled boots, but he never left. Without a word, he collected balls so that Virginia need not interrupt her lesson to fetch them when the basket was empty. Just a little extra effort.

Similarly, there is Virginia's attitude toward baseball. As everyone who has been within earshot of her husband knows, he digs baseball the most. He not only roots for the Hollywood team named the Stars, but in the past he has worked out with them when they played at home and traveled with them on road trips. Virginia couldn't care less. She knows perfectly well what baseball is all about, having played it in school, but in her adult years she has become mildly disenchanted. So why does she go to the games? Well, Mike likes her to go, so she makes the little extra effort.

He isn't sure it's worth it. He introduces the team's leading slugger, saying, "He hit .320 on the season, honey!" and Virginia says to the man, "Hello." He brings one of the fielders over with the admiring statement, "Got the best arm in the league, sweetie. Nobody ever takes two bases on him!" and Virginia says, "How do you do?" to the modest hero.

"They look at her kind of funny," Mike said in some embarrassment.

He had some hopes for her one night last season, when they were sitting in the box of the club president. It was one of the more exciting games, and throughout Virginia sat on the edge of her seat. More or less. When the last play was made, the O'Shea turned to Virginia and asked, "Well, how did you like that?"

There was a faraway look in her beautiful eyes. "Like what, Michael?"

"The game, honey. Wasn't it great?"

"Oh, the game!" she answered. "I didn't see it. The drive-in theatre next door is showing a picture of mine that I haven't seen, and I was watching it. I couldn't hear anything, of course, but if you look right over there—see, between those two trees—the screen is perfectly clear."

"And us sittin' with the president and his wife!" Mike groans when he remembers it. Then he leans over to kiss Virginia. "My old lady," he says with enormous pride. "My old lady!" END

Now—brush away tooth decay after eating sweets!

New Ipana with WD-9 blocks formation of tooth-decay acids for hours. So always use it after eating...as your dentist recommends.

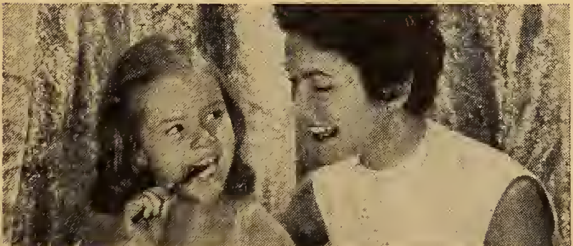
Almost everybody eats some sweets—a particularly satisfying source of quick energy.

But after eating sweets, you should cut down the risk of cavities . . . with new Ipana Tooth Paste. Here's why.

Many foods team up with mouth bacteria and their enzymes to form tooth-decay acids. But WD-9 in new Ipana blocks formation of these acids for hours—because it is an active-enzyme and bacteria destroyer.

For best results, use new Ipana regularly after eating (the way most dentists recommend) BEFORE decay acids can do their damage. In a 2-year clinical test with hundreds of people who ate their normal amount of sweets, brushing this way prevented new cavities for most people.

So remember, while no dentifrice can stop all cavities—you can protect teeth from sweet foods by brushing this way with Ipana.



New minty flavor encourages children to brush teeth. No strong, medicinal taste in new Ipana with WD-9. And it makes your mouth so fresh and clean that even one brushing can stop most unpleasant mouth odor all day long.

Tampax won't "show" on "those days"

Tampax and bathing suits were made for each other! You can scarcely think of a bulky external pad in connection with today's sleek suits, but Tampax is different. It's internal sanitary protection—is actually invisible, once it's in place.

Tampax and sun-bathing were made for each other! The hotter it gets, the more need for Tampax. For this modern sanitary protection actually prevents odor from forming! And you'll surely be delighted to learn that Tampax never chafes or irritates. The wearer doesn't even feel it!

Tampax and beaches were made for each other! Yes! you can even go swimming while wearing Tampax. Think what that means during vacation days. You don't even need to worry about taking along extra protection. A whole month's supply of Tampax can be slipped into the purse. Then, too, (and this is important!) Tampax is very easy to dispose of. Get a package this month! At drug or notion counters. 3 absorbency-sizes: Regular, Super, Junior. Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Mass.

LOUELLA PARSONS' GOOD NEWS

THE GALA MAGNIFICENT OBSESSION

Out-Monroe-ing Monroe, Mamie Van Doren came to the première in the lowest-cut gown of the evening, said she cried through the picture.

Never in his life has easy-going Alan Ladd been as furious as he is over the front-page charges of the Reno Chamber of Commerce that Alan asked for $500 cash, hotel and traveling accommodations for eight people and a tape recorder before he would show up in Reno to accept their annual Silver Spur award for Shane.

Alan won't say anything, but here is the blow-by-blow account furnished by Alan's press agent, Warren Cowan, who handled the unfortunate arrangements.

"It was a complete misunderstanding," Worren says, "due to the fact, I believe, that all our talks were over the phone. Take the tape recorder thing, first.

"When the Reno committee originally called, they asked if there was anything special they could furnish to make the event as enjoyable as possible for Alan. They said they wanted all his children, his wife and his secretary to come along.

"I told them that the children had a tape recorder on which they've recorded many important events in Alan's life both here and abroad, and if it was possible to rent one or to loan them one it would please the Ladds and save taking along their own heavy machine.

"Nobody wanted a new tape recorder. The Ladds have one."

Warren went on, "Now about that $500 cash. This is a complete goof on all sides. When I told them that the Ladds did not like to fly and had refused the offer of a chartered plane, I was asked how many people would be in the party and about how much the train fares might run.

"After checking with the railroad company about fares for only the people already invited by the Reno officials, I told them the amount would run about $500, round trip. That's how that odd amount got in the picture. Believe me, if Alan were charging the regular rates he gets for a personal appearance, it would be many times $500.

"It never crossed his mind to charge for an appearance in which he was to be honored with an award.

"Believe me, I know Alan in a business way and I can say that there is no more generous man to deal with nor one more fair. He's heartsick about the Silver Spur's award being called off because of misunderstandings."

I privately believe that everything could have been straightened out had the Reno

(THEIR LATEST FILM) DEAN MARTIN AND JERRY LEWIS BUMPED INTO JANET LEIGH AND DECIDED TO PROVE THEY WEREN'T FEUDING.

After which Dean dragged Jerry back to the golf course. "I'm a rider, not a pedestrian!" Jerry said, would play only in a sitting position.

For the benefit of fans and customers the boys demonstrated their undying affection for each other—but some friends say all is not yet rosy.

As usual, Jerry took over the floor show and completely drowned out Janet who was trying to sing "Wanted" for the benefit of Dean.

PREMIERE BROUGHT MANY STARS OUT IN THEIR FINERY—AND MADE A MAJOR STAR OUT OF U-I'S EX-TRUCK DRIVER ROCK HUDSON.

Jane Powell and Pat Nerney arrived together. Both now admit that they may marry soon—and Pat would like an African safari honeymoon!

Still very happy, Lana Turner arrived with Lex Barker. Both hope for an increase in the family soon, have added a room to their home.

Debbie Reynolds arrived with young actor Hugh O'Brian. (Be sure to read the story of Debbie's dating—and non-dating—life on page 38.)

officials "held their horses" instead of giving out with a blast which hit the front pages of the newspapers.

JOAN CRAWFORD called me almost in tears the day a Los Angeles newspaper started a series of stories reputedly based on her life story.

"If the other installments are like this first one," Joan said grimly, "I should be tarred and feathered."

I hadn't read the offending article at this time and I asked what was so awful.

"For one thing, it says that a reporter asked Mrs. Sterling Hayden if she had ever met me. Sterling was my leading man in Johnny Guitar, as you know. Mrs. Hayden is quoted as replying: 'Not yet, but I hope to meet Miss Crawford. And if I do I shall slap her face after what she did to Sterling all during the making of the picture.'"

It's hardly a friendly remark. But I told Joan she shouldn't take it too hard. I know. I've been panned by experts.

"But I'm so puzzled about Sterling," she protested. "We didn't have an unkind word during the making of the picture. With Mercedes McCambridge—that's another matter, one I'd prefer not to discuss. But Mr. Hayden always seemed very friendly.

"After the sneak preview of the picture I sent him a telegram congratulating him on his performance. Later, I sent him another congratulatory wire when I read in your column that he had been cast for a fine role in a new film."

Joan) he gave out an interview in which he stated, "I've had enough of Joan Crawford!"

If it's true that Joan loves a good fight—it appears she's got one brewing with the Sterling Haydens.

I HAVE LIVED at last—finally caught up with Portland Mason, five-year-old "wonder child" of the James Masons—who was the sensation (pro and con) of Kirk Douglas' cocktail party.

"Porty" spoke up and told me that she was in love with Kirk but she thought the party was lousy, principally, I took it, because of the presence of his date, Anne Buydens.

I wasn't close enough to hear what she was saying to Clifton Webb but it must have been something judging from his open-

Later Clifton remarked, "I understand this child has been swimming since she was six months old. It's my considered opinion that she should remain under water at all cocktail parties."

THE ACTOR who got the most cheers and caused the most excitement at the opening of the Icecapades was John Agar! Quite a few important stars experienced the surprise of their careers when the autograph kids outside passed them up in favor of Shirley Temple's ex-husband.

John looks absolutely great these days; he's been on the wagon almost a year, and he's very happy with his wife, Loretta.

I'm very glad that Universal-International has signed John to a long term contract. I hope all his bad luck is behind him.

When she found out that she was the cause of the trouble, she dropped him like a hotcake . . . She washes her face in soap and water which probably accounts for her very fresh scrubbed look . . . Men, married or single, fall for her practically on first sight . . . She's a great listener, never interrupts . . . Some women don't like her because they resent her . . . But she has a surprising number of women friends including lovely Rita Gam who is devoted to her . . . She eats out almost all the time, preferring cafe cooking to her own in her small apartment . . . If she doesn't have a date, she'll drop by a small cafe in Beverly Hills with a girl friend and have an early dinner before going home . . . Few fans recognize her in public—but they'll know her by this time next year after her five important pictures with such male stars as Bing Crosby, Bill Holden, Stewart Granger, Clark Gable, Ray Milland and other topnotchers are released . . . When a man is talking to her (even if it's business) she looks directly at him (there's a siren tip, gals. Don't let your attention wander from 'em) . . . At first Bing Crosby didn't want her in Country Girl, thought she was too flirtatious and more interested in romances than in work. After three days she had the crooner, like all the other males, eating out of her hand. On the set, she's all business—no monkey business. . . . She's the greatest find since Ingrid Bergman, the very first actress ever to have her picture on the covers of three national magazines within one month.

Mrs. Grace Brown of Scarsdale, New York, keeps her hands lovely as a bride's with Jergens Lotion. She says:

"I use detergents as often as you ...but Jergens Lotion keeps my hands pretty!"

Grace does plenty of laundry by hand. Detergents help, but they could ruin her hands. How does she keep them so pretty?

Jergens Lotion! This famous formula has been continuously improved for fifty years to help heal chapped, red hands instantly!

No other lotion works faster, or penetrates deeper. Lovelier hands at once! Jergens never leaves a sticky film (as many others do).

Never did I get an anonymous tip which worked out so well as did the telegram from Jackson Lake, Wyoming, telling me that Robert Taylor and Ursula Thiess would be married aboard a cabin cruiser within the hour.

Usually I don't operate so fast on a tip from an unknown source but this time my newspaper instinct came to the fore. Frankly, I had suspected as much and had stated a week previously that I thought Bob and Ursula would elope.

That they did. And they had the knot tied up in the fishing country which Bob loves so much and where he has spent so many happy vacations.

I believe that these two will be vey happy. About six months ago they tested their love by a long separation, but they found they just couldn't live without each other.

For the first time in his life, Bob is a family man. Ursula has two children whom he adores.

Marge and Gower Champion, both scared of elephants, do a dance with twenty elephants in Esther Williams' Jupiter's Darling—dancing on their backs, under them, being swept up in their trunks, and everything else conceivable.

Met Helen Rose, the very attractive brunette stylist who dresses all the glamour girls at MGM (including Ava Gardner, Esther Williams, Liz Taylor and Ann Blyth) on the screen and many of them in their private wardrobes.

I asked her how about passing on some fashion hints to our readers—how to look chic on perhaps not too much money—or any other ideas she might have.

"To the girl with the budgeted wardrobe, nothing is a greater boon than the current sweater and skirt outfit. Sweaters are so lovely now for all occasions that a working girl can wear the tailored type to the office and bloom out at night in the most exotic of cock-

Listerine instantly stops bad breath and keeps it stopped usually for hours on end . . . four times better than any tooth paste.

Listerine clinically proved 4 times better than tooth paste

Is it any wonder Listerine Antiseptic in recent clinical tests averaged at least four times more effective in stopping bad breath odors than the chlorophyll products or tooth pastes it was tested against? Make it a habit to always gargle Listerine.

No Tooth Paste Kills Odor Germs Like This . . . Instantly

Listerine Antiseptic does what no tooth paste does—instantly kills bacteria, by millions—stops bad breath instantly, and usually for hours on end. Bacterial fermentation of proteins which are always present in the mouth is by far the most common cause of bad breath. Research shows that breath stays sweeter longer depending on the degree to which you reduce germs in the mouth.

WHEN I WENT out to Judy Garland's house to tape a radio interview with Miss Star Re-Born, both of her daughters, eight-year-old Liza, and seventeen-months-old Lorna, were very much present.

Liza, with her enormous brown eyes and Audrey Hepburn haircut, sat in on the recording. When her mother missed a cue, Liza said, "You goofed!"

Liza can stand on her head, a feat she performs at the slightest provocation. However, this mature child who talks like a grown-up, says, "Standing on my head hasn't done me much good socially—so far."

Lorna, a little beauty who looks like a great big doll, imitates everything her older sister does. Not quite able to stand on her head, she rolls around clutching her toes with her hands, like a tumbleweed.

It can't be that Judy is as highly nervous as she is cracked up to be. The kids are all over her, literally in her hair, climbing over her shoulders or grabbing piggyback rides. All this, Judy takes in stride.

When I left, Liza accompanied me to the door. She said, hospitably, "Come again. There's always something doing around here." And, I believe her.

had moved out were all over town.

"It's true Mother has taken her own apartment," Mitzi tells me, "but we did not quarrel about Jack Bean (whom Mitzi is engaged to marry (?)) or anything else too important.

"Mother just thought I was old enough to start living my own life. She said she'd been picking up after me for years and it was time she took a rest from both my wardrobe and my emotions."

It made me very happy to entertain the charming Mrs. William Randolph Hearst on one of the two evenings she spent recently in Beverly Hills. I can't recall a visitor to our town whom more of my star friends were eager to meet. Millicent, in her stunning blue gown and necklace of cabochon sapphires and diamonds was a gracious figure greeting the guests with her two handsome sons, William, Jr., and David, and their beautiful wives by her side.

We had cocktails in the garden and buffet dinner inside later. But the party really began to roll when Jimmy McHugh and Freddie Karger started alternating at the piano.

Judy Garland, who arrived late with Sid Luft, was in fine fettle and gave with encore after encore.

Jane Wyman, in a stunning white taffeta dress, sang "Sunny Side Of The Street," with composer McHugh playing his own tune.

Then Jane—along with June Haver and Fred MacMurray—gave forth with some close harmony that would do credit to the Andrews Sisters. Fred brought along his saxophone.

But I think the singing which surprised everyone the most—and I mean Joan Crawford, Merle Oberon, Lana Turner, Lex Barker and Clifton Webb, among many more—was when Jack Warner, boss of Warners, "invited" himself to sing a number—and he was terrific. After he received rounds and rounds of applause, Jack said, "May cast myself in a musical with Doris Day."

Personal opinions: Hope Doris Day and Frank Sinatra remember to remain young at heart while they're making Young At Heart at Warners; no fireworks, please.

I'm very happy that Doe Avedon's career is off to such a big start in The High And The Mighty, particularly after the big tragedy in her life. Her husband was killed in an automobile accident on their way to Hollywood.

Eleanor Parker can't hide it anymore. She's very much in love with artist Paul Clemens.

My, my. Isn't Terry Moore quiet these days?

Anne Baxter looks like a young Marlene Dietrich in Carnival Story, sooooo sexy.

Don't miss Three Coins In The Fountain, the most charming and delightful picture since Roman Holiday. You'll love Maggie McNamara, Dorothy McGuire, Jean Peters and that old smoothie, Clifton Webb.

I hear that Debbie Reynolds saves more money out of her salary than any other actress in Hollywood. Smart girl.

And the girl who has gained the most confidence in herself is Janet Leigh. A few years back Janet wouldn't have thought of putting her foot down to a studio. But she did recently—and plenty—when she told two studios, MGM and U-I, she had no intention of doing anything but loaf when she went to New York with Tony!

THE LETTER BOX: Pat Kennedy (no relation to Peter Lawford) of Key West, Florida, writes: "Thought you might be interested to hear that Dick Haymes and Rita Hayworth made a great hit here—and that's more than I can say for conceited Robert Wagner when he was making 12-Mile Reef in our city. Dick and Rita were always cordial and friendly and we are sorry for their troubles. As for Robert Wagner, he should take lessons from a veteran like Gilbert Roland (in the same cast) and learn how to treat the public. Mr. Wagner can be replaced whether he knows it or not." Well, he knows it now, Pat.

I continue to be amazed at the amount of mail to this department from Europe, the most amazing angle being the excellent English in which it is written. From Barbara Sivgard, Stockholm, we hear: "One of our newspapers recently took a poll of the most popular American actors and actresses. The winning star was Elizabeth Taylor followed by Marilyn Monroe, Doris Day, Pier Angeli and Mitzi Gaynor. The leading actor was Gregory Peck with Farley Granger, Alan Ladd, Audie Murphy and Frank Sinatra as runners-up."

That's all for now. See you next month.

John Agar's sudden popularity has put his career back on a solid footing. His private life with wife Loretta is now well under control, too.

Great lovers are few and far between—and hard to find!

■ Hollywood, with its penchant for repeating its successes, has been combing the Latin countries for another Rudolph Valentino. Now MGM hopes to have found Valentino II in Carlos Thompson.

If you missed Carlos in Fort Algiers you can see him with Lana Turner in Flame And The Flesh and with Eleanor Parker in Valley Of The Kings.

Thompson is tall. dark and twenty-nine. He has been regarded as a "De Carlo property," because it was Yvonne who discovered him at the Uruguayan Film Festival in 1952 and said, "I must have you for my new picture!" She brought him to the States, got him the lead in Fort Algiers. But instead of signing with her little company as she had expected, he signed with MGM.

Piper Laurie—and his other dates say he is an intellectual. The son of a former CBS correspondent in South America, Juan José Mundanschaffter (his real name) was educated in the States as a child and went to college in Buenos Aires. He says he has written three books in Spanish and is now at work on a fourth.

Since the Gary Coopers have been estranged, Rocky has beeen doing Hollywood with Carlos.

In the biggest role of his career, wealthy Rock Hudson brings tragedy, then love, to Jane Wyman.

Picture of the Month: MAGNIFICENT OBSESSION

■ Based on a novel by Lloyd C. Douglas (author of The Robe) the Magnificent Obsession is an inspirational, poignant drama of the power, usually latent within men, to love and help each other. The use of this power, as Otto Kruger explains, is the obsession. Once you choose to give yourself in the service of others, the giving becomes a need and driving force in your own life. Millionaire Rock Hudson has been squandering his life in high times and daredevil stunts, one of which indirectly leads to the death of an eminent physician—Jane Wyman's husband. In clumsy attempts at repayment, Hudson involves Jane Wyman in an accident which causes her blindness. Then a gradual transformation occurs in Hudson as the "magnificent obsession" takes over his life and brings him to personal fulfillment. Here, basically, is a love story charged with moments of great tenderness and pathos. At times it borders on sentimentality but its spiritual message is never lost. Among the cast are Barbara Rush, Agnes Moorehead, Gregg Palmer, Judy Nugent. Technicolor—U.I.

THREE COINS IN THE FOUNTAIN Toss a coin into the Fountain of Trevi and next year you'll be back in Rome. I'm willing—because this CinemaScopic production makes Italy look like dreamland. The plot can't compare to the scenery but that doesn't spoil the fun. Arriving in Rome to work at the U.S. Distribution Agency, Maggie McNamara tosses a coin into the fountain and presto meets Prince Dino (Louis Jourdan). The poor guy doesn't have a chance when she sets him up for a proposal. Jean Peters, not so happy, because there's an agency rule forbidding co-workers to date, decides to go home. Rossano Brazzi (the co-worker in question) risks all, however, to proclaim his love. For 15 years Dorothy McGuire has been enamored of and secretary to novelist Clifton Webb. Until this year he has ignored her existence. This year, though, he acts like Cupid all over the place. Frank Sinatra sings the title song.—20th Century-Fox.

THE HIGH AND THE MIGHTY A four-engine airliner takes off from Honolulu for San Francisco with 17 passengers aboard. Before that "routine" flight is over those passengers go through an experience that will leave a lifetime mark. Pilot Robert Stack is young, assured—but he's never faced an emergency before. Co-pilot John Wayne is an old timer, veteran of three wars and sole survivor of a plane crash that killed his wife and child (he, himself, was pilot). When this plane runs into trouble Stack is prepared to ditch it: Wayne wants to keep it in the air. Tension mounts between them. And the passengers, alerted to danger, reveal themselves—sometimes in flashbacks, often by their action in the present situation. Claire Trevor, David Brian, Laraine Day, Robert Newton, Phil Harris, Jan Sterling, Paul Kelly, Sidney Blackmer, Doe Avedon and Joy Kim are among the large cast who make this film a gripping, human event. CinemaScope—Warners.

DEMETRIUS AND THE GLADIATORS

If the CinemaScope sets look familiar, remember The Robe. Once again, a character created in that famous novel becomes a hero of a film about early Christians. The hero is Demetrius (Victor Mature) who came into possession of the robe when Jesus was crucified. This spectacular production deals less with religion and more with gore. In it Mature lays waste three tigers and five gladiators in the Roman arena. A Christian at first, bitterness turns him temporarily into a pagan under the eager guidance of Susan Hayward, aunt (through marriage) of the mad emperor Caligula (Jay Robinson). But Debra Paget and Michael Rennie bring him back into the fold. Caligula, whose lunacy becomes unbearable, is finally overthrown by his own guards and is replaced by Claudius (Barry Jones) who promises the end of persecution. With Anne Bancroft, Richard Egan, William Marshall, Ernest Borgnine. Technicolor —20th-Fox.

ON THE WATERFRONT One of the outstanding films of the year, On The Waterfront touches the peak of dramatic realism. It's a story of longshoremen enslaved by crooked union leaders, and in particular, it's the story of Marlon Brando's awakening to a sense of truth and loyalty. Brando, under the thumb of his big brother Charlie (Rod Steiger) the union boss' right hand man, is instrumental in the murder of young, well-liked Joey Doyle who had the nerve to speak out against union boss Lee J. Cobb. From the moment of Doyle's death, when Brando meets his sister Eva Marie Saint, a struggle begins in him which leads inevitably to a showdown. Here, in this graphic film of mob rule, one sees the terror and helplessness of its victims, and the long-reaching effect of both on their minds and lives. Directed by Elia Kazan. With Karl Malden, Pat Henning—Col.

DIAL M FOR MURDER A hit on Broadway, Dial M For Murder is even better as a movie under Alfred Hitchcock's direction. Ray Milland, ex-tennis champ and very jealous husband, goes about his London apartment coolly plotting the death of his wife. That's Grace Kelly, who's in love with writer Robert Cummings. Grace is faithful to Milland now, though—she thinks he deserves it. Ray blackmails an old schoolmate (Anthony Dawson) into murdering Grace. Everything is perfectly planned except that Grace doesn't go easily. In fact, she kills Dawson in self-defense. Husband hears it all on the phone and is only a little ruffled. After all, he can still see her hanged. Trouble is, you can fool the judge and the jury but you can't kid Scotland Yard Inspector John Williams. The acting is polished, the suspense is terrific. Warnercolor—Warners.

THE SARACEN BLADE Set in the 13th century, The Saracen Blade is full of baronial estates, violent passions and noblemen invading the Holy Land to tilt swords with the Saracens when they tire of warring at home. For Ricardo Montalban, son of a blacksmith, it's full of confusion. Since I couldn't tell you the plot if I took all day, I'll tell you that Montalban starts life with nothing but nerve and winds up with that and Betta St. John. His aim is to avenge his father's death. Count Siniscola (Michael Ansara) and his son (Rick Jason) killed dad. But before Montalban can carry out his plan he has to escape from the dungeon Jason tossed him in, become a knight, fight the Saracens, win land and titles and marry a woman he loathes (Carolyn Jones). All that's enough to keep anyone hopping. With Whitfield Connor. Technicolor—Columbia.

FLAME AND THE FLESH Take this nice musician Bonar Colleano. He invites Lana Turner into his home (that morning Lana's landlady had kicked her out) only to have her fall for his roommate Carlos Thompson. Does she care that Bonar loves her? Does she care that Carlos is engaged to Pier Angeli? No, sir. Does she even care for Carlos Thompson? Well, kind of. She runs off with him and they go from one town in Italy to another. He takes singing jobs in cafes and she takes to flirting with the customers. Carlos gets terribly jealous. Lana, I love you, he cries. She shrugs her shoulders. Tell it to the Marines, she says, or words to that effect. Until the day Charles Goldner hires Carlos and propositions Lana all within a matter of hours. This is too much for Carlos. Goodbye, he says. Lana shrugs her shoulders and walks off into the mist. Technicolor—MGM.

RIVER OF NO RETURN Robert Mitchum and son (Tommy Rettig) live in the middle of a wilderness. Only thing that keeps off Indians is Mitchum's rifle. Has a horse, too, just in case he runs out of ammunition. Rory Calhoun and guitar-strumming Marilyn Monroe arrive one day via raft. Rory makes off with the gun and the horse—he's heading up river to stake out a gold claim. Mitchum's left with Monroe on his hands. Boy, he's sore. Practically tosses her onto the raft because without that rifle and that horse he's uneasy. Pretty rough ride up the river. Marilyn takes it like a trouper but she can't wring a smile out of Mitchum. Little Tommy sure goes for her, though (he had lost his mother). When they catch up with that rascal Calhoun, Mitchum softens. Sure makes little Tommy happy when he pops the question to Marilyn. CinemaScope-Technicolor—20th Century-Fox.

SECRET OF THE INCAS Charlton Heston is lounging around in Peru, picking up a buck when he can, never shaving and always exchanging threatening words with Thomas Mitchell, a broken-down, unsavory finagler. What Heston is interested in, if anyone cares, is a fabulously jeweled sunhurst said to be buried in the tomb of an ancient Inca. Well, Inca country is just around the corner, along with Inca Yma Sumac who sings prayers while archaeologist Robert Young digs his way into the remains of some goddess' grave. And here comes Nicole Maurey, late of Rumania. She's dodging Leon Askin, a consul who wishes to bring her back alive to fatherland. Heston steals Askin's plane, stows Nicole in it and off they go to steal the sunburst. Heston acts like a heel but it's never too late for a man to get a shave and settle down, is it? Technicolor—Para.

BLACK HORSE CANYON In the days when horses were horses it wasn't so easy to throw saddles on their backs and lead 'em to a bridle path. Mari Blanchard used to own a black colt named Outlaw. He was so smart she taught him how to slip the latch of the corral gate. Now he's racing all over the countryside, slipping latches and freeing every horse in sight. Joel McCrea and his partner, Race Gentry, want to start their own horse ranch but with Outlaw loose it's impossible. Murvyn Vye, if he can't have Outlaw himself, would like to see him shot. So there's trouble when McCrea captures the stallion, and there's trouble when Race Gentry falls for Mari, because it's in the cards that she was made for McCrea. Anyone can tell: they talk so mean to each other, and Gentry is still too young for marriage. Technicolor—U.I.

THE EGG AND I The warm, unusual humor of The Egg And I made the book a best seller and maybe you've seen the movie before, but it's worth another glance. Claudette Colbert is a city bride who's borne into the mountains by her groom (Fred MacMurray) to cope with a dilapidated farm and the raising of chickens. Claudette knows nothing about farming but her groom knows even less. He's dying to learn, though, and what the elements won't teach him experience and the neighbors will. Their closest neighbors are a clan of shiftless but lovable hillbillies headed by Marjorie Main and Percy Kilbride. Also around is wealthy divorcee Louise Allbritton. Claudette has plenty to worry about without her—especially when the farm she and MacMurray put together with their own hands burns down. But tragedy takes a backseat in The Egg And I which abounds with life and good will.—U.I.

SOUTHWEST PASSAGE Rod Cameron has a pack of camels (life-size) and he's convinced they'll forge a way across the desert to California. John Ireland is in no position to argue. He just robbed a bank and the posse is hot on his heels. He joins Rod's caravan as a doctor, leaving Joanne Dru behind to bury her brother (Darryl Hickman) who was shot down by the same posse. When Joanne catches up to Ireland she's tired of bank thieves and appalled at his willingness to amputate whatever limbs are bothering his patients. She tells Cameron the sordid truth, he beats up Ireland and sends him into the desert. Apaches haven't been attacking: they think the camels are gods, but when they wise up arrows fly across a desert waterhole. Know who found that waterhole in the first place? Same guy who gives up crime to become a hero. Pathecolor—United Artists.

RECOMMENDED FILMS NOW PLAYING

THE CAINE MUTINY (Col.): Humphrey Bogart, José Ferrer, Van Johnson, Fred MacMurray, newcomers Bob Francis and May Wynn star in this excellent film adaptation of Herman Wouk's best-selling Pulitzer Prize novel about Navy life.

HER TWELVE MEN (MGM): Greer Garson, as charming as ever, plays the only woman teacher in a boys' boarding school where she is alternately loved and loathed by fellow-teacher Robert Ryan. Technicolor.

LUCKY ME (Warners): Doris Day is delightful in this Technicolor musical about show people. With Bob Cummings, Phil Silvers, Bill Goodwin, Eddie Foy, Jr.—and a lot of top tunes you'll love.

APACHE (U.A.): Burt Lancaster stars as the Indian Massai, one of the last and bravest of his tribe. Jean Peters plays his equally fearless girl. Technicolor.

PRINCE VALIANT (20th-Fox): Bob Wagner, James Mason, Janet Leigh, Debra Paget star in this swashbuckling, romantic tale of medieval chivalry. CinemaScope and Technicolor.

FRENCH LINE (RKO): Jane Russell sings, dances and clowns her way through this Technicolor musical about a girl too rich to be married. With Gilbert Roland.

EXECUTIVE SUITE (MGM): June Allyson, Bill Holden, Fredric March, Barbara Stanwyck, Shelley Winters, Walter Pidgeon, Paul Douglas are among the exciting people involved in the business (and love) life of a big corporation.

Ex-husband Charlie O'Curran acted as Betty's dance director, gave up Paramount job to rehearse her night-club act . . .

. . . in which Betty did two to five shows a day from New York to London. Her ambitions are fame and a million in the bank . . .

. . . and she felt O'Curran, like her first husband Ted Briskin, was more a hindrance than a help to her all-important career.

LOVE COMES LAST

Betty Hutton has just ended her second marriage—and knows exactly why. There's something else she wants far more than love.

■ When Betty Hutton and husband Charlie O'Curran announced their separation, Betty said, "I know everyone will blame me, but in my heart I did my best."

Charlie said, "I was eighty per cent wrong. I still love Betty desperately. We just couldn't beat the career obstacle."

Betty June Thornburg is married to her career first. After that comes the husband. The reason lies in the terrible poverty she knew as a child.

Her father Percy, a railroad brakeman, deserted his family when Betty was three, her sister Marion was five.

Her mother worked in the cereal factories of Battle Creek for $12 a week and later went to work punch-pressing sheet metal at sixteen cents an hour. When Betty was seven the family moved to Detroit where Mrs. Thornburg got a job in the Chrysler factory. This time she made twenty-two cents an hour.

Betty tried to help out by singing in saloons and on street corners.

"I'll never forget those days," Betty has said, "singing for whatever coins people wanted to throw. We even made home brew and tried to sell it."

As Betty grew up, she wanted more than anything else in life not to be poor.

At fourteen, she left school to sing in amateur contests. At sixteen she signed with Vincent Lopez for $65 a week.

At eighteen she fell in love with a successful New York lawyer. She expected rainbows. She wound up paying most of the expenses.

Disillusioned, she threw herself into work. Buddy de Sylva brought her out to Paramount. There she fell in love with a married director. He talked about a divorce but it never came off.

Ted Briskin, son of a wealthy manufacturer, met Betty when she was on the rebound and married her.

Betty had said many times, "I've worked too hard to give up my career for any man." Ted thought she was fooling. He himself had relatively little money, so Betty took care of most expenses. The divorce was inevitable.

Two years ago when she married dance director Charlie O'Curran, Betty said, "At last I've found happiness."

She quit the studio—her last few films hadn't made money—and embarked on a personal appearance tour. Charlie supervised the show.

Their separation came in April. Charlie learned that he couldn't compete with Betty's career, or even share it.

"Twenty years from now," Betty has said, "I'll be just like Sophie Tucker, singing from one club to another."

Love is important to Betty. But take love out of her life and she still has her mansion, her cars, her two daughters and her great box office appeal. But take her career out of her life and the spectre of poverty returns to haunt her.

One of Betty's friends once said, "The only man Hutton could stay happily married to would be one who makes more money than she does."

Betty earns about $5,000 a week. Take it from there.

Grace Kelly, recently one of Bing's frequent dates, may have replaced Mona Freeman, Margot James, in the Wife-To-Crosby-Sweepstakes. Careful to introduce his dates to his sons, Bing hopes that they will not resent a possible second wife or compare her to Dixie.

Dad has his hands full

Bing is playing his toughest role these days—father and mother to a college romeo, golf-happy twins and a high school boy!

BY WILLIAM BARBOUR

Budding star Gary has given his fraternity pin—not a ring—to Barbara Stanislaus, twenty-one-year-old college senior.

■ Although Bing Crosby would be the last to admit it, he is sacrificing his career for the guidance and welfare of his children. Since the boys have lost their mother, he believes this is the least he can do. When General Electric asked him to name his own figure for a weekly TV show, Bing said, "Thanks a lot, but I just don't have the time."

The jaunty crooner abdicated his radio program, too, although it has been practically a national institution for the last twenty years. But he did suggest his son Gary as a summer radio replacement. Bing did this for three reasons: Gary was twenty-one in June and he wants to make show business his career. Bing wants his first-born to see what it's like to be on his own. And he wants the boy to concentrate on work instead of girls this summer.

Bing has always given attention to long-range training and discipline. Lindsay, the youngest of the four Crosby boys, was ten when he said to Bing, "I'd like to play golf the way you do, Dad."

Irish Lullaby

"Jim encouraged me to keep busy," Ann said, told of her flights with him and TV shows. "I've felt much too well to be idle!"

by Louella Parsons

Just before her baby was born, Ann Blyth had a chat with Louella—including a few reminiscences—and some predictions of things to come!

■ Ann Blyth McNulty was exactly two weeks and three days away from giving birth to her first child, it later turned out, when she arrived in my garden (newly landscaped at no small expense, I might add) carrying in her arms an unusually large assortment of bundles.

In a casual but curious glance I spotted a fat TV script, a notepad, three bags filled with materials, plus what appeared to be some samples of wallpaper.

"What in the world have you got here?" I gasped, helping her to put down her armload, even before I said hello. There was a time, I could remember, when mothers-to-be were very careful about carrying heavy things.

Ann laughed as she slipped—nudged herself, rather—into one of my new garden chairs and sat down. "Whew! It's getting warm. May we sit here?" When I said they (Continued on page 67)

Too involved in his career to be a good husband, Jeff was nonetheless saddened by his divorce from Dorothy, sees daughters Jamie, 6, and Dana, 4, every week.

■ A curly-haired giant of eighteen stopped mowing his lawn in Long Branch, New Jersey, sat on the porch steps and feverishly scribbled notes for the novel he was planning. Little did he know that he would live it instead.

The hero of that yet unwritten book was a young man who had everything. He was big, strong and athletic. He was handsome, forceful and magnetic. He had a fine mind and many talents. He could sing, paint, act, write—there was hardly a gift he did not possess.

So he went forth into the world and, talent by talent, sought recognition. Each time he almost succeeded, but not quite: always when the goal was at his fingertips he lost it. Finally at thirty-five, he looked back on his disappointments and decided he was a failure. Then something happened which brought him a satisfying realization and inner peace: Although fame had escaped him, still he was fulfilled. Success was in the striving.

heading for a WEDDING?

Maybe taking Betty to Ireland is just friendship on Rock's part. But people are grinning wisely and asking, "How are things in Glocca Morra?"

BY IMOGENE COLLINS

■ The daisy could give you a better answer to this question. Ask Rock Hudson about his marriage plans and he fixes you with his handsome boyish grin and says, "What marriage? I'm in no rush."

Ask the same question of his steady girl, the blonde and beautiful Betty Abbott, niece of comedian Bud Abbott and ace script girl at Universal Studios, and you get a similar answer.

"There's always time to get married," says Betty.

Ask them both when they're together and they put on a show of diplomatic evasion.

"Don't put me on a spot like that," Rock will say.

He's fond of Betty, isn't he?

"Sure, I'm fond of her," Rock will assert. "I think she's the greatest. A very good friend."

How long has she been a good friend?

"Five years, I guess. I met Betty on my first picture. I don't know a finer girl."

There's no romance between you?

"I wouldn't exactly say that," Rock admits. "It's just that we're very good friends."

These last few years, Rock has been in a lot of pictures. Which one is the most important to him?

"I guess I'd say Magnificent Obsession."

From Leonard Goldstein to Dick Contino— where Piper's concerned as long as they're men, they're neither too young nor too old!

BY JOHN MAYNARD

Mad about the "boys"

PIPER AND CONTINO HAVE TORRID BUT TROUBLED ROMANCE . . .

. . may not be able to solve their many problems together.

■ At tea time Piper Laurie was drinking tea. In Hollywood this is considered rather fey conduct, even in the British colony, but Miss Laurie likes the stuff. She was drinking tea and talking about men—she likes that stuff, too. At twenty-two, Miss Laurie might even be considered a connoisseur. Her preference for tea was by way of a guarantee that there never will be a pied Piper, which may or may not be a joke. Miss Laurie was moved to laugh slightly.

"You spoke of older men?" she said, making it sound like a question. "What do you mean by older men? Older than whom?"

Never mind. What was Piper's definition of older men? What, for example, would be call middle-aged?

"Over sixty," said Miss Piper, "for most men. Not until ninety for a few. And for one or two, never! Some have that wonderful ageless quality. But I never think of age in relation to men anyway. Or not much. It's the men themselves that count."

That had a fairly profound ring. Would Miss Laurie go on? The background is that she dates both older men—Producer Leonard Goldstein being a notable case in point—and younger men—among whom it is fairly safe to cite Dick Contino, despite reports that the two have shed one another over a little matter of who works and who doesn't. Not so. But it probably is so that Contino and Piper have never discussed marriage.

"I'm not going to marry Dick," said Piper, with what might be termed firmness. "I'm (Cont'd on page 75)

BY RICHARD MOORE

"I DON'T LIKE PARTIES," BOB ADMITS, PREFERS SOLITARY SPORTS HE CAN ENJOY WITH

the lady said "YES"

■ We won't keep you in suspense or withhold information. This is how they happened to get married. On the twenty-fifth of May, 1954, Ursula Thiess and her fiancé, Bob Taylor, boarded a cabin cruiser on Jackson Lake, Wyoming. They were, they said, en route to location for the MGM film, Many Rivers To Cross. No one paid much attention. When, however, Ursula Thiess disembarked, she was accompanied by her husband, Bob Taylor—whose astounded, completely surprised press agent and studio were paying a great deal of attention.

The exact date was a shock—but many people had surmised that the marriage would take place soon. All they knew for sure, however, was the story of the proposal. It went like this:

On the early evening of Thursday, April 29, Robert Taylor knocked off work on Rogue Cop, went to the telephone on the set, and called his dear and close friend Ursula Thiess, the German actress to whom he had been so long devoted. He would like, he said, to call on her that night.

Miss Thiess, who had been just as devoted to Taylor for just as long a time, acquiesced, but evidently with no intimation of what was coming.

Taylor arrived about eight o'clock, and they used up a few hours talking of whatever he and Miss Thiess talk about—themselves, certainly —and perhaps of her daughter, eight-year-old Manuela, who lives with her in Hollywood, and of her son and her mother, both of whom still are in Germany but will come here as soon as immigration authorities (Continued on page 78)

IS DOG OR WITH VERY CLOSE FRIENDS

WHO NEEDS MEN ?

"I can take a goodnight kiss or leave it alone," Debbie says. And the crazy thing is—the crazy kid really means it!

BY TONI NOEL

■ Have you ever seen perpetual motion? Ever had lunch with a windmill? Meet Miss Debbie Reynolds.

She zips into the restaurant like the devil himself is behind her, because she's late and punctuality is a habit of which she approves. The tardiness today isn't her fault. Over at MGM the cast of Athena broke late for lunch. That's all. You get no effusive, movie star apology from Debbie. She gives you a quick grin and that direct, green-eyed glance of friendliness as she slips into her chair and picks up a menu.

She looks it over, but she'd rather talk than eat. As a matter of fact, she never stops. "Have you ordered? What'll I have? Let's see—no, I'd better not have that. I have to dance this afternoon. The fruit salad. Yes, fruit salad." The imp disappears; now she's a wistful little waif, turning large, appealing eyes up to the middle-aged waitress whose answering smile is fond but not fatuous. "But could I have more pears or something in it instead of grapefruit? I hate grapefruit! Now, what to drink?"

"Milk," chorus her companions.

"Nnnnnnnh," the pert nose wrinkles indecisively. "I've already drunk about two gallons on the set this morning. I'll have to think about it and tell you later. Big decision."

Food disappears from her mind with the retreating back of the waitress. "How do you like my new skirt

Dates with boys like USC student Ed Wilkerson are strictly for fun, strictly for laughs. It may be a long time before Debbie, burned once, will take a chance on love again.

Playing tennis with Lori Nelson, Debbie takes defeat cheerfully. Only once have friends seen her badly hurt by losing something she wanted.

"I remember once when I didn't have a date for eight months. I was too busy and too tired to go out. It didn't bother me."

An avid baseball fan, Debbie frequently takes Lori with her when she watches her brother's team, the Burbank Blues, work out. Brother Bill (next to Debbie) closely resembles his sister.

Friends for some time, Lori and Deb may become business partners, too. If their business managers approve, they will open a dress shop to be operated by their sewing-happy mothers and grandmothers, plan to call it "Lori-Debs."

(Continued from page 38) It's full and blue, with an all-over pattern of spools. "Mother made it. And she found some buttons made of tiny spools, and we're going to put them on a blouse. And then I'm going to cover a handbag and sew spools all over that. The living end, isn't it?

"Lori Nelson and I are going to open a shop in the valley with ideas just like this. Well, it's really our mothers who'll do the work, but they're the ones who want to do it. You know, my mother makes all my clothes and my grandmother sews, too. Then, Mrs. Nelson makes lots of Lori's things and her grandmother sews. We have to talk to our business managers, though, and see if we can afford it. We're going to call the shop Lori-Debs. Pretty cute idea?"

The food appears and Debbie takes one bite. "Know what I'm going to do? I'm going to ask Harriet Parsons if I can borrow Susan Slept Here to run for Mr. Schary on the lot. That's the only way. If a thing's important to you, do it yourself. He's a very busy man, and why should he take time out to go see a picture I made for another company? But I want (Continued on page 56)

Sports, business projects, are only part of the activities that keep Debbie too busy to date. Afraid she may have attained stardom too easily, she takes dancing, singing, voice lessons; rehearses her scenes until exhausted.

James Stewart:
MODEL HUSBAND

"Here's the family—I'm holding Judy, that's Michael (he's eight), Ronald (ten), then Kelly—and the best husband any woman could ask."

"JIMMY'S NOT PERFECT—I SUPPOSE," SAYS MRS. S.—THEN PROCEEDS TO TELL HOW PERFECT HE IS!

■ Marrying a forty-ish bachelor is risky, no matter who he is. But when he's also a famous movie star—well, it's a chance most women wouldn't want to take—much.

When Jimmy Stewart's engagement to Gloria Hatrick McLean was announced, his friends took Gloria aside.

"Jimmy is wonderful," one of his pals confided. "But he's forty-one years old. And I don't have to tell you, Gloria, that he's really settled in his ways."

Another friend cautioned the future Mrs. Stewart: "Jim's awfully persnickety about his food. And when it comes to clothes—well, really, Gloria, you're just going to have to be very tolerant with Jim. He just isn't used to sharing his time or his money or his life with a woman. It may be hard for him to change."

Gloria smiled, nodded, thanked them all for the advice and married Jim on August 9, 1949, in the Beverly Hills Presbyterian Church.

Gloria had been married before. Her two sons Ronald, ten, and Michael, eight, are from her first marriage to Edward McLean II, of Washington, D. C.

After five years of marriage to Jimmy, she admits he isn't perfect, but she makes no complaints. "Jim is certainly the best husband any woman could ask for. All those stories about his being a dyed-in-the-wool bachelor and a stick-in-the-mud are ridiculous.

"Jim eats anything, and he's so easy to get on with, you couldn't ask for a better adjusted human being. The children are crazy about him, especially the boys.

"They're old enough for him to have fun with. He wrestles with them and plays (Continued on page 62)

"The boys are crazy about him. They're old enough for him to have fun with. He wrestles with them and plays ball and goes hiking . . . they just love to go hiking together."

"It's absolutely incredible how Jim can study in any kind of a racket. I think this concentration is responsible for his absentmindedness. He never forgets anniversaries or birthdays, though . . . he's given me so many things."

"He's a camera bug. Jim has one of every kind of camera in existence. I've never seen so many cameras in my life. And he's plane-crazy, too—having his own plane thrills him."

"You've heard of the absent-minded professor? Well, Jim is the original. After the twins were born he was supposed to take me home from the hospital. He almost forgot it!"

"Of course, Jim doesn't quite know what to do with our twin girls, Judy and Kelly, because they are only three. But I'm sure he likes holding them. And he's sure they're going to grow up into great cooks—I'm a flop at that!"

Jean Simmons' life is a modern fairy tale. But will she have to make some changes to find the happy ending?

BY LOUIS POLLOCK

if she could only cook...

■ Once there was a little English girl whose life got off to the most glorious start any little girl could think of. She was a movie actress! She not only had talent, she had an appetite for fun and an attitude that as much as asked: "What's the point of good fortune if you can't live it up a bit?" And that's what Jean Simmons did.

She had a little racing roadster for flying around the countryside, she had a lovely flat in London with a housekeeper to do for her, and she had a hatful of dashing admirers to take her nightclubbing in gay film parties until dawn caught up with the revelers and they had to scramble back hilariously to the studios without a wink of sleep.

Some of her friends used to say, "Oh, Jean has made good in such a hurry she'll never bother to grow up!" But she knew they were wrong. She knew she would grow up—and like all women, all too soon. In the meantime, why, what could mean more than the fact that you were young?

That was hardly five years ago. Today Jean Simmons is in Hollywood and when her friends telephone her at home, or at her dressingroom suite at 20th Century-Fox Studios, they often begin with, "Is this 'Dreadful' Simmons?"

"Righto!" Jean will admit. "That's me!"

It's a joke, of course, yet it is founded on the supposition that Jean, if you didn't know any better than to believe local gossip, is a frosty-natured gal ready to bite off the head of anyone who wants to be friendly.

In England, people used to like to crowd around her and reporters always asked, "What's up, Jean? Been any place important? Got any plans we ought to know about?" In Hollywood most of them now tell each other that she is quite unapproachable, quite uncooperative. Some—and she has to smile about this, especially—even say it is because she is English—"and so reserved, you know." And there are newspaper people and writers who have advised each other: "Don't (Continued on page 70)

the secret romance of Marlon and Movita

Here at last is the real story of Marlon's flight from fear—and the story of the one girl who has helped him find peace!

BY STEVE CRONIN

■ Marlon Brando is not a happy man. By nature a non-conformist, he is confused, tormented and supersensitive.

Like all men, he seeks contentment and laughter and joy. He decided to invite his best friends to a small party. He called Wally Cox, the Mr. Peepers of TV, Phil and Marie Rhodes, Sydney and Sandra Armes, all show folk, and ask them to meet him and Movita at his apartment in New York's Carnegie Hall Building.

The purpose of the gathering was "to celebrate my three years of friendship with Movita."

It was a warm and wonderful and unforgettable party, because everyone there understood that the keynote was love, the kind of love which is all too rare, the kind of love that calls for courage and sacrifice and gives pleasure and pain.

The guests danced and drank and sang, and toward the night's end, Marlon Brando and Movita Castaneda found themselves relatively alone in a dimly-lit corner of the studio.

Marlon slipped one arm around Movita's waist and his other hand into his pocket—to find his gift for Movita. It was a beautiful ring with a cluster of little diamonds. Marlon took Movita's hand and slipped the ring onto her marriage finger.

"This is our three-year friendship ring," he said softly.

Movita gulped hard and her eyes grew moist with tears.

"Thank you, darling," she whispered. "Thank you." And then she kissed him (Continued on page 88)

SALT WATER DILLIES

THERE'S NOTHING LIKE A BEACH TO HELP PEOPLE FORGET THEIR TROUBLES—ESPECIALLY IF THEY'RE FOUR

■ A butterfly with too much flitting to do ceases to believe he is a butterfly. That's what happens now and then to movie stars. It's a butterfly's life but they do get fed up with endless memorizing of dialogue, endless terrific love scenes with people they don't know very well, and equally endless nights of dressed-up premières and fancy parties at nightclubs.

A Modern Screen editor fell to talking with old friend Scott Brady about this situation. Said old friend Scott, restlessly, "I'd like to do something different, meet some new people."

"I think," the editor said, "I have an idea. You are always beefing that we magazine people put too much emphasis on the glamorous side of life in Hollywood and that we don't give enough of a break to the exciting young newcomers. Why don't we kill two birds with one rock? We'll let you cook the spaghetti dinner you're always bragging about and we'll let you introduce some youngsters who are going to be the big stars of tomorrow. What do you say?"

"Well, golly," was the first thing Scott said. "This is the millenium or whatever you call small miracles. I accept with pleasure."

The next afternoon Mr. Brady, whose arrival and departure time at gatherings

Columbia's Kim Novak was Scott Brady's blind date for the day; 20 years old, she began to act to combat an inferiority complex.

May Wynn worked with Bob Francis in The Caine Mutiny, took her new name from role in that film. Original name: Donna Lee Hickey.

The girls' idea of a walk on the beach turned out to be a ride for them and a marathon for the fellows—who managed to prove that their biceps were not mere stage effects. Ride ended when Kim spotted stray dog (below), jumped off for a closer look.

YOUNG STARS AND HAVEN'T ANY.

usually is highly indefinite, slid his big convertible to a stop outside May (The Caine Mutiny) Wynn's neat little Malibu Beach home at two-thirty—a half hour before he was expected. He unloaded the precious ingredients for his spaghetti dinner and perched them on the back doorstep along with himself.

The sea gulls may have had the impression that this man was talking to himself. And (Continued on next page)

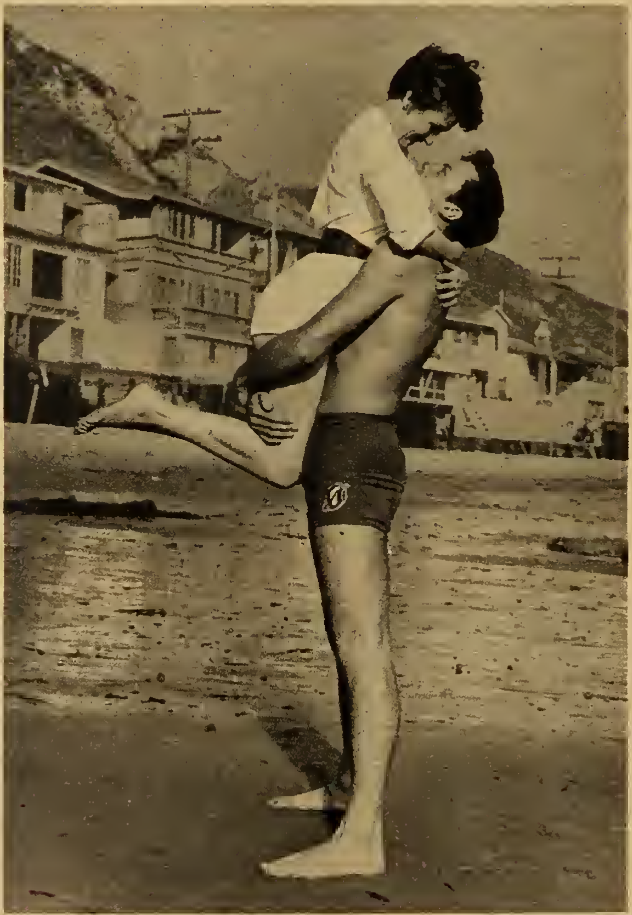
"When I was a kid," Kim said, looking longingly after departing pooch, "my sister and I kept a sign in the window—'Stray Animals Welcome!' We were mobbed with them—I guess they could read!"

"I'll find you an animal," Scott told Kim, produced a starfish from the Malibu rocks. Net result: both girls fled and even Bob looked skeptical, finally left Scott to continue his nature studies alone.



"She eats like a horse," Bob said admiringly when asked to describe May, "and she has a twenty-inch waistline!" An ex-model and chorus girl, May always planned on a show business career.

with meat sauce and grated Parmesan cheese
GARLIC BREAD
OLIVES AND CELERY
TOSSED GREEN SALAD
DESSERT
Large slices of chilled fresh pineapple served on long lollipop sticks
COFFEE
(served on the beach, hot and strong)

By the time the gang arrived, the impatient Mr. Brady had pulled a screen off a rear window to make his own entrance. Miss Wynn, jumping out of her own convertible, said to him: "If I didn't suspect that you're Scott Brady, I'd blow a whistle and have the Malibu gendarmes toss you in the local jug."

"That," said Mr. Brady, pulling one long leg from inside the window, "will not be necessary, Miss Wynn, and how do you do?"

With the aid of a key, May let them both in and in a moment they were joined by Bob Francis (who takes his bow in a personal story on page 55) and Kim Novak, the voomy type blonde ex-model who began her career wearing one of Rita Hayworth's slinky black dresses in The Killer Wore A Badge.

They were all friends (Cont'd on page 81)

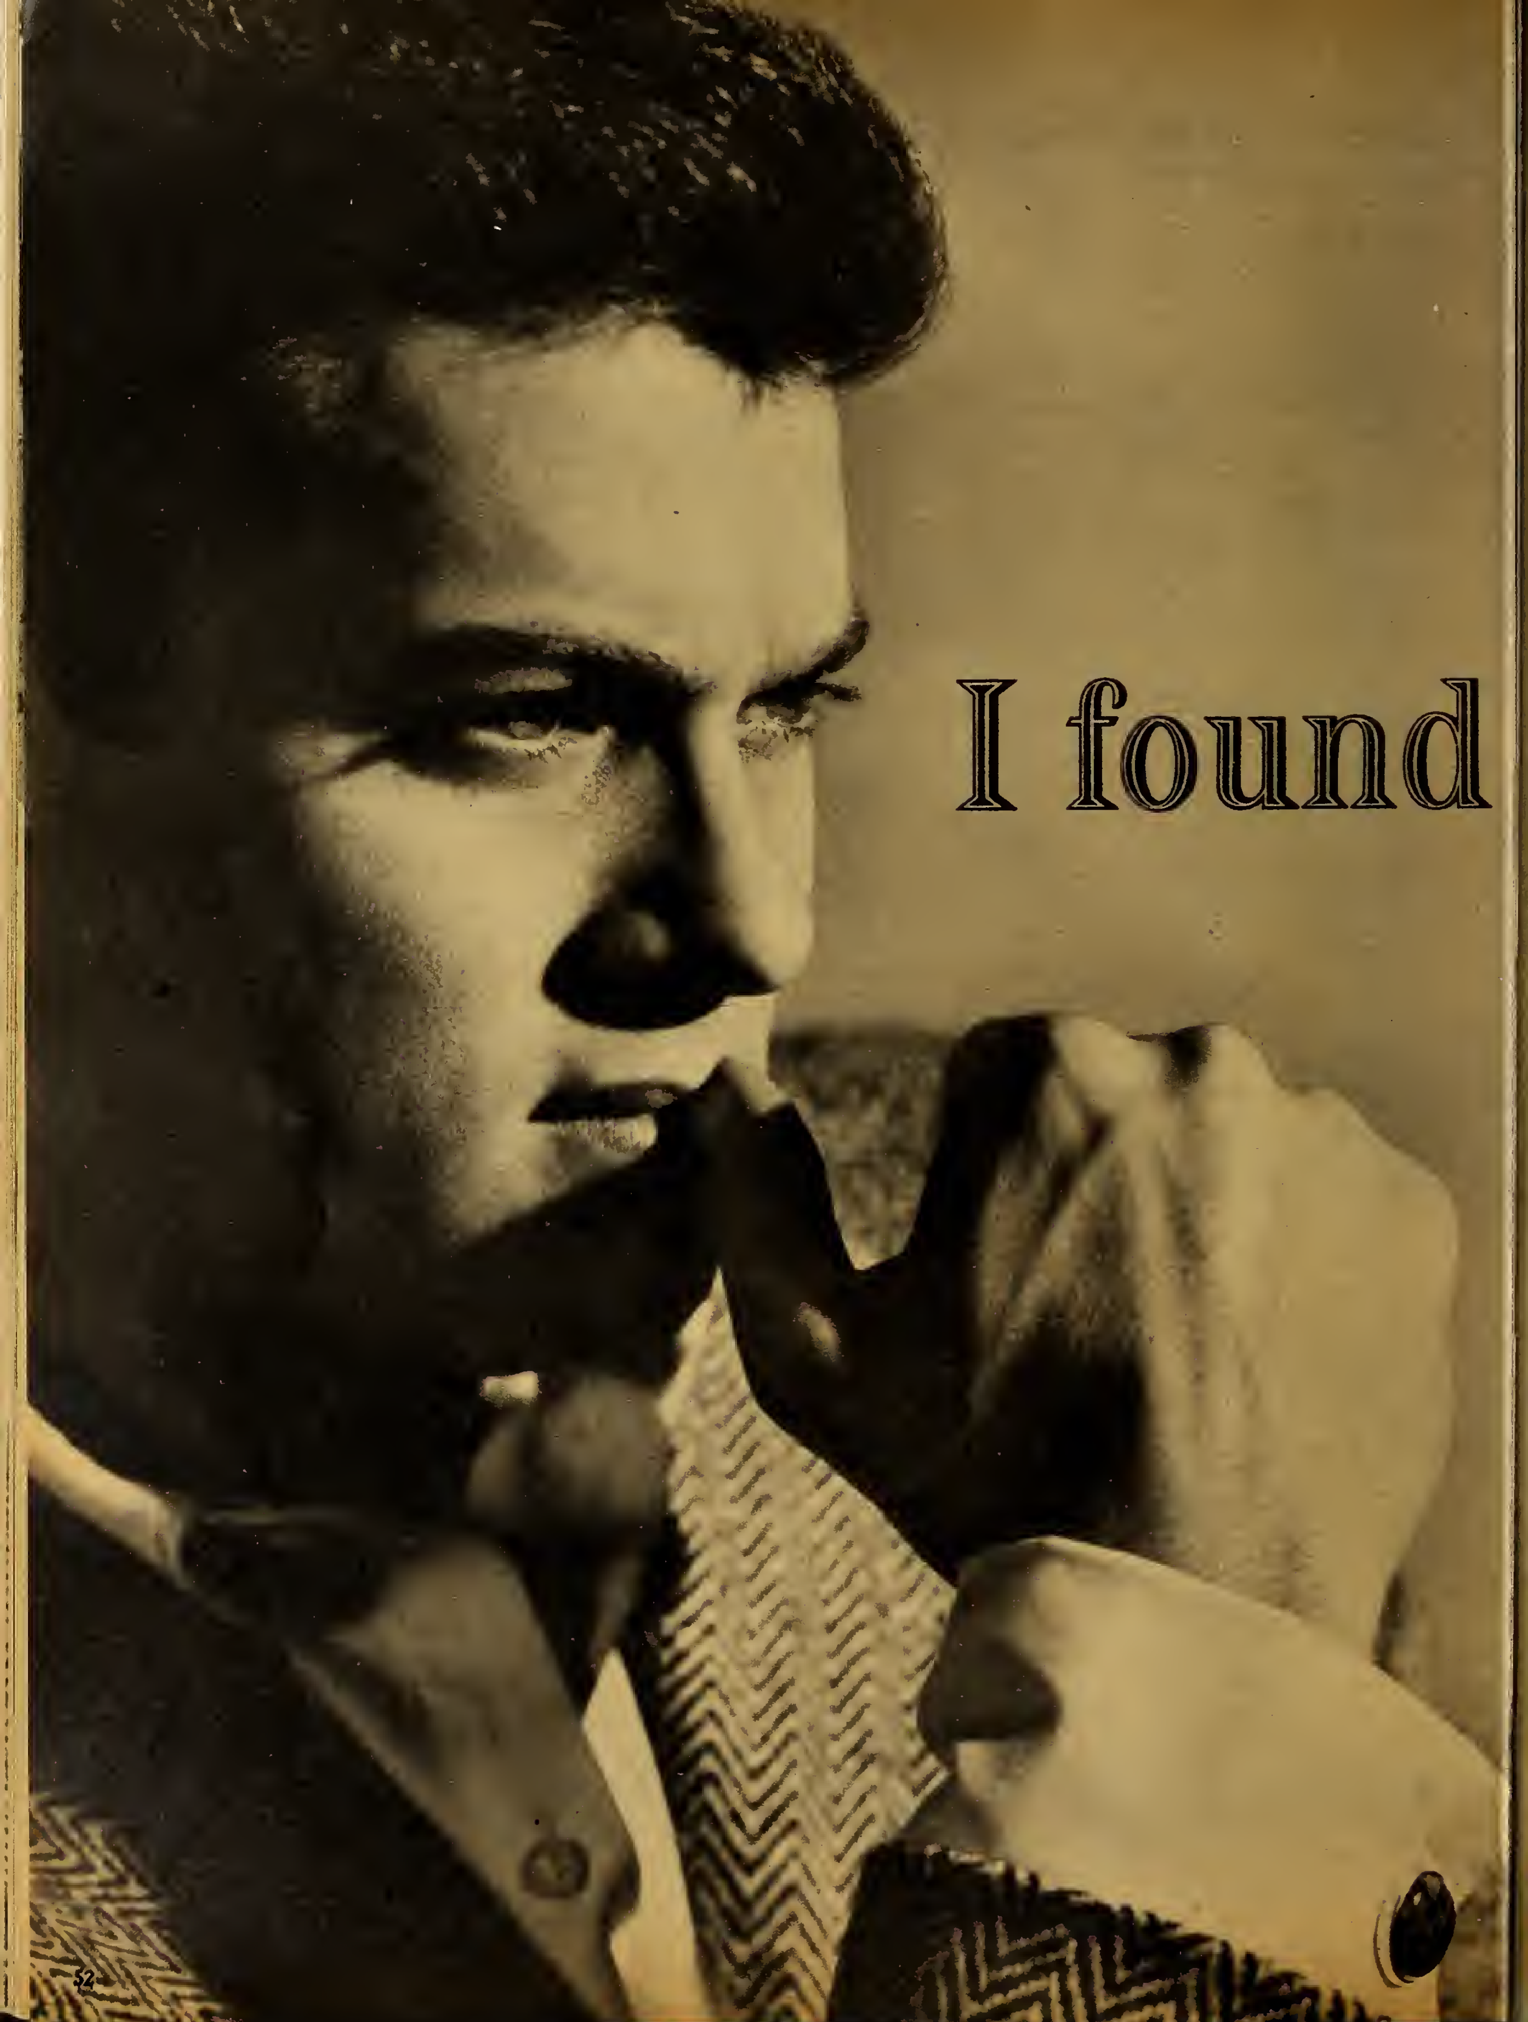
At sundown the kids headed for the house. All afternoon Scott begged for Kim's phone number, finally got it. Now there's talk of romance!

IN MAY'S COTTAGE SCOTT DISAPPEARED INTO THE KITCHEN AND PRODUCED ONE OF HIS JUSTLY FAMOUS HOMEMADE SPAGHETTI DINNERS

"There is a knack," Scott explained to Kim, "of eating as well as cooking a good spaghetti dinner!" and proceeded to demonstrate.

Dessert (fresh pineapple slices on lollipop sticks) looked so attractive that the girls insisted on having it on the table throughout the delicious meal.

After dinner the girls traded life stories, then (to their own surprise) persuaded the fellows to do dishes before the party broke up.



I found

by Tony Curtis

Tony's father and mother, Helen and Manuel Schwartz, see a great deal of their son and daughter-in-law, often bring son Bobby to watch Tony work. The difference between Tony's religion and Janet's has created no conflicts, they say.

God in the streets

In one of New York's toughest tenement districts Tony Curtis learned many things— among them love and kindness and faith— and to know himself!

■ In the sections of New York where I was born and grew up I always had to count on competition. I learned even as a small boy that if I as much as stepped part way out of my shoes somebody would be sure to shove me all the way out so he could step into them. Seeing to it that nothing sudden happened to me took most of my time and I had little left to waste on worrying about the other guy.

Maybe I would have gone on like that if it weren't for a strange thing that had no right to take place in a tough neighborhood—but did every now and then. For no reason at all that I could see, and in cases where he couldn't possibly benefit or be rewarded for it, a fellow would help his fellow man. Some dope! I would think, and try to forget about it. But sometimes it would stick in my mind and bother me.

Instead of thinking that the man who had received help was lucky, I found myself envying the fellow who had gone to all the trouble to help him. Somehow he had gained something. What? I used to puzzle over it and try to hammer my head back to where it would operate right. Gradually, over the years, I began to feel and understand the wonder of helping the other guy; why it was even better than getting helped, and that it was the human heart at work. In time I even knew that the heart meant the soul and that even here, in the tenement canyons of New York, God was around.

I got real smart at figuring out why people did certain things. (After I got to Hollywood I learned that the better the writer the more he knows about the same thing, that is, the motivation behind people's deeds.) And I realized that there was not only unselfish action—there could be such a thing as unselfish thinking!

I remember one day in school when a pencil box was stolen and the teacher found it in my desk. She asked me why I had stolen it. I blazed up at her and denied the theft. I was so angry about her accusation, so fiery about it, and sounded so convincing that I almost convinced myself I was innocent. We stood there, face to face, and it was a horrible, ugly moment. Suddenly the teacher said something that just took the whole floor from under me.

"Oh, I've made a big mistake if you say you didn't take it," she cried. "I'm sorry. I apologize!" (Continued on page 81)

PAT CROWLEY

PERT AND PRETTY, PAT DECIDED TO BE AN ACTRESS WHEN HER SISTER SAID SHE TALKED TOO MUCH! ■ by Alice Hoffmann

■ Pat Crowley and two other young New York actresses found themselves in Hollywood facing a horrible weekend of suspense. Paramount Pictures had brought them west, put them up at the same hotel (where they met each other for the first time) and then tested each one for a lead role in a movie which was to star William Holden, Ginger Rogers and Paul Douglas. The tests were over by a Thursday morning and the girls were told they would have to wait around until Monday before finding out which was the lucky one.

By late Thursday afternoon Pat Crowley, a dark-haired Irish girl whose beauty is as vivid as her name is plain, decided something must be done and she was the one to do it. She telephoned the others.

BOB FRANCIS

MOVIES' NEWEST, BIGGEST, BLONDEST GIANT WAS PULLED OFF A PAIR OF SKIS TO STAR IN HIS FIRST FILM. ■ by Kirtley Baskette

■ Where did this Bob Francis come from? That is the question Hollywood citizens are asking each other.

One writer was talking to Columbia Pictures' publicity department. "I can't understand how I've missed him! What pictures has he made?"

"No other pictures. This is his first."

"What Broadway plays?"

"He's never seen Broadway."

"Oh, I get it," she brightened, "television!" Wrong again—no TV. Radio? Never in his life.

Stubbornly, she ran out the list: Little theatre? (Continued on page 71)

who needs men?

(Continued from page 41) him to see it, because that's the kind of picture I want to concentrate on. Comedy. Well, yes, singing and dancing, too, but musical comedy. Not just ingénues. I hate playing ingénues.

"When Red Skelton was on the lot, we used to talk about a picture we wanted to make together. About clowns. A father-and-daughter clown act—with a plot, too, of course. Very sad plot. But I'd love to play a part like that.

"Know the kind of comedy Lucille Ball does? The cream pie-in-the-face routine? Crazy! The living end! Love it. Have I ever had a pie in the face?" she winks broadly. "Had to practice, you know. Dick Powell calls me his clown in baggy britches. He's a great man. People ask me who is the greatest talent in Hollywood, I say 'Dick Powell.' I love him. He's just like a big, woolly bear.

"You know how busy he is? He's only producing, directing and acting; he's only making a couple of million a year to say nothing of his interests outside the industry. And he takes time to call me on the phone. Just calls and says, 'Whatcha doing?' I tell him whatever it is, and then he says, 'Well, don't let them work you too hard, Deb. Don't do too much. You have to take some time out for rest and relaxation.' Imagine! He's the greatest. And June and those two kids—it's a perfect marriage, a perfect family. He's given her such a feeling of security. That's what I need, what I'll have to have in my marriage.

"Of course, I'm much more fortunate than most. Because of the closeness of my family, I've had emotional security all my life. I've grown up with it. And if I didn't find it in my marriage, I'd be more lost than the person who had never had it. See what I mean? By the way, aren't we going to talk about my love life today? Too bad. I had such a scoop for you, too!

"No, I was only kidding. No romance of mine would ever be of the 'scoop' variety. You know, when I'm not working, I go out a lot. I really enjoy it; it gives me a chance to be with boys I like and I love to dance. But it isn't everything. Sometimes I don't go out at all. I remember once, last year or the year before, when I didn't have a date for eight months. I was taking lessons every night, voice, singing, dancing, and when you work that hard, you either don't have time or you're too tired for dating. I've been goofing off for about six months now, having a ball, and I'm glad to be back at work. I have plenty to do.

"My next big project is a nightclub routine. I have very definite ideas about that. I think you really have to knock yourself out, give them everything you've got, stay out there almost but not quite as long as the audience wants you. Don't overstay your welcome, but don't let them go away feeling a little cheated. I spent the weekend in Las Vegas with Bob Neal and his mother, and we went to Danny Thomas' opening. What a talent! The living end—the greatest. I want to be able to hold an audience like he does.

"People have the idea that you can whip a show together in six weeks or something. That's crazy. It takes years to put a really good show together, and mine has to be sensational right from the beginning. I'd hate to be just a movie actress coming out to sing them a couple of dumb little songs. I want to knock 'em dead, lay 'em in the aisles.

"Maybe I'll do an act alone or maybe with a couple of boys. I haven't decided yet. I'm going to try to talk Roger Edens into writing some special material for me, an opening number. He wrote a song for me that's the living end. People ask me who's the greatest talent in Hollywood, I say 'Roger Edens.' Absolutely the greatest.

"My biggest problem is finding hit songs from old shows. My education has been badly neglected in that department. As far as I was concerned, New York was eight thousand miles away, and since Broadway didn't have anything to do with movies, it was nowhere. So I really need a lot of filling in on show tunes."

A FRIEND OFFERED her a file of same, and Debbie said instantly, "I'll take it—and I'll cherish it, too, because I know how people feel about their hobbies. You know, once I loaned my monkey collection to a hobby exhibit. I had monkeys from everywhere in the world that I've been and some that friends brought me and fans sent me. I loved every one of them. Well, these people promised to take good care of them, but while they were on exhibit two of my monkeys were stolen. What could they do to make up for that? They gave me first prize. I said, 'Thanks a lot,' and pinned the ribbon on one of my monkeys—but I don't lend them out any more. That's why I say I understand how much a person's hobby means, and I'll take good care of your song collection if you'll trust me with it.

There is the tape from the time the sound effects failed in a dramatic skit on WOR in NY: "And so I'm going to shoot you through the head." Silence. "This time I'm really going to shoot you through the head." Silence again. "Instead I'm going to cut your throat." Two shots.

Leo Guild in
The Hollywood Reporter

"Sure, I still collect monkeys. People still send me live ones, too, but mother sends them right back. She says, 'We have the parakeets and Tour Jeté (the dog) and you in the house. That's enough!' See how she classifies me with the rest of the animals? We had a cat, too, Michael O'Flaherty Reynolds, but we had to give him up. He was too mean, the living end! He used to hide under the furniture or behind the door, and every time Mother went by he'd run out and grab her by the leg or bite her. He used to let me hold him for about seven seconds when he felt like it, because he knew that I was supposed to be his mistress. After that—look out!"

SHE TALKS on and on and, after a time, one can see that this talk has a pattern, an unconscious purpose. You should be amused. Debbie grins, frowns, leers, mugs; every thought wears a different expression of drollery. Her hands are never still, her hair literally stands on end, and her pleasure is evident when you are amused. Debbie is inwardly a clown. With or without the baggy britches, she's always on stage, always knocking herself out for the reward of a smile.

Like great clowns before her, Debbie's compulsion to keep us laughing hides a deep sensitivity that she doesn't want exposed. She can be wounded—oh, yes, her heart isn't scar-proof—but instinctively she knows that we gratefully accept her great talent for tickling us and dig no deeper into Debbie Reynolds. Let the world believe she's a crazy, happy little kid who can belt a song, dance up a storm and make more faces than her monkeys, and the world lets the inner girl go her way in peace.

She's a tiny one who doesn't believe in her own talents half as much as you do. Because she became a star practically overnight, she isn't at all convinced that she's deserving of a place so high and she works twice as hard to stay there. You'll find her real feelings somewhere in the bright chatter that was calculated to make you smile. She shows her palms, covered with brutal blisters because she has worked out so strenuously on the bars for her role in Athena.

Debbie's eyes may be on the stars, but her feet are planted pretty firmly on the ground. She has a curiously ancient wisdom, knowing without being old enough to have learned it that in the end we pay for everything we get. If not in the beginning, then in the end. She didn't have to labor much to become Miss Burbank of 1948, and her subsequent movie contracts followed as a result of that contest—but how many girls who win contests of one kind or another actually become stars? Far from being a crazy kid, Debbie is a very bright little character who could read the handwriting on the wall more easily than most. Something was wrong. Getting into the movies had been too easy. Then she saw it. Because she had got in so easily, she was going to have to work like the dickens to prove her right to stay there. Hollywood was justifiably blasé about flash-in-the-pan contest winners.

DEBBIE WAS still pretty new at the acting game when she discovered that it isn't all cakes and ale. She sat down all alone, there at the crossroads of her life, to decide which way it would go. If she had decided to take the road away from movies, she would have chucked the career without a backward glance, because that's the way she is. She would have knocked herself out in the interest of other things, because she isn't capable of half-hearted participation. Once she decided that a career in pictures was what she wanted, that it would be worth all the blood, sweat and tears, she began to give it a full measure of each.

It takes a full measure. Those blistered little hands will bleed before she willingly gives up working on the bar. Her practice clothes will be plastered to her back and her hair will be clinging damply to her forehead before she is satisfied with her dance routines. And there'll be tears, too, though you will never see them, and it's entirely possible that even her own family won't know when her throat is aching and her eyes sting with salt.

Once there was a role in a picture that Debbie wanted in the worst way. Different from anything she had ever done, non-musical, it would give her a chance to display whatever genuine acting ability she possessed. When she won the part, Deb was happy. Than this there is no happier. She glowed, she sparkled, she danced on the wind, she bubbled inwardly as she has always done on the surface. She had worked hard and now she was rewarded.

And then another actress took over the role when she thought beyond doubt that the coveted picture was hers.

Debbie didn't throw a temperamental tantrum—she wouldn't know how. But she couldn't make the little clown come to life, either. The loss was too painful and it came too quickly, before she could throw those defenses up. That day, for the first and perhaps for the only time, Hollywood saw Debbie disarmed—without the shield of a wry grin and a comic answer.

In a quiet voice she agreed with the executives who broke the news to her that the more experienced actress would probably do a whale of a job. That was the gesture of a good sport. And then she added evenly, "I hope you'll never again ask me to give up anything that means as much as this role meant to me." These were the tears.

SHE ISN'T BITTER—never bitter—but the experience taught her something. So that she says now, "I've tested twice for Oklahoma. I'd really love to play that role, to do Ado Annie, but from the beginning I've somehow known inside myself that I wasn't going to get it. So, I'll keep doing tests as long as they ask me, but when they cast somebody else, I'm not going to be disappointed. I just know."

She isn't going to hope again in that particular way. She hoped too hard once and got hurt, and she's too smart a girl to need two belts over the head where one will suffice. Nobody knows whether Debbie ever took a belt over the heart because she isn't saying.

She continues to confound—and even irritate—the biographers of Hollywood by refusing to follow the patterns of behavior they expect. By this time success certainly should have gone to her little round head. Instead of which she does pretty much what she has always done.

She doesn't spend money like a drunken sailor, nor buy and wreck Cadillacs, nor make headlines by her contractual disagreements with MGM. She refuses to elope and divorce or even engage and disengage. The girl is twenty-two years old, for heaven's sake, and she still doesn't drink or smoke!

The columnists and feature writers have cooed about how refreshing it was to have this natural little person in our midst in tones so sugary that it took a steady hand to read the stories after a while. Nothing happened, except that Debbie went on working and improving as an actress, doing outside the studio the things she had always done.

Then they took the opposite tack. When, they asked sourly, was this girl going to grow up? Wasn't she a little old to be climbing trees? If Debbie was stung by their ridicule of her Girl Scout activities, of the fact that she played the French horn, she gave no indication. The grin stayed on straight, her talents continued to blossom and she went her own way.

THE FINAL BLOW to the scoffers has been the steadfast loyalty of the boys Debbie dates. They, too, have been ridiculed—for robbing the cradle, for enjoying the company of a girl who considers a weinie roast as much fun as a première, for having their romantic appeal passed over by a girl who says, "I can take a good night kiss or leave it alone." According to their standards, little Miss Reynolds ought to be a one-date girl, but the most eligible bachelors in town keep coming back. She can have her choice of dates any night of the week and if it happens to be one of the periods when she's working or studying, they'll try again in three months or six. It seems strange, to say the least, in a town where eligible young males are at a premium, but that's the way the ball bounces. Debbie's ball, anyhow.

An erudite local disc jockey announced a record, "The music is by George Gershwin and lyrics by his lovely wife, Ira."

Leo Guild in
The Hollywood Reporter

Maybe she's too busy forging a career to think of romance, as she says. And maybe she got clobbered once, as she isn't saying. Anyway, Debbie Reynolds isn't going to have one of those early, scalded-over-with-scandal marriages spawned by the dizzy pace of kids who don't know enough to come in out of the glamour.

It isn't that she's rebellious in not doing the tragic expected; it's just that she wouldn't be Debbie if she did. END

Here's the mysterious Veronique Pasanie—journaliste and traveling companion of Gregory Peck—

THE GIRL WHO CAME TO INTERVIEW

One of the very few photos ever taken of Greg and Veronica, this rare picture was snapped near Paris.

This photograph was snapped at Orly Airport outside Paris. Tired and drawn from the long flight, Greg and Veronica had just returned from Ceylon and were walking toward the Immigration Office to have their passports checked. Veronica removed the dark glasses she usually wears and an alert photographer dashed out, clicked his shutter and disappeared.

Until recently, Veronica, traveling under various names, has had an easy time avoiding publicity. But after a couple of years of tracking her in London, Paris, St. Moritz, the French Riviera and Ceylon, the press is able to recognize her. One photographer said, "No girl can go around with Gregory Peck and hide behind sunglasses forever!"

Veronica first met Greg two years ago when, as a cub reporter for the Paris Presse, she was assigned to interview him. Greg was as gracious as usual—so gracious, in fact, that she decided to do a sequel in Rome where Greg had gone to make Roman Holiday.

What with all the interviewing, Greg's wife Greta took the three Peck sons, Jonathan, Stephen and Carey Paul, back to California. Then the press quite naturally became more curious about Greg's friendship with Veronica.

"She's just a girl I met in Paris," he said. "Nothing serious. I see her once in a while—just like any old friend."

When Veronica turned up in Ceylon with Greg while he was making The Purple Plains, reporters asked why.

"I think she came out here," was the far from inevitable reply, "to buy some tea for her mother."

Veronica says, "Gregory Peck is a good friend and I am a journaliste and this is my own private business and I will answer no questions about it."

Her friends say, "Veronique is a shrewd girl and she expects that Greg will divorce his wife eventually and marry her." Veronica, twenty-one years old, lives with her mother in a small Parisian apartment on Avenue Franklin Roosevelt.

As for Peck, he is scheduled to be in London now to work with John Huston on a re-make of Moby Dick. After a two-week visit with his wife and children in Hollywood, he is still keeping his own counsel about his private decisions—if any.

heading for a wedding?

Rock grinned. "I took my mother and Betty."

Despite the diplomacy, the hedging, the shying away from any talk about marriage, Betty Abbott is the number one girl in Rock Hudson's life.

LAST YEAR when Rock came down with a near-ruptured appendix and had to be rushed to the hospital for an emergency operation it was Betty Abbott who stayed at his bedside. Rock kept referring to her as "Nurse Nancy."

After the surgery, Rock urged Betty to go to Europe for her vacation. He knew she had been planning this first trip abroad for years. Betty demurred. Rock insisted. Betty finally went.

While she was crossing the Atlantic, the steward notified Betty that there was a radio call for her. The shore-to-ship operator out of New York was trying to get in touch with her. Not knowing what to expect, the attractive blonde ran to the phone.

It was Rock calling from Hollywood. "Having any laughs?" he asked.

Betty was delighted. What a considerate thing for Rock to do! He had thought she might be lonely aboard ship.

When Betty arrived at her hotel in London, weary from the trip up from Southampton, there was still another surprise. She found her room bedecked with flowers. Was this typical British hotel hospitality? No. The British are hospitable, but attached to one red rose was a card. On it was written, "Have fun! Rock."

Presently Betty phoned him from Europe. These transatlantic phone calls are expensive, and most people don't make them just to pass the time of day. There was need here for the sound of loved voices, the communication of kindred souls, the reassurance that one was thinking of the other no matter how vast the separation.

A few weeks later when Rock was down at Laguna Beach ostensibly recuperating, he went surf riding. The surf of the Pacific gets pretty rough, even for a six-foot, four-inch giant like Hudson. A wave caught the actor, upset his surfboard and banged him into a jutting boulder.

Result: a collar bone broken in three places, an ambulance ride from the Emergency Hospital in Laguna to St. Joseph's Hospital in Burbank, and eight long weeks of convalescence.

Betty Abbott was notified of the accident and she came back from Europe in a hurry. She denies that she cut short her trip because she was worried about Rock, but her friends tell it differently.

"Of course she was worried," one of her close relatives insists. "After all, she and Rock have known each other for years. He lives just over the hill and he takes her to work each morning. Whenever he possibly can, he drives her home. They've been every place together. And Olive—that's Betty's mother—considers him one of the family. So naturally Betty was worried when he cracked up.

"I know that young people like to be nonchalant. It makes them feel more sophisticated. They don't want to give vent to their emotions, but Betty is very fond of Rock. Naturally, she's not going to say anything about marriage. But have you ever heard of a girl's going around with a boy on and off for five years without thinking of him as a possible husband? Of course not.

"As for Rock, I'm sure he's thought of Betty as a wife, but like many men, he's got to be shoved into marriage. I don't care what anybody says, it's women who do most of the proposing. And it so happens that Betty isn't a forward girl."

A STUDIO EMPLOYEE who knows both Betty and Rock well, is of the opinion that Rock might ask Betty to marry him while they're both in Europe this summer.

"When it was announced," he explained "that Captain Lightfoot was going to be shot in Ireland, Rock dropped hints all over the studio that it would be wonderful if somehow Betty could be assigned to it.

"She was. People around here like to keep Rock happy. After all, he's a pretty big noise. He doesn't throw his weight around but he does get 4,000 fan letters a month. Magnificent Obsession is doing very good business and Rock is entitled to a few favors.

"Besides, Betty is a fine script girl. She's been on—well, I'd say off-hand—at least nine of Rock's pictures. She's seen him under all kinds of pressure and she understands his moods and his ambitions.

As a matter of fact, these two young people couldn't be more perfect for each other. He is twenty-eight or twenty-nine. Betty's twenty-five or twenty-six. She's pretty; she's intelligent; she has a great figure and a nifty sense of humor. Her folks were in show business, and she knows all the problems an actor faces.

"I've been around Hollywood a long time, and I've never met a nicer kid. Matter of fact, if I weren't married, I'd marry her myself."

ROCK HUDSON uses the same sort of superlatives in talking about Betty—except that he avoids the marriage discussion. He described their first meeting.

"I was in this picture, Bright Victory, had a one-line or two-line bit. Didn't know what it was all about. Betty was the script girl, and one day between setups, I wandered over and started talking to her. I guess it was about acting.

"She's pretty, of course, but what really impressed me was her mind and her manner. Very knowing and very gentle.

"Lots of times you'll meet a girl who's one or the other. If she's knowing there's usually a tendency to be a little domineering. Not with Betty. I noticed that right away.

"Later on when we did other pictures together—when we were up in Oregon on Bend Of the River, particularly, I noticed how much at home she was everywhere—such an adaptable girl. Everyone is at ease talking to her.

"She's got a wonderful sense of humor, too. But don't get me wrong. She's just a good friend."

What Rock didn't say about his "good friend" was that he was planning a rendezvous with her and Barbara Rush in Paris before Captain Lightfoot got underway.

With Barbara as chaperone, Rock and Betty planned to tour France. By this time the tour should be over and they both should be working in Ireland.

Milton Berle invited Phil Silvers to drive to Long Island in his chauffeur-driven car. They were stopped by a traffic cop who examined the owner's license, peered into the back of the car and recognized the TV star. "Milton Berle, eh?" the cop smiled. "Okay Uncle Miltie, but take it easy" . . . "And you know who this is? This is Phil Silvers," Berle told the cop, who waved them on . . . "Milton," said Silvers later, "thanks for letting me take a bow."

Whether the European vacation will change their status no one can be sure, yet.

One woman who hopes it will is Rock's mother, Mrs. Kay Olson, a woman of character, humor, understanding and beauty.

"I surely hope," Mrs. Olson says, "that Rock marries Betty if he marries anyone. I would love to have that girl as my daughter-in-law. I can't tell you how much fun we have together.

"When my son lived just opposite Betty I used to see more of her than I do now. But I know they care for each other. Really care. If Roy (Mrs. Olson refers to her son by his real name) didn't, why would he take her to all those previews, on all those dates?

"He's shy about marriage. But that's understandable in view of what he's seen in connection with me. I've been married three times. The first two were horrible nightmares. I'm very happy now, but what Roy remembers is the first two, and you can't blame him for taking his time."

Rock Hudson's father deserted his family back in Illinois when Rock was six years old. Just why he left Rock and his wife is difficult to determine. But he walked out on his wife and son and never came back.

YOUNG ROCK was thereupon sent to live with his grandmother. He was a good boy. The teachers at Skokie Grade School who remember him say he was always "big for his age but nice."

In 1933 his mother obtained a divorce on grounds of desertion, and a few years later she married a Marine. This Marine adopted Rock, legally made him his son, but Rock hated him with a fervor that has never died.

If you mention the man's name today, Rock grows livid with rage. "If I ever see him," he says, "well, I'll try to control myself but I doubt if I can do it."

Why does Rock feel this way about his stepfather? According to the actor, he was beaten mercilessly day after day for no reason whatever. And being the kind of boy he was, he never told his mother who was out working in Winnetka, supporting both him and his step-father.

"He used to beat Roy savagely," Mrs. Olson recalls, "and the boy never told me about it until after I was divorced. Then he told me everything. I feel very sorry for that man if he ever crosses Roy's path."

As a child, Rock Hudson had no happy family life, no father to go to for help or money or guidance. It's a tribute to his hard-working mother that he was graduated from New Trier Township High and that he developed into a young man of character and kindness and decency.

What he saw of marriage as a youngster has not disillusioned him but it has made him sensitive, extra careful.

BETTY ABBOTT, who was born in Rochester, New York, and reared in Los Angeles, knows what happiness marriage can bring because hers has always been a happy home life. But when Rock looks back on his younger years, he grows sullen and meditative, and he realizes how happy he is now, just by comparison.

Because he is happy, Rock is reluctant to change his present state. But as his wonderful mother says, "Love has a way of moving men and mountains. Nothing would please me more than to have Betty and Roy return from Europe man and wife."

With the exception of a few hundred girls in Hollywood who want Rock for themselves, most of the movie colony hopes this will come to pass. "It's a natural." END

dad has his hands full

That year Lindsay left most of his clubs strewn around the links. By December he could find only one. So Bing bought him a set of ladies' clubs because they were light and Lindsay was small. Again they got lost.

Last year Lindsay asked for some more golf clubs. Again Bing complied, but this time he paid for the clubs with the money Lindsay had earned working all summer on the Crosby cattle ranch in Elko, Nevada. Nine bucks a day.

Lindsay has not only taken scrupulous care of the golf clubs "bought with my hard-earned dough" but last summer, using those same clubs up at Hayden Lake, Idaho, he shot a seventy-two to win The Mughunters' tourney for kids.

This incident is typical of Bing Crosby's policy as a father. He will give his boys plenty of rope—and then no more. The minute one goes too far, Bing bears down.

He has said many times, "Until they're twenty-one the boys are my biggest responsibility. And I'm going to keep a watchful eye on all of them."

Bing makes it a point every few months to drop in on the deans of the various schools attended by his sons.

Phil and Denny, the nineteen-year-old twins, go to Washington State College in Pullman, Washington, which is why you read so frequently that Bing is bound for Spokane. Actually he is on his way to Pullman to visit the boys, both of whom happen to be pretty good students. They like agriculture and animal husbandry and undoubtedly will take over the Elko ranch some day. Bing visits with them about six or seven times during a collegiate year.

Of the four boys, Gary has given Bing the most worry, undoubtedly because he's the oldest, the most headstrong and, via his recordings, the most famous. He has shown a great aversion to ranch work and, at one point, to his school work.

After Gary graduated from Bellarmine Prep, a Jesuit school, his father gave him a Mercury coupe for a graduation gift. The next year when Gary was a freshman at Stanford, he spent more time in the coupe than he did in the library.

Bing pulled into Palo Alto one day and called on the dean.

"How's my boy doing?" he asked.

"After Christmas," said the dean, "I don't think he'll be with us."

Bing arched a quizzical eyebrow. "What's wrong?" he asked.

"His work," the Dean answered. "Or to put it more exactly, his lack of work."

That's all Bing had to hear. It took him about five minutes to get over to the freshman dorm, about ten minutes to take Gary's car away and lock it up in a garage, and about fifteen minutes to lay down the law of the land.

From that moment Gary began to study, and while he will never make Phi Beta Kappa, it looks as though he will be a graduate of Stanford next June.

Dixie always insisted that all her sons finish college. "After that," she used to say, "they can follow whatever profession or business they like. But first comes their education."

Bing, of course, agrees with this requirement and is constantly impressing his sons with the importance of education. Moreover, he is sure they see it his way.

He wasn't upset when the newspapers carried stories of Gary's engagement to Barbara Stanislaus, a pretty, twenty-one-year-old senior at San José College.

Asked about the incident, Bing was noncommittal. "Gary gave her his Zeta Psi pin," he said, "not an engagement ring."

When Barbara was asked if she were betrothed to Gary, she said, "No. I'm just wearing his pin. That's all."

Barbara, who is studying business administration at San José with her twin sister Beverly, has been a Crosby house guest and has dated Gary since last fall.

That Gary is sweet on her goes without saying, but when it comes to talk of marriage, he says, "I'm not saying a word."

On May 24, twenty-year-old Gary was returning from a date. Near San José he collided with a car carrying five Mexican nationals, one of whom was killed. Bing, knowing that his son would be subjected to criticism because he is his son, through an accident that was perhaps not his fault, drove at once from his Elko ranch to Gary's bedside to assure him of his dad's love and loyalty.

The one fault Bing will not abide is immodesty. Dixie used to accuse her husband of spoiling the boys, of "punishing them one minute and taking them to the movies the next." Bing never wants it to be said that any of his sons is spoiled or trading on the old man's glory. That's one reason it's so difficult for reporters to get any of the four boys to talk.

They know that in their own right they're not celebrities and that Bing does not like publicity. At The Mughunters' Golf Tournament last year, the teen-age girls who competed were asked what they thought of Lindsay and Gary.

The unanimous impression was, "They remind you of their father. They take golf very seriously but they've got good senses of humor. There's not one bit of snobbishness about them and only thing that makes them nervous is the flash bulbs."

Because Bing is a strict disciplinarian ("I don't know, maybe I'm too strict. But I guess it's better to be too strict than too easy.") he makes sure to toe the line himself. If he doesn't, he automatically gets some pretty rough family kidding.

Six months ago, Bing was on his way home from a party, having just dropped Mona Freeman at her house. He was heading for Holmby Hills when crash! An automobile collision. Two men in the hospital and Bing's $13,000 Mercedes folded like an accordion.

Bing still hasn't heard the last of it. When he leaves for an evening out, he is asked if he still has his learner's license, and admonished to "drive carefully and take it easy." Fortunately, the crooner can take it as well as dish it out.

Bing knows that his boys idolize him. That's why he's doubly careful in his social life these days. Since Dixie's death he has dated only four or five girls, Mona Freeman, Audrey Hepburn, Margot James and Grace Kelly, all young and discreet.

As a rule Bing stays away from nightclubs—he doesn't like to be photographed without his hairpiece—but a few weeks ago he took a chance and dropped in at Mocambo with Grace Kelly. The photographers saw him and, although he voiced his objections in no uncertain terms, the flash bulbs popped.

He was planning to take all of the boys to Europe this year. He took Lindsay last year, and six months ago he announced that the son who received the highest grades could go with him in 1954. But Gary's summer job changed all that.

In case Gary had too many problems, Bing wanted to be nearby to lend a helping hand. "I've promised, however," he says, "to take the boys to Hawaii sometime during their vacation."

Bing doesn't make a move without first checking the possible effects upon his sons.

When he's offered picture jobs overseas (and he has been offered a dozen since Little Boy Lost) he refuses. When he was offered $50,000 a week by one Las Vegas gambling hotel, he was a bit more emphatic. He not only said no, but he added, "I'll never be a shill for anyone to lose money."

WHEN HE STARTED going around with Mona Freeman he introduced her to all the boys so that they would bear her no unconscious grudge and wouldn't unwittingly compare her with their mother.

Bing is a good, considerate, level-headed father with definite ideas of right and wrong. Asked if he'd ever spanked any of his gang, he admitted that, "I used to let 'em have it once in a while."

The one spanking all the boys remember came as a result of their stripping their mother's canary of all its feathers. "We thought it was a cute idea," Gary recalls. "You know, just for the hot weather so that the canary wouldn't be so uncomfortable. Mother told my old man about it when he came home that night. And boy! We really caught it."

Joe Erens described a recent western film: "The Indians shot thousands of arrows, but nobody got stuck except the audience."

Earl Wilson in The New York Post

It has been years, of course, since Bing has punished any of his boys in that way; and whereas they once feared his strap, they now fear his tongue lashings. Of late, these have been remarkably few. The boys are well on their way to manhood.

As a youngster, Gary used to be something of a sorehead, particularly if he lost in a game or contest, but after three years at Stanford, he has developed a genuine graciousness and is extremely popular.

"We could understand it," one of them said, "if he threw his weight around a little. But ever since we pledged him he's been okay. He knows, I'm sure, that he can't afford to louse up his old man's great reputation. Jon Lindbergh is like that, too and so was Joan Benny, Jack's daughter—unassuming and regular."

In the Crosby household, Lindsay, a junior at Loyola High in Los Angeles, is by far the best student. Denny has the best temperament, nonchalant and easygoing, while Phil is the best athlete and Gary is heir to the Crosby voice.

BING KNOWS the strong and weak points of his kids and he treats them on a highly individual basis. He does have, however, a standard set of group punishments. For minor infractions, their TV set is taken away from one to three days. For major infractions they lose all privileges—no dates, no ball games, "no nothin'."

Bing was fifty on May 2, and the question asked him most frequently then was, "When are you getting married?" Bing's stock answer: "It's in the hands of God."

Bing's closest associates are convinced that he will find a bride within the next two or three years. Mona Freeman, it was said, had the inside track on der Bingle's heart until she started dating Frank Sinatra. But Mona didn't start dating Frank until Bing started dating Grace Kelly with whom he starred in Country Girl.

Bing has always been a man who lived by his own high standards, a set of standards, incidentally, which he has passed on to his four sons and which makes him a fine father. END

Diana Lynn isn't playing the blues any more!

■ Diana Lynn has not had it easy in either her career or her private life. The collapse of her marriage to John Lindsey affected her deeply, and for a long time her work provided little comfort. Producers regarded her as a successful pianist turned actress, beamed down on her delicate face and wry little smile—and cast her over and over as the sweet but misguided little other woman.

Diana hated it. She began to take little interest in her work, less in her piano, none in the bright young bachelors who asked for dates. Wanting to get away for a while, she accepted the lead in the London company of The Moon Is Blue—and suddenly everything changed.

The play was a hit and Diana scored a personal triumph, hailed by tough London critics as one of the few "real" actresses to come out of Hollywood.

She felt good enough to look for new worlds to conquer, so she decided to leave the cast and treat herself to a solo tour of Germany, France, Spain and Italy.

Back in Hollywood she found a few more very pleasant changes. There was a most satisfactory delayed reaction to her starring roles with Dan Dailey in Meet Me At The Fair and with Glenn Ford in Plunder Of The Sun. Television offers began to pour in. In the gaps in her suddenly happily, crowded schedule, Diana found time for the music she had almost given up. Now she's playing piano for fun . . . and enjoying herself socially as well. "It's wonderful to read the hundreds of letters from those who wish me well," she says. "And in case the word hasn't completely gone around, I'm not disheartened any more!"

james stewart: model husband

(Continued from page 42) ball and goes hiking. They just love to hike together. Last year they climbed to the top of some mountain in Santa Monica Canyon and hid a golf tee. Well, a week ago they hiked back to see if they could find it. They not only found it, but this time they buried two golf tees.

"Of course Jim doesn't know quite what to do with our twin girls, Judy and Kelly, because they are only three. But he surely likes holding them.

"I'm not saying this because he's my husband, but I've yet to find anyone here who doesn't genuinely like Jim."

JIMMY STEWART's behavior as a citizen, like his behavior as a husband, is a result of his background and philosophy.

In his own words, "I'm just a small-town guy with small-town values and a small-town attitude."

Jimmy tries to live in Hollywood today as he would live in Indiana, Pennsylvania.

Jim was born and reared in Indiana (population 11,743) where his father runs the hardware store. Husbands there, as he remembers, are simple, unsophisticated, hard-working, church-going providers.

Jim is very much like them. No nightclubs, no yachts, no fancy racing cars.

HE HAS MADE a lot of money, and although lavish with his family, he gives himself relatively few luxuries.

But according to his wife, "He's a camera bug. Jim has one of every kind of camera in existence. I've never seen so many cameras in my life."

Jim has always been plane-crazy. When he was a boy he took flying lessons and made model planes.

Now he owns an F-51 Mustang which has broken the coast-to-coast speed record, piloted by Joe De Bona, one of Stewart's best friends. Stewart and De Bona own a charter plane service out of Clover Field, Santa Monica. But Jim is usually too busy for pleasure flying.

"As soon as I finish one picture," he says, "seems as if there's another right behind."

STEWART IS blessed with great powers of concentration. He studies while his two stepsons are watching television, his dog Belo is barking and Gloria is talking or dancing with Judy and Kelly.

"It's absolutely incredible," says the wondering Mrs. Stewart, "how Jim can study while any kind of racket is going on. I think this concentration is responsible for his absent-mindedness.

"You've heard of the absent-minded professor? Well, Jim is the original.

"I love him and he's wonderful, but after the twins were born and he was supposed to take me home from the hospital, he almost forgot about it!"

He drove to the Cedars of Lebanon Hospital, all right. The nurse said she would take Mrs. Stewart's gifts and bags to the car.

"Let me help," Jim offered, whereupon he scooped up an armload of packages and headed for the elevator.

When he got to his car, Jim dumped the packages. Somehow he had started thinking about a camera he'd read about. Forgetting the nurse who was following him, her arms laden with bags, he jumped into his car and drove to a camera store.

The salesman was demonstrating.

"Here's one," he announced, "that even your wife can work."

"My wife?" Jim repeated. "Why, I've left her at the hospital!" And with that he dashed to his Chevvy and raced back to the Cedars of Lebanon.

When the nurse was talking to a hospital attendant about Jimmy's absent-mindedness, the attendant said, "That's nothing. He almost forgot to take his twins out of the hospital, too!"

Jimmy Stewart loves his family, and he hates to be separated from his wife. "That's why I got married," he once explained.

A few years ago when Jim was making No Highway In The Sky in England, he insisted upon taking Gloria and the two boys with him. After a few months Gloria decided to take the boys and go home to wait for the next baby. Jim had to stay.

When Gloria got home, she learned that the baby would be twins and called Jimmy in London. Jim merely said, "Wonderful, wonderful. So glad you called."

Ten minutes later he began to think about it and called her back.

"Darling!" he shouted. "Did you say twins?"

JIMMY LOVES old clothes and will continue to have his favorite sports coats patched and re-patched. When he orders a new suit, he will take it back to the tailor time and time again until he feels completely satisfied with it. One tailor who has worked on Stewart's clothes says, "You can't believe it. He seems so easy-going and he speaks slow and soft. But if his collar is one-hundredth of an inch out of line he can't wear it!"

Pat O'Brien observed a man on the circus set of Ring of Fear who was thoughtfully looking at the camels. He picked up a straw, placed it on the camel's back and waited. Nothing happened. "Wrong straw," the man mumbled as he walked away.

Sidney Skolsky in The New York Post

His wife says, "You'd expect him to be grumpy once in a while, but in the five years we've been married, Jim has always been pleasant.

"He always does his best to please and he never forgets anniversaries or birthdays. He's given me cars and diamonds and so many things. And lots of times, he's very cute about the way he gives things.

"For example, he'll buy me a red cashmere sweater. On the box he'll write, 'This is a red cashmere sweater.' Then he'll hand the box to me and say, 'Put this away some place. It's a gift for you, and I don't want you to know what's in it.'"

Gloria finds it very difficult to buy gifts for Jim. So far she has given him two presents that she's satisfied with—two paintings by Utrillo.

Jimmy Stewart is a fine artist. As a boy he developed a marked talent for sketching. At Mercersburg Academy, he was art editor of The Karux, the school yearbook, for three years.

He is also a good accordionist and pianist. At Princeton he played an accordion solo, "So Beats My Heart For You," in his first Triangle Club musical. The Falmouth Players, a stock company in Massachusetts, relied on his accordion, too. Now, it lies hidden somewhere in the cellar, and Jim plays the piano at home. This simple family entertainment—playing for the kids to sing—is his idea of a good time. And because it is, he has never become the prototype of the sought-after movie hero.

Before Gloria married Jimmy she was told that he was shy, that she would have to bring him out of his shell. She found that he is not shy, exactly. He has great humility and respect for others. And he will not compromise on his principles.

He doesn't believe in making "problem" pictures, for example. No matter how much money he is offered he refuses to star in such films. Nor will he discuss politics for publication. Nor will he permit his own war record to be exploited.

JIM WAS ONE of the first screen stars to enter the service. On March 22, 1941, nine long months before Pearl Harbor, he became a private in the Air Force. A year later, because of his previous flying experience, he was commissioned.

As an officer he served first as a pilot instructor. Early in the war he was sent overseas with the Eighth Air Force. In December, 1943, and early 1944, he flew on spectacular raids over Bremen and Berlin. He led his bomber squadron on the famous aircraft factory raid over Brunswick, Germany, for which he was awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross. At the end of the war Jim was a colonel commanding a bomber wing.

There is no star in Hollywood whose service record can top Stewart's but, of course, Jimmy will not talk about his service record for publication. He has a deep love for the Air Force. That's why he made time to star in Strategic Air Command.

Jimmy Stewart is one of the most faithful of Hollywood's church-goers. Drop in at the Beverly Hills Presbyterian Church any Sunday, and chances are that you will find Jimmy down front singing hymns and his two stepsons, Ronnie and Mike, passing the collection plates. Mrs. Stewart will be teaching a Sunday School class.

Jim was brought up to attend church regularly. He insists upon each member of his immediaite family's fulfilling the same requirement. Religion to him is a fundamental part of existence and while he doesn't talk about it, he can always be recruited for a good cause.

He believes in work, too.

"Some actors consider Hollywood a lark. To me, making pictures is a career. I give it everything I've got. It's a serious business, and I like to keep busy in it."

BEFORE JIMMY agrees to star in a film he studies the script industriously. He makes suggestions to the producer, not only about his part but about others. He has amazed directors by saying, "I've got too many lines. My part should be cut."

Jimmy is always vitally interested in the success of an entire production, for the good reason that he usually works for a low salary and a percentage of the profits.

Except for Harvey, this gamble has paid him well. He has about $4,000,000. Jim made The Glenn Miller Story for no salary but fifty per cent of the profit. He'll probably earn $2,000,000 on this one production.

He does not believe in squandering his money. Before he invests his surplus funds he has his business manager, Guy Gadbois, investigate all the angles of any particular proposition. As a result, Jim has a considerable fortune in cattle, oil, real estate, TV and several other lines.

You read a lot about big-city guys who invade small towns, bringing with them their fancy ideas, store-boughten suits and immoral ways. In the end, of course, after disrupting and corrupting a good percentage of the townsfolk, they are converted to paths of righteousness and become quite homey. But there's a different twist to the Jimmy Stewart story. This one features a small town boy who made his way to one of the noisiest cities in the world and climbed quietly to the top without a noticeable change in his habits. Jimmy hasn't reformed anyone and he hasn't tried—but if his home and his homelife seem a little set apart from the run of the Hollywood mill establishments—well, they are. As far as his way of life goes, inasmuch as it can be said of any guy with a few million dollars. Mr. Stewart has never left home! END

On screen, Burt Lancaster is rough and tough. Off screen, his kids decided, a really talented mob of desperadoes could take him on!

Following a diabolical plot, James Stephen (back to camera) distracts Pop while Susan Elizabeth attacks from behind. Mom, William Henry, Joanna and a friend try to look innocent.

A treacherous moll, Susan Elizabeth assures Pop she has repented—but she's just stalling for time while the mob prepares!

William Henry (dangerous gang leader known as Somewhat Toothless) leads the mob in a surprise leap on—and off—Pop's back.

Foiled in the mass attack, James Stephen fights it out man-to-man with Pop while Susan Elizabeth stands by to patch up the loser.

"It was a tough fight, Ma, but I made it!" Victorious as usual, Burt returns to Norma for congratulations—and to catch his breath.

"Cute Tomata"

■ Color, the sweetheart of fashion, challenges style for top honors. A sizzling new shade of red "Cute Tomata" by Cutex couples the fire of the sun with the mellowness of moonlight to create a nailpolish and matching lipstick color that will give plenty of dash to you as well as all your clothes. Cole of California uses "Cute Tomata" as inspiration for the one-piece cotton swimsuit worn here by Debra Paget—it has "Cute Tomatas" dancing all over it. Swim cap by Playtex. (Continued from page 29) most certainly could, Ann explained her bundles.

"Oh, this is a television script, Louella. You know I've been doing TV right up to ten days ago when I started to show. This is the script I'm going to do a few weeks after the baby is born.

"Those other bundles are samples. I'm not taking any chances on having the wrong welcome for either a boy or a girl. The nursery so far has blue furniture, blue rug, blue wallpaper and a pink sofa—but I think I'll add a few yellow touches. My close friend, Jeanne Crain, tells me yellow has become very chic for nurseries. Jim and I want our baby to have the latest fashion gasp.

"That sample over there," she pointed to one of the bags piled on the table, "has a combination of pink, blue and yellow in a lovely organdy. And that bundle holds some plain diapers. You know, all the gifts I got at showers were so fancy—diapers, if you please, with rosebuds!"

Ann threw back her lovely head and laughed with a heartiness completely new in this girl who has always been so restrained and demure even when amused.

THERE ARE so many new things about Ann these days, perhaps the most noticeable being the new maturity of her beauty. Despite her pregnancy, her face is thinner, revealing the lovely bone structure.

In her soft, pale pink maternity dress with an embroidered collar and a petticoat trimmed with rhinestones she looked like a lovely modern Madonna—until she spoke. Then her down-to-earth humor, particularly about her "interesting condition," was very much that of this world.

"For a little while," Ann smiled, "I thought I was going to be sort of a wonder of nature, not showing my condition until the baby arrived. Until a few weeks ago I don't think you could tell I was going to have a baby, do you?"

I certainly didn't—and said so. At the Academy Awards, singing the Oscar-winning song, she looked so slender that many people criticized Donald O'Connor for remarking that the number had been sung by "Ann Blyth and family."

As I told you in Good News last month, the person least upset about Don's description was Ann herself! "Such a fuss about nothing," she said at the time, "since when is having a baby in bad taste? Or even mentioning the fact?"

I said, "Ann, I can't remember any girl expecting a baby who has been as busy professionally and socially as you have been while you were enciente, to put it Frenchily. Many about-to-be-mothers for the first time make a point of taking it easy."

"Why shouldn't I keep busy?" she asked, sipping her tea, "I've felt much too well to be idle.

"Besides, I've had such a wonderful sense of security—especially with Jim's being the fine obstetrician he is. Jim is the one who has encouraged me to keep busy as long as I felt well. Do you know," she added, her eyes wide, "I didn't even have morning sickness!

"Once in a while I've felt like being lazy," she laughingly admitted, "but my Jim kids me out of it. If I just sit for hours, doing nothing he'll say, 'Ann, do you want to have to take off a lot of weight after the baby comes?' That sets me to jumping, you can bet.

"I believe that one of the best things that happened to me was that Jim put all kinds of books on childbearing and the care of infants into my hands."

Ann went on, "I wasn't exposed to a lot of gossip about terrible pain or any of the old wives' tales about prenatal influence. Jim particularly insisted that I wasn't to think of myself as an invalid."

"Well, you certainly took him at his word," I laughed.

I KNEW, for instance, that while pregnant Ann had started and finished her picture, Rose Marie; that she had appeared on countless TV shows; that she had been rehearsing her nightclub act which she will open in Las Vegas later in the season, and she had been flying!

"Oh, yes," she affirmed, "we've flown to San Francisco and to Las Vegas. It was so much fun going to Las Vegas with Jim and my aunt and uncle and Mr. and Mrs. Newt Bass, from Apple Valley. We also spent a vacation there.

"You know, I think I'm going to like my nightclub experience in Las Vegas. I want to take the baby with me. I couldn't bear to leave him—or her—for a minute."

"Ann," I laughed, "you're going to be singing Irish lullabies in a streamlined fashion. Imagine finishing a song number in one of those gilded gambling palaces and then dashing backstage to give the baby its bottle."

"The baby won't be backstage. It will have the best and quietest suite in the place," she assured me.

"Do you think Jim will mind your taking the baby to Las Vegas," I asked, "or haven't you had your first argument yet with that good-looking Irishman?"

SHE SAID seriously, "No, we have never had an argument—and I hope we never have our first one. I just can't believe that every marriage has to have its ups and downs, even minor battles during which little cruel things are said. I just don't believe this is necessary where two people share love and respect equally.

"If Jim and I are thinking a little differently about even the smallest thing, we talk it out. It doesn't take me long to see his side and it doesn't take him long to see mine. Insisting on having one's own way all the time is sheer stubbornness."

"Ann," I said, "you are such a sensible little girl and, to me, you are still very much a little girl. Just a few years ago you were having chaperoned dates."

Ann said with dignity, "But the important thing is that inside my mind and heart I'm no longer a little girl, Louella. I'm a woman experiencing the most miraculous things that can happen to a woman —marriage and motherhood.

"There is not a night that goes by that I do not thank God for my womanhood. Right now I can think of nothing except my baby who will soon be here.

"I have such wonderful thoughts for him—or her. If it's a boy his name will be Timothy Patrick McNulty. Nothing would make me prouder than for him to follow in Jim's footsteps in the medical profession. But if he wants to be a trapeze artist—well, his ma will be ringside rooting for him.

"The same thing goes for Maureen Alanna—that's the name we've selected for a daughter. We found that name in an Irish book with 3000 names. If Maureen Alanna is interested in acting or singing—her parents will be happy."

I laughed, "Suppose Timothy wants to be a singer and Maureen wants to be a doctor?" I suggested. "That's the way the best laid plans of parents usually work out, Ann."

"Believe me, that's all right, too" smiled Mrs. McNulty. "All I hope is that I shall have many, many children," Ann hesitated a moment before she continued, "so I can just mother them."

I KNEW she was thinking of her own mother, the wonderfully kind and understanding woman who died in 1946 when Ann was in her early teens and needed her most. Her grief verged on desperation.

As though she had picked up my thought, Ann said softly, "After the first shock of losing my mother, my deepest emotion was bitterness. I thought, 'Why should this happen to me? Why, why?'

"But luckily, I had my Aunt Cissy and Uncle Pat (Tobin), those beloved people with whom I came to live. They said to me: 'Ann, we can go just so far with you in your grief. You must find your own way. Your mother isn't lost to you if you seek her through prayer and faith and the knowledge that she is still with you forever and forever. But you cannot find her if you are bitter and nurse a sense of betrayal.'

"I know now how right they were, Louella," Ann said. "But how wonderful it is going to be to put my arms around my babies and hold them close and warm to—their mother! We're getting awfully serious, aren't we?"

In a lighter tone, she continued, "I don't think there's much doubt but that Jim and I will have a large family if heredity helps. Jim's parents have five sons, a daughter and twenty grandchildren."

We both laughed again—good laughter. It's very easy for Ann to laugh these days. Seemingly, she has everything in the world to make a woman happy—a fine and respected career, a family started and the devotion of her wonderful Dr. Jim.

Although Ann had been a contented girl ever since she found her way after losing her mother, I think her supreme consciousness of happiness came when she met Dr. McNulty.

"How did he happen to date you the first time?" I asked Ann.

SHE SMILED, "He did it very reluctantly. His brother, Dennis Day, asked Jim if he'd like to go to dinner with his wife and himself and he said I'd be along.

"Jim said, 'You mean Ann Blyth, the movie actress?' Dennis replied, 'That's the one.' Later, Dennis told me that Jim had said 'No, thanks'—but for some odd reason he came along."

I asked, "What first attracted you to Jim?"

"Well, first," Ann laughed, "I liked his looks. He looks so Irish with his dark hair and blue eyes and I have a weakness for the Irish.

"But almost immediately I was conscious of his kindness. I thought when I first met him, and I still think, that he's one of the kindest men I've ever known.

"It's a quality that does not always go with a young man—but I think my Jim was born with it. Dennis says so. Dennis and Jim are brothers next-to-each-other.

They always have been very close."

"Was it love at first sight?" I prodded.

"All I can say to that is that I hoped he would call me again and again—and again. And he did!

"We went together for six months and I think we both realized we were growing closer and closer. One evening Jim said, 'Ann, you and I are beginning to look a little alike.' And it was true.

"But still, he didn't get around to popping the question," Ann laughed. "I was beginning to wonder. Later, Dennis told me Jim had bought a ring and had been carrying it around for weeks without getting up enough nerve to ask me.

OH, DADDY!

A few years ago Clark Gable passed through our town and walked into a little store in my neighborhood. My family and I were in the store, too, and joined the crowd around him. We were right beside him when my little sister started screaming, "Where is he, Daddy? I want to see him!" We looked down to see her pulling on Mr. Gable's coat-tail, thinking it was her father's!

Alice Dickenson

"One night he came to pick me up—I think we were going to an industry dinner—and he sort of grabbed at his pocket, fished out the ring and said, 'Here, Ann. Do you want this?'

"Do you know what I did? It was such a surprise and I was so happy, I got sick to my stomach! My aunt made me go and lie down a little while. Isn't that a fine and romantic way to accept a proposal?"

Before I could answer, Ann was chatting on happily, "The funny part is that Jim told me he felt a little like fainting himself! That is the first and last time we've made each other sick!"

THE AFTERNOON shadows were lengthening over the garden when Ann arose and said she had marketing to do yet.

"No, no," I cried, "not more bundles to carry?"

"And dinner yet to cook," she chuckled, "Believe it or not, I'm becoming a very good cook, balanced meals, right number of vitamins and that sort of thing. I really have to keep on my toes because Jim is a very fine cook. I think that when men are good cooks they're much better than women, don't you?"

Never having been lucky enough to have been close to a man who was tops in the culinary department I couldn't speak with authority on this subject. But I did congratulate Ann on her good luck.

On second thought as I watched her leave, her newly awkward figure burdened down with samples and materials and scripts, I questioned whether the happiness Ann has found can be attributed to luck.

In the case of this really fine and religious girl, isn't Ann's luck more a manifestation of the lovely things she so richly deserves—a reflection of the kindness and goodness she herself brings to her career, to her home and to her friends?

This conception of her as an aloof type came only after she had left England and arrived in Hollywood. She had been essentially as lighthearted as ever then—though without the former need to be wildly impetuous about it. Her youthful curiosity about gay living had been so well satisfied that it wouldn't matter to her if she never got inside another nightclub.

She had been as happy when shortly after her arrival in California she eloped to Arizona to marry her Jimmy—the Jimmy Stewart who had to change his name to Stewart Granger when he became a star in a screen world which already had one Jimmy Stewart.

THEN CAME her legal fight with Howard Hughes (and Jimmy made it his fight too, of course) over an extended contract for her services which Hughes claimed to have and they insisted he did not. It was then that Jean, who felt that her rights were being threatened, and who resented the columnists' constant references to the fact that her husband was so much older than she, began to wonder about Hollywood. She used to ask, "Do all people here behave like this?"

Hollywood, she came to realize, could learn to like new-comers quickly only if they fitted into a familiar pattern. She and Jimmy obviously didn't; what was the use of kidding about it? Their personalities were not to be gathered up and catalogued in one quick look or scratchy interview. It was to take time for Hollywood to get to know Jean Simmons and Stewart Granger—and for them to know Hollywood.

Now something has occurred which indicates that the time may have arrived. Jean was talking to one of her studio's publicists and she quietly agreed to be interviewed—her first real interview in almost a year. That happened toward the end of the filming of The Egyptian. Not once during the shooting of The Robe had she consented to talk for publication. So her words were a pleasant surprise.

"You mean you're not peeved at the world of journalism any more?" he asked.

"I don't think I ever was, really," Jean replied. "I was angry only at the people who have tried to hurt me by being very careless with their words and suppositions. And you know, when you are in that sort of mood your resentment tends to overlap and take in others as well."

Jean is too friendly and open to continue a remote social existence in a community where she and her husband are establishing themselves successfully, and among whose citizens they will probably be living for many years to come. He has had his troubles in Hollywood too; not only on her account, because he has always been quick to shield her from attack, but also because he never soft-pedals any of his opinions.

This habit of making the forthright response, which has hitherto rubbed people the wrong way, now and then seems to win Stewart respect and even friendship. His handling of the ticklish question as to whether or not he and Jean plan to become American citizens (a step that always perturbs British actors, not to speak of their British fans) is one of the most blunt, yet adroit, noted in Hollywood.

"After all, you've been in Hollywood more than four years," a columnist said to him. "And you are making a living here. Don't you think it's time to decide to become an American?"

"Why, I'll leave it to you," said Stewart. "Suppose you, born and bred an American, had worked in England for four years. Would you think it time enough to decide whether to become a British subject? Or would you want to deliberate some more?"

The writer, unable to contemplate giving up his citizenship at any time under any conditions, grimaced and then smiled weakly. "I see what you mean," he said.

JEAN KNOWS that the sweetening of her relations with Hollywood and the press means that she is going to find herself busier than ever fulfilling publicity and industry obligations which will be sure to start piling up. This will be troublesome because Jean has been and is going to continue to be a very busy girl.

The Egyptian is her twenty-fifth picture. By the time you read this she will be working with Marlon Brando in Desiree and other productions for her are in the planning stages. She hopes to manage anyway. She is bothered by the possibility that she and Stewart will not be able to live as quietly as they have. She enjoys the quiet informality of their life.

They spend a bit of time with the Michael Wildings. It is getting so that when Jean Simmons and Elizabeth Taylor sit together now they look enough alike to be sisters. They see a few other friends, but mostly they are "home bodies."

When they lunch out occasionally they like to lose themselves in the crowds at the Farmer's Market. They seldom dine at the flashy steak tabernacles, preferring the more solid, if quieter, establishments like Scandia and the Cock and Bull.

Their home today is a three-bedroom, ranch-style house high on Mulholland Drive. They bought it after deciding that their first home—a $125,000 Bel Air residence which they have not yet been able to sell—was too large a pile of stone for one couple. "Stewart was like any new husband," says Jean when defending his purchase of this extravaganza. "He felt like starting off with his bride in a house that was built for the ages. The only trouble was that it was like a forgotten castle; and you could easily get to feel the same way yourself, tucked away in a corner of it. That wasn't so good."

Just as they have been trading homes, Jean and Stewart have been doing some automobile trading as well. Stewart had a blue Jaguar until last year when he decided to give the Jag to Jean and get himself a new Mercedes-Benz. Then Jean decided she wanted a Mercedes-Benz, too, and traded the Jaguar for one.

And Jean is no slouch at driving. She used to hit 100 miles an hour between London and the movie studios at Pinewood in her little English racer. In her Jaguar she has been clocked out on the desert at 135 miles per hour which is just about as fast as it can go and faster than it should.

STEWART took over the cooking as soon as they were married and still does it. They cannot understand why people persist in thinking this an extraordinary arrangement. As Jean has said a hundred times: "It isn't that I don't want to cook. It's that Jimmy is so much better at it! Isn't it silly for an amateur to be cooking for an expert?"

Jean explains to anyone who is interested, that she had tried sometimes to do the cooking. The last time she announced that dinner was to be barbecued chicken. Well, the chicken wasn't so bad when it finally came off the spit. The green vegetables she cooked were not bad, nor were the baked potatoes—nor the appetizer and salad. The trouble was the timing. They had reached edibility at staggered intervals—badly staggered. Jimmy has not been unkind about it, but has proposed that they use a bit of common sense.

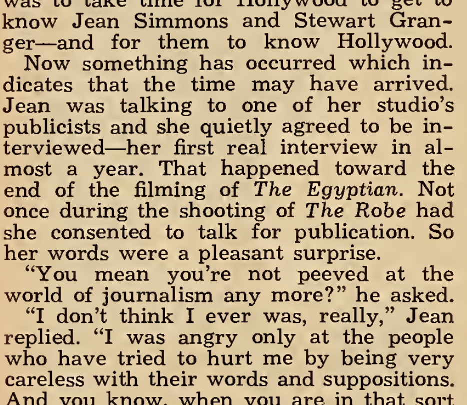
"You stick to acting, darling, and make some money," he advises. "I'll try and do the same, but also handle the cooking."

Jean thinks this is common sense and she plans to do just that; keep acting and keep making money until something happens that she hopes will happen soon in her marriage; Jean wants children. Stewart, the father of two children by his first marriage, even talks about retiring from pictures some day to become a farmer, and Jean is perfectly caught up with the idea. "I'd love to raise youngsters on a farm," she says.

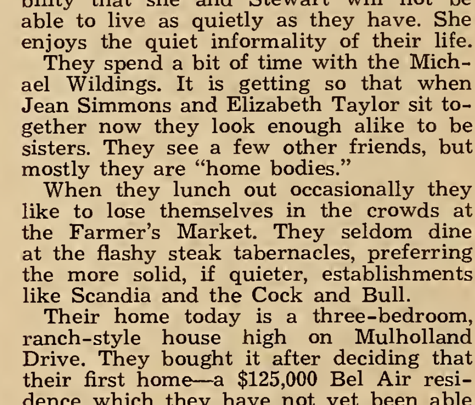
As it is, Jean no sooner gets home from the studio than she transforms herself into a farmhand, donning either jeans or slacks usually topped by one of Stewart's sweatshirts. She always orders light lunches at the studio to make sure she will have a good appetite for Stewart's dinner, and the meal is invariably served, not in the diningroom, but from a tray set in front of the television set in the living room. A third diner will be Bill Rushton who has been Stewart's chauffeur, groom, dresser and general factotum for years. Occasionally they will have a guest for dinner and most often he will be Spencer Tracy, a friend ever since Jean and he starred in The Actress together. Spencer loves to eat Stewart's steaks and belittle his politics.

THERE IS almost always an argument about the choice of TV programs. Jimmy and Bill want to watch boxing and can always dig a fight program out of some channel. Naturally, they don't force their preference on her—they are democratic and always take a vote, which, unfortunately, is always two-to-one against her. Jean, who wants to look at such favorites of hers as Groucho Marx and Burns and Allen and Jack Benny and Omnibus and Sid Caesar, most often finds herself, like so many long-suffering wives, watching "Kid Something Or Other" wallop the stuffing out of "Kid Somebody Else."

Spencer Tracy told her at one dinner she should assert herself in this unfair situation. "Insist on seeing what you like," he had advised.



Before marriage settled her down a bit Jean enjoyed living it up with sports cars, night clubbing, dusk-to-dawn parties with her friends.



Now fully domesticated, Jean prefers to let Stewart do the cooking, barbecue chickens in the "African den" that he designed himself.

"Tonight?" she asked.

"Hm-m-m. Not tonight," Spencer stalled. "There are some special fights on tonight and I'd sort of like to see them myself."

Stewart's choice of television programs is about the only kind of decision he makes that Jean criticizes. She leans heavily on him for advice about her career, her clothes and even her make-up. His judgment and taste are excellent, she thinks. "Mine isn't by any means," she reports.

It was Stewart who decorated their home and if it seems a bit extreme (original paintings hang alongside his African trophies—the mounted head of a giant Cape buffalo, for instance) she believes it's just because style and custom haven't caught up with him.

STEWART HAS a set of personal values which Jean is catching up with and beginning to understand. If she scores a professional victory at the studio he will be pleased, but he can be more highly impressed, sometimes, by evidence of self-improvement in personal traits. When Jean decided to quit smoking his admiration was unexpectedly overboard. "Good girl!" he kept telling her. "Stick to it!"

Unfortunately, Jean proved to be more ordinarily human than heroic in this little drama. In a few days she found herself sneaking puffs in the bathroom. She quickly decided she couldn't go on living any longer in a false light and that it would be best to confess. Such as she is, and such as he is, they have been getting along famously. She didn't want any lie to come between them. And none ever will if she can help it. END

"You don't understand," said the perspiring press agent. "This guy's brand new. He's never done anything before."

The lady snorted. "Do you think I was born yesterday? Don't give me that Cinderella-boy stuff. It just doesn't happen in Hollywood any more."

The outraged cynic was absolutely right. It doesn't. And yet, to all appearances, it certainly had for the tall, husky and handsome specimen of young American manhood named Robert Charles Francis. The press agent was making true talk. Fame suddenly pegged big Bob Francis right out of left field. Until he took on the prize romantic role of Ensign Willie Keith in The Caine Mutiny, Bob had never earned a nickel from any kind of performing.

If it hadn't been for a sizzling Fourth of July five years ago, the idea of emoting for a living wouldn't have entered his head.

Bob Francis had rolled down to the Santa Monica beach with Nanette Burris in her midget Crosley runabout—to make parking easier. But when he tried to park his own long legs on the sands there was barely room in the mob—and how could he ride the waves when the surf was a pudding of bobbing heads?

It took Bob Francis exactly ten minutes to realize that seaside sport on the Glorious Fourth was a bum idea, shake out the beach blanket and drive off with Nanette. Those ten minutes changed his life.

A Hollywood talent scout spotted his dreamboat physique and features and jotted down the license number as the Crosley dug out. Next day he called Nan and Nan called Bob. Today Robert Francis is the hottest young actor in Hollywood.

If you call Bob a Cinderella boy, you'd better smile when you say it. In all this, luck obviously figured but hocus-pocus did not. It took five years of hard study to learn his stuff and prepare for his break. But when it came he was ready, and now that glory's here he can handle that too. He still lives in the small Pasadena cottage where he grew up with his mother and his postman dad, and a home town girl is still his sweetheart. The nightcap he still prefers is bread crumbled in milk, and he still takes acting lessons twice a week.

Keeping his feet on the ground but also steadily moving ahead has been a habit with Bob Francis ever since he was born in Burbank, California, twenty-four years ago last February 26. "A perfect picture baby," his mother recalls proudly, "golden curls and all—but with a mind of his own beneath them."

Nine days after he came home a doting grandmother sewed him a frilly cap and placed it on the ringlets. At an age when most mites can't raise their arms, Bob shot his up and yanked it off disgustedly. He hasn't worn a hat since. Nobody around his house remembers a time when he cried either, even when he banged into the furniture. Baby Bob never bothered with crawling; he just reared up and walked.

Bob's confident, independent attitude toward life traces to a bunch of basic blessings he's enjoyed all along. For one thing, he comes of sturdy stock. From his parents he inherited bold characteristics and a heroic body. It was a help to have a big brother, Bill, ten years older, a sister, Lillian, eleven ahead, to advance his outlook. "I was an afterthought baby," Bob grins. "But nobody babied me much." His dad confirms that. "We looked after Bob, but we let him take care of his own affairs," he says. "That's the way to make a boy a man."

Bob's dad was an electrician when Bob was born, but three months later when that job ran out, he moved back to his home town of Pasadena and turned postman. Bob grew up in the modest frame cottage his dad built thirty-two years ago.

At both Hamilton Elementary and Wilson Junior High Bob is remembered as a hard-working, good, steady student, the kind of dependable kid that teachers invariably picked as a monitor and street-crossing guard. Being the leader type and big, Bob starred in all the playground sports—football, baseball, track until today he grins honestly, "Sports? You name it, I can do it." He never missed a Sunday at the First Baptist Church where his pop taught a Sunday School class, also acted as Scoutmaster for Troop 49, B.S.A. Bob sang in the boys' choir there. For a while, he dutifully plugged at the dancing, piano and violin lessons his mother insisted upon.

What Bob Francis really craved—and still does—was the outdoors. With a Scoutmaster dad and an Eagle Scout big brother, Bob contracted a fever for outdoor life he has never lost. Even several close calls with angry rattlesnakes didn't intimidate him—or his Scoutmaster father. "I always knew Bob could handle himself wherever he was," says William Francis. Sometimes Bob's mom wasn't so confident.

Like at the beach where the Francis family camped every summer in tents.

It's harrowing for a mother to spy the bobbing head of her twelve-year-old boy out past the breaker line, see him take reckless headers off a thirty-foot pier or watch him ride the hissing crest of giant rollers that could break his neck if he made a split-second miscalculation. Lillian Francis knew what lifeguards meant when they sighed, "I like that kid—he's got nerve. But when you people leave—thank God, I'll get a day's rest!"

Bob Francis never was in the perilous plight that he seemed to be in eternally. He caught on quickly with the instinctive coordination and savvy of a natural athlete.

Everyone took him for years beyond his age. He was oversized early—six feet at thirteen—and knew his stuff. Once down near Oceanside a bunch of Marines, spotting Bob in his Sea Scout suit, thought he was a gob and invited him back to the Pendleton base. He yanked off the telltale Scout insignia and had a whirl—although his dad later bawled him out for posing for what he wasn't.

Bob was through high school at sixteen and went to Pasadena City College, although his academic career was mostly a case of going through the motions. He made his grades of course, did all right socially as a "Deezer" (Delta Sigma Rho fraternity) and knocked around with a little football but all the time his heart and mind were somewhere else — skimming mountain slopes on a pair of skis. That was such a big teen-age charge with Francis that it never occurred to him that he might be in anything but the ski business the rest of his life. He hadn't thought of acting.

"I never was even a bunny in an Easter play at school! I never went to movies. I couldn't stand to stay indoors that long. Yep, there was the Pasadena Playhouse right in my own home town. Famous too, but I never bothered to look inside the place. Just wasn't interested—then."

This skiing kick (which still haunts Bob) started when his brother Bill, an expert, put him on waxed slats at eleven and pushed him down a hill. He almost knocked down a pine tree, but Bob knew right away it was for him. Soon he was racing down the scary slopes of Mount Baldy and winning cups. Nothing much discouraged Bob—not even when in one downhill race he ducked a contestant who crossed his path, broke his pole and ran it through Bob's arm. Bob finished with the stick piercing his flesh—and won the race.

When Bill returned home from the Air Transport Command after the war, he wanted to open a ski shop in Pasadena with his brother Bob for his partner. "The Ski Cellar" started while Bob was still in school and flourished, spreading to Mount Waterman and Big Pines ski resorts. "We did swell," remembers Bob, "and then boom—two winters of no snow, hardly a flake! We lost our shirts!"

After this debacle, Bob batted around in a state of confusion as his ski shop dream winked out. Bill got another job (being married, he had to) and today is a successful businessman. But for Bob, "The rug was really pulled out," he says. "I was a pretty mixed-up boy about then. I wanted to finish college to please my folks and for a while thought I'd go over to Colorado U. But when I leveled with myself I knew I wanted to go there for the good skiing. I couldn't be a financial burden to them when I wasn't after any profession. So I just wandered around for a few weeks trying to think things out." He had applied for a gas station job when that hot Fourth of July steered him to the beach—and that changed everything.

"I figured somebody was crazy," he grins, "maybe me. But I also thought, 'Why not? What have I got to lose?'" So he called the number and made the date, feeling out of place and awkward.

When he tackled a reading for drama coach Sophie Rosenstein, Bob delivered his lines with all the finesse and feeling of a railroad conductor announcing station stops. Miss Rosenstein had to tell him the truth: "You're much too raw for us to consider here." But the attractive qualities that everyone sees today in Bob Francis—his great good looks, manliness and fresh, clean-cut personality prompted a suggestion she wouldn't ordinarily make to one so green. "You have possibilities," she said, "and if there's anyone in Hollywood who can bring them out it's Botomi Schneider. If you're serious about this, I'll call her." Bob allowed he was, although that was an impulsive statement. In his addled state, he really didn't know. Nor did he know how lucky he was when Botomi said she'd take him on. But now he knows. "I owe everything to her," says Bob honestly. "She did it all."

He calls the Schneiders, Botomi and her husband, Benno, "my second parents." Botomi Schneider is a remarkable teacher, blessed with the gift of bringing out talent in young people. She has smoothed the rough edges of such stars as Virginia Mayo, Vera-Ellen, Joanne Dru, Piper Laurie, Lex Barker and Tony Curtis—to begin a long list. "I never had a greener pupil than Bob," she says, "but also never one with greater promise. He was serious, intelligent, quick to learn, and above all, fiercely determined. Besides all that, he has irresistible charm and a natural authority in everything he does. He's still developing, but someday he'll be really great!"

When Bob Francis started his acting lessons he was as inarticulate as a cigar store Indian and sometimes got so mixed up in his scenes that he stamped off the stage in disgust. But after only a few weeks Botomi tested him in the role of an artist who suffers a nervous breakdown. "He broke into such convincing sobs and kept them up so long that I became frightened," she recalls. "After that we both took a phenobarbital and lay down to recuperate!"

Bob himself never had a weak moment, even though it wasn't all easy. "Sometimes," he remembers, "it was like slogging along a muddy road with loose boots, never really sure you're getting anywhere." It was a long hitch from Pasadena but he managed by bumming rides, borrowing his dad's Chevvy or hopping a jerky bus. Often he slept in the Schneiders' guest house, whipped up his own meals there and baby-sat with their kids, Nina and Tony.

"We looked on Bobbie as our son," says Botomi Schneider. "He's the kind of boy you instinctively have complete faith in." That went for all of Bob's classmates, too —David Brian, Danny Arnold, Jody Lawrence, Piper Laurie and the rest. As one of them, Don Oreck, who is Bob's best buddy today, says, "All of us knew Bob was going places even though he hadn't done a thing. The only question was when."

Where Bob went first however, was into the Army. Although he expected his "greetings," it was still a blow. "I thought sure I'd sweat it out in Korea," he grins, "and I wasn't sure there would be such an appreciative audience there for what I'd learned." Instead, he landed at Camp Roberts, only 170 miles north of Hollywood, and found a very appreciative audience indeed.

After his basic training someone read "studying to be an actor" on his papers and they gave him a job teaching diction and public speaking in the non-com leaders' course. At Camp Roberts Bob ran into his old dramatic school buddy, Don Oreck, and they became barracks bunkmates. Don is a handsome radio actor with an oversized funnybone and a fertile imagination. They turned into unreasonable G.I. facsimilies of Martin and Lewis.

IT ALL STARTED when Don got the reckless idea to break up a certain long and tedious class. He sent for some Nazi uniforms he'd collected at home and the pair put them on after working up a "Heil Hitler" routine that was sheer zaniness. "We stalked into the middle of class one day," relates Don gleefully. "And the instructing officer almost fainted. But the guys rolled in the aisles. A couple of hams like us went crazy collecting laughs and we really shook the place loose. Then when we were stalking out who should we see parked in the room but three generals—members of an inspection team. Bob stared at me and I stared at him and we both turned green."

To their immense relief, however, the generals were grinning. "Keep it up, boys," they said, "you're great for morale."

So, while Bob Francis soldiered conscientiously for two years he also kept his talents honed. Weekends he could roll down to Hollywood for a brush-up session with Botomi and some of his mom's home cooking. Once he almost didn't make it. The car he rode in slammed into a truck and was completely demolished. Another weekend car crash brought happier results. On leave in Pasadena, Bob saw a car smash broadside and a pretty girl bounce out. He dashed over, picked up the girl, bought her coffee at a drive-in to quiet her shaken nerves. Her name was Dorothy Ross, a co-ed he remembered vaguely at P.C.C. She's his steady today.

BOB WAS MUSTERED out in 1952 with no casualty other than a touch of chicken pox to show for it and no particular martial honors except his corporal's stripes. He took a two-week vacation in Las Vegas without dropping his Army pay savings, then used them to re-enroll in Botomi Schneider's acting classes. It was a month later that what he calls "That Great Day" arrived—only he had no idea it was dawning. Bob still felt he wasn't ready to turn pro, and even Botomi, a perfectionist, agreed. But her husband, Benno, who has a steady drama coaching post at Columbia, had other ideas.

Benno knew what headaches Columbia's talent executive, Max Arnow, had worked up hunting a fresh, typically American young actor to play boyish Willie in the studio's big effort, The Caine Mutiny. Where to find an unknown who wouldn't look silly alongside Humphrey Bogart, Van Johnson, Fred MacMurray and José Ferrer? Benno thought he knew where—right at his house. He told Arnow, "I think I've got your boy." Benno doesn't talk much but when he does people at Columbia listen. "Bring him over," invited Arnow. Right then Bob Francis had a straight shot at Hollywood's plum-of-the-year, although he certainly didn't know it.

"The phone rang a long time before it woke me up. So I was still fuzzy when Benno said, 'Can you come to the studio at two today and read for me?' That's all. I thought, 'Good. I'll get inside a studio at last.' but I also thought it was just for experience, maybe helping some contract girl in a test. My folks were gone and so was the car. I called Dorothy at the Jet Propulsion Lab where she works and she dropped hers off for me at the noon hour. I didn't bother with lunch, just rolled over when I got dressed—and the next thing I knew I had the script of The Caine Mutiny in my paws, but I still didn't catch on. I'd read the book in the Army but I didn't dream anything was there for me, especially 'Willie.' That was for someone like Montgomery Clift."

It took almost that whole day for Bob to figure what was going on around him—and ordinarily he's not a bit slow on the uptake. But it just seemed impossible—even when Benno took him in to see the studio boss Harry Cohn, and then producer Stanley Kramer who chatted and sized him up for four hours until it got dark and Bob's empty stomach started growling. Even when he read Willie's scenes for Kramer Bob didn't quite savvy. Of course, he didn't hear Kramer take Benno Schneider out in the hall and whisper, "That's the boy!"

IT WASN'T UNTIL they ushered him into the legal department and he scrawled his signature on a test contract that light on what was up began to break. "Then suddenly I got the shakes," chuckles Bob. "I had an awful time writing my name."

But those nerves were nothing compared to the next few days of suspense. Next morning he made a test with Donna Reed, the first time he'd ever looked into the business end of a camera. But he didn't fluff although they were three of the toughest scenes in the script. They flew the evidence to boss Harry Cohn in Hawaii and for the next five days Bob Francis walked around like a zombie.

marilyn monroe tells Sheilah Graham her thoughts on marriage and sex and babies in september's exciting modern screen! Marilyn's on the cover, too. At your newsstand august 5.

"Those five days were like five years," as he puts it. But the word came back at last and the word was "Okay."

Once Bob Francis tackled the serious business of making The Caine Mutiny, however, he settled down, cool as a cucumber. "I'm really not the nervous type," he protests, "when I know what I'm after." The fast star company didn't faze him, nor did the dramatic chores or the love scenes with May Wynn. He'd been prepping three years on his fundamentals. Strangely enough, the roughest job Bob encountered in his picture debut was keeping his carcass all in one piece, never much of a problem to him before.

He spent some bad times aboard the destroyer Doyle lying in his bunk with seasickness, thinking he'd die and afraid he wouldn't. He had a close shave with sharks diving from the deck off Pearl Harbor and got dumped with 70,000 gallons of water in a typhoon sequence. Probably the worst moment of all for Bob, who is afraid of high places, was the time he had to climb the ship's towering mast to the crow's nest as the camera swung 100 feet in the air to record his fright. "Brother, it was plenty real, too," says Bob. "I tossed my cookies when I got down on deck." A Columbia publicity man, however, swears the greatest perils Bob survived were 3000 University of Hawaii co-eds who milled around him on the beach at Waikiki!

SOMETIMES it's hard for Bob Francis to believe all that's happened to him is true. But he doesn't want any of it taken back. "Acting, I love," he says. "I eat and breathe it. It's a passion with me now, just like skiing used to be."

NOT ONE for cities, Bob says, "I've got to stretch out sidewise in all directions." Which is his way of saying he's still a western boy who needs plenty of room.

For instance, Bob has his suits expensively tailor made, but he has to get a fit for his big frame. Bob Francis has a high disdain for mere money. "Don't give a hoot for the stuff," he swears, "except to spend. I'll never be rich and I don't want to be." Right now, of course, he's not in the blue chips but already Hollywood business managers and agents are keeping his phone hot. He just laughs at their promises of riches. "Call you when I need you," he tells them, implying that's a long time off. A soft touch, he's always getting nicked.

HE'S JUST as relaxed about Hollywood social life. Bob hasn't shown at a Hollywood party yet although by now he's flooded with invitations. He's obliged for a couple of premières with Columbia stars and starlets, but tags that in the line of duty. That doesn't mean he's a square, just that he prefers to take his fun with the gang he has always known. With them he likes to drive to the beach, desert or mountains, and around town hunts out little clubs and cafes that aren't showcases, where when he dances, Bob says, "I can just step out on the floor and float around"—usually, of course, with Dorothy Ross in his arms.

"I have to be secure about myself," says Bob seriously, "before I think of marriage. Someday I want a house with land around it and plenty of things to fix up for my family and kids. I want to travel and see the world." He has started seeing it lately. Until Caine Mutiny Bob hadn't been out of California except to try out some ski slopes up in Utah and Nevada. But now he has been to Hawaii and New York and he is lined up to junket around quite a bit from now on.

RIGHT NOW it's hard to see what will keep Bob Francis from traveling fast and far—unless he breaks both legs, which hardly seems likely, as he hasn't the time to ski. Physically, there's absolutely nothing wrong with him except a tendency to sleep the clock around and a myopia which makes him wear specs off screen and sometimes turns his pink cheeks red. The other night, roaming around without his glasses at a party of old friends, Bob was muttering, "Nice to see you again—haven't seen you for a long time," to one and all.

"Yes, you jerk," said Don Oreck. "It is nice to see you again, isn't it? Remember me? I only brought you here!"

But sometimes even short-sightedness can be a help in the longer race. Especially if, like Bob, you get the habit of looking hard at what's close at hand, learn it well, and don't knock yourself out fretting about the future. Usually, in Hollywood or anywhere else, the future takes care of itself. The big break comes along if you rate it. At least that's how things worked out for Robert Charles Francis. END

CHEW-CHEW BABY

In 1944, I was with the Army in England. One day I was wandering through the Denham Studios and came across the set of Caesar and Cleopatra, co-starring Claude Rains and Vivien Leigh. During a break in the shooting I approached Miss Leigh to ask for an autograph. I was chewing gum at the time and before I could say a word, Miss Leigh said, almost wistfully, "Oh, what I wouldn't give for a stick of good old American chewing gum!" Needless to say, I received a very fancy autograph and Miss Leigh received five sticks of Wrigley's!

Well and good. Back to men.

"All right. But only if we leave words like 'middle-aged' out of it. I think every girl should know older men, even go with them, before she sails into marriage with a man her own age. And I certainly don't see any reason why she shouldn't marry one if she happens to love him. Older men have a great deal to offer that the younger ones don't have. That's not hooting down my own generation. I guess I've made it clear I like them all ages. But the age isn't the factor. It's the individual.

"Now I go out with an older man—let's say forty—and he has a tolerance a younger one might not have. His years are in his favor that way because he's apt to be more polished and more courteous and—well, every bit as interesting conversationally. To say the least.

"I don't mean in a high-brow sense. And I don't mean young men are dull. But it simply figures that the man who's lived longer has more to say and is better equipped to say it. Of course you might have more in common with a boy your own age. But a girl should grow, too, and she'll grow by learning, and she learns from her—well, seniors."

PIPER HAD EXPRESSED a universal fondness for the male sex. It is not to be construed from this that she is indiscriminate. On the contrary, she is discriminate as all getout. That's easy to spot. She's a red-haired party with perfect skin and exceptionally delicate, sensitive features.

"You see," she said, "there are so many small things a man should learn if he hasn't. There are so many small ways to embarrass a girl. And other girls will know what I mean. For instance, there was this man I used to date—he was fortyish—and on one of our first evenings out, he parked the car in a restaurant lot, got out and just headed for the entrance. And there I was, waiting for him to open the door for me on my side. I hadn't realized he wasn't going to, or I would have opened it myself to save him embarrassment. But I waited a few moments too long, and he was coming back while I was opening it.

It sounds like a small thing, as I say, and it was a small thing—except that it spoiled the whole evening. He had been made overly conscious of a slight slip, and I was the one who'd made him conscious of it. We both lost a little that evening. But always after that, he was much more courteous in the—you know, trivial ways—so it worked out all right in the end. But he was insensitive to begin with and I don't think girls like that, not that I'm setting myself up as a spokesman for American womanhood, but I don't. If I were writing a manual for escorts, it would be full of things like opening doors, seating your dinner partner and not stranding her in a crowded room. But what was funny about this episode was that he was an older man."

Had Piper any occupational preferences —in escorts, that is? She has dated actors, students and other non-professionals. Before her much-publicized attachment to Contino and her steady companionship with Goldstein, she had gone with Rock Hudson, George Nader, Vic Damone and independent producer Frank P. Rosenberg, a man of forty by now.

"No. No preference. Only in men. Of course, actors can be a lot of fun. It's a natural part of their make-up. I don't like a man to be too much of a sobersides, but even there, it depends on the person.

"I'm afraid of generalities and I can't be pinned down on an idea. There are too many ifs, maybes and on-the-other-hands."

Not even on so safe a topic as Hollywood wolves? Seems a girl couldn't make an error decrying these.

Piper laughed—an agreeable sound. "There are wolves and wolves. I've thought some of itemizing them. There's the one with the brotherly approach, just two kids together out for fun and laughs. Oh, so platonic! Only by and by it turns out that isn't entirely what he had in mind. That one's a sneak, I'd say. Even the forthright wolf is better and the forthright wolf is the most insensitive male there is. The older ones may warn you of the snares a young girl is subject to, without bothering to mention they're one of the snares. Then there's the wolf who doesn't care how much he throws the word love around, as if it were a volley-ball, and that's pretty disgusting. Need I go on?"

Thank you, no. Instead, could we return to the subject of Mr. Contino?

"Dick? What can I say? Dick—Dick has a lot of living to do, a lot to make up. The lost years and—well, you know." Contino, for the benefit of those who have been residing in Tibet, was jailed for draft evasion but later served honorably in the Army in Korea. He's paid up in full. Also for the Tibetan annex, he is a very highly paid and able accordionist. "People never knew the whole story of what happened to Dick—what was behind it all. I don't mean politics or anything like that, but if they knew it as well as I do, they'd be a lot slower to blame him. Anyway, it's done now and behind him, and I don't think the American people are going to want him punished any more. He's living it up now, and I don't blame him."

And Mr. Goldstein?

"We're just good friends," said Piper, producing the laugh again. "The Hollywood press would save itself a lot of trouble if they had a rubber stamp made of those words."

Piper hadn't been giving her contemporaries much of a shake up to now. Wasn't there something to be said for young males as well?

"But certainly!" cried Miss L., getting quite a lot of zip behind it. "Haven't I made that clear? Men are just wonderful —younger men, older men! Except for the ones that aren't. Some of my best friends aren't a jot over twenty-four. They aren't entirely mature yet, but then neither am I. And I guess that's what I like about them. It's a matter of occasion, too. For the concert or the theatre or dinner, perhaps, an older man might fit the bill better. But dancing or hiking or just a general fun party, you like people your own age. To tell you the truth, I don't know many men over thirty-five that I'd risk on a hike. They're all right when the going's level, but when you start uphill you leave 'em. And I'm an uphill hiker from way back."

Still and all, though, the young 'uns were prone to be less courteous?

"Usually. In the small things, remember. Not always. Here's another example of what girls don't like—and this was an older man, too. He took me—I forget, but it was some banquet downtown in a hotel. We came in through the bar. It was jammed. But instead of staying with me and helping me through the crowd, he just plowed on ahead like some kind of half-back. I couldn't move. Finally I got mad and just stood still. He was all the way to the dining room entrance before he missed me. Then he came back. And there was another evening half-ruined, because he'd been thoughtless and I'd made him realize it. Not that it ruined our friendship or anything like that, because it didn't. Maybe in the long run it did some good. But I'm not glad it happened. I repeat, men are just wonderful—but the little things, the little things, the little things!"

Piper, with her frequent date, producer Leonard Goldstein, claims older men are usually more tolerant and courteous than youngsters.

Piper's protestations to the contrary, half of Hollywood would not be surprised if she married Contino in the near future, meeting in the process his alleged demands that she confine her energies to being Mrs. C. and nothing else. The other half of Hollywood thinks it can't happen. This is the half that is dead convinced, correctly or otherwise, that Piper is a careerist before she is anything and that no trifling interloper such as love is going to derail her progress. It has been pointed out that she's had some mighty handsome matrimonial offers, and that nothing has come of them. Yet there is something wrong with the type-casting of this particular beauty as an inflexible careerist. She is small with a bell-like voice, almost wholly unassertive in casual conversation and professes no far-flung ambitions beyond an urge to be a better actress.

"For two or even three years I want to go on with my profession, grow as a—oh, there must be some better word than 'artist'—well, as an actress. After that, I just couldn't make a prediction. But right now I'm definitely not in love and I'm definitely not getting married."

The legend that Rosetta Jacobs, to give our heroine her proper handle, places the career of Piper Laurie above every other consideration may have its roots in one of several circumstances.

One is the amazing information that while still in grammar school this wunderkind wrote, produced and directed quite a few complete plays. Single-mindedness may be evidenced here.

Another is the testimony of a fellow player—not one of Piper's most devout rooters—that she can be a pretty dynamic personality when crossed unfairly.

A third is a matter of common information: between acting bouts, she likes most to act. That is true. After one take of a picture is made and while she's waiting for the next, this tireless mime dragoons fellow-members of the company into running through scenes from other pictures or from some totally unrelated play. Strictly for fun. Thus it cannot be said Piper doesn't know what she likes best to do.

Still, it is hard to envisage her as an unbending careerist, subject to no distractions in the way of amour or anything else. The steely set of the jaw is missing—and there is nothing peremptory in her regard for the male animal.

Piper is a Detroit girl of Polish and Russian extraction who moved to Los Angeles in time for high school, and thereafter latched on to pictures in practically no time. She was seventeen when Universal-International signed her, and eight months after that she was playing a lead opposite Tony Curtis in a number titled The Prince Who Was A Thief.

The picture remains and will forever remain the most memorable for Piper because it was her first. Some say it also whetted her appetite for fame to its present alleged dimensions. Piper says it's artistic fruition she wants. And it is only fair to point out that she ought to know.

Well, after The Prince, a pretty big deal of another sort took place, one over which Piper is still beaming. Los Angeles High School, at which she was a very bright student, never had seen its way clear to casting her in one of its plays. Now her doting alma mater invited her back for the unequivocal purpose of honoring her as an actress. That for the LAHS drama beagles!

And that, for three other major studios as well; not one, before U-I, had let her through the front gate more than once, each time for unsuccessful interviews.

Piper first came to national attention, though, not via the screen but by dining on camellias. There happened to be a cameraman present and the picture got rather wide distribution. Camellia-nibblers are uncommon except in the minds of publicists, where they are a dime a dozen, but other people were startled.

But to put this forward as still another proof of over-weening ambition is silly. Camellias don't taste bad, and besides she didn't eat the whole thing.

Except for this mild eccentricty and the drinking-of-tea-at-teatime, Piper is not a bit different from any other American girl who bumps maybe a bit more than a thousand dollars a week and looks like a prospector's mirage. She likes small parties, simple, tailored suits, peasant garb in summer, younger men, older men, in-between men, and strapless gowns for evening. She's a pretty fair hand with both oil painting and sketching in charcoal, and riding and swimming seem to her almost as much fun as walking uphill. She's a rather droll little character, too. Says funny things in that wisp of a voice.

Universal figures she's going a long, long way, and so, according to the poll, do the readers of this magazine. It is not simply a point of beauty, according to the studio's sharper judgment, but a quality that seems to detach her from a more or less mundane earth. One U-I attaché, not given to high-flown prose, has observed that she is not unlike a camellia herself.

"It's strange to me," said Miss L. now dunking the tea-bag a last time, "that anyone sees anything contradictory in my going with both Leonard and Dick. Or strange. Or why they say I've switched from Leonard to Dick, or the other way around. It's not a gap between a young man and an older man. They are simply two separate and distinct persons, and that's how I think of them.

"If you want to generalize—and you know I don't—you might say a young man's a little more possessive or dictatorial, the older man mellower and more tolerant. But there you're in trouble, because how can you do it without specifying? Which young man? What older man? You have to give me names. These rules of thumb don't work. I mean, they don't necessarily work. It's like saying, 'Youth calls to youth.' Not always, by any means. I have seen youths and youths with not so much as a whisper between them. There are individuals and that's all there are, so far as I'm concerned. Quote me no general quotes, please."

STRANGER ON HORSEBACK

When I lived in Los Angeles my mother and I often went driving in the country. One day we got stuck on a muddy road and, hard as we tried, we couldn't get out. A stranger came by on horseback and offered to help, but after struggling and pushing, we were still as stuck as ever. The man then offered to find a farmer who could pull us out with a tractor. In about fifteen minutes the farmer came and freed us. I never guessed who the helpful stranger was until my mother whispered that his name was Dick Haymes!

THE LAST WORD on the Contino deal was that Piper is very strong with Dick's grandmother. This good lady, who by all accounts is a superb cook, had called from San Francisco a few hours before tea time and asked her up there for a bowl of spaghetti—spaghetti Contino, that is, which is something rather special.

Piper was thinking of making the trip. And if Dick happened to be up there at the same time, what of that? Something suspicious about a boy's being with his grandmother? You'd like to make something of it?

Pardon. Contino's not a boy, he's a man. And men are just wonderful. You heard the lady. And as for so-called age, what's that? A state of mind—and a state of mind not shared by Piper Laurie. END

the lady said yes

Then precisely at eleven-thirty—according to unusually reliable sources—Bob asked Ursula a question he had been some time getting around to. The exact German equivalent is not available, but in American it goes: "Will you marry me?" At the same time, he produced a ring.

Hollywood, as well as a large part of the rest of the civilized world, had been wondering for quite a spell when Bob and Ursula were going to get this show on the road. Some even were making book on it, pro or con and name your own odds.

Until then, the closest Taylor had come to conceding anything was when he told MODERN SCREEN, three weeks before the announcement, the following, in reply to a direct query:

"That question has a familiar ring. I'll say this much, though. The lady's name is pronounced 'Teece.' You muffed it. I'll also say we are keeping company. And I don't mind telling you she was with me yesterday when I bought some Adler silverware. I figure it's time I began keeping a hope chest. Furthermore, I instructed that the monogram 'T' be put on the silverware. I'll even go this far; I'm house-hunting, sometimes as many as three and four houses a day, and sometimes Miss Thiess is with me. You may now conjecture your head off."

BUT THE NEED for conjecture is over. Miss Thiess and Mr. Taylor are married and the marriage has changed many things for Bob Taylor, as such happenings are wont to do. But one strange and spurious supposition about him, it has failed to dent—and this is the peculiar notion that Robert Taylor, married or not, is the loneliest man in Hollywood.

He may never shake that delusion.

For Bob Taylor once explained to the press, "I never go anywhere because nobody asks me anywhere."

Repercussions from this indiscreet—and endearing—bit of personal information have plagued him ever since.

"I keep reading," he said, "that I'm the loneliest guy in Hollywood. If I read it five more times, maybe I'll begin to believe it. Then I could have a hell of a time wallowing around in self-pity, except I'm not given to self-pity.

"The picture I get from it is Taylor slumped in his cell-like room night after night, surrounded by bats. That's interesting but inaccurate. I don't slump, my room isn't cell-like and I don't keep bats. In fact, I lead what I consider a very happy life, by which I mean a life that suits Taylor fine. But if I say that, the weepers insist I'm just keeping a stiff upper lip or whistling past the graveyard. It seems almost impossible for a naturally rather solitary person to convince the joiners that he's happy the way he is. But anyone like me—and I'll bet there are plenty—knows exactly what I'm talking about. You don't have to feel sorry for us. We don't feel sorry for ourselves. We like it."

BRIEFLY, Taylor's allegedly monastic existence runs like this: He has few close friends directly connected with the motion picture industry, but a fair number of convivial acquaintances away from it. He likes small gatherings where people sit on the floor and talk about the best ways to pot a Texas quail. Aside from golf (he's just taken it up and is not promising) he prefers the more solitary diversions—hunting, fishing, riding, flying. He is delighted with his freedom to go where he likes when he likes as he likes unless his work interferes.

"As I say," he went on after a moment, "this 'lonely' business began when I told that columnist I didn't go to any parties because I wasn't invited to any. Well, that's not strictly the truth, but for her purposes it was, and I guess for years as well, so I'll repeat it. I don't go to any parties because I'm not invited to any.

"But you have to understand that in Hollywood, a party is not a party unless it's one of those where—what is it they always say?—'Everybody who is anybody was there!' What a crushing thing it must be to 159,890,000 Americans to learn that they're not anybody! I think we should all band together to make up a mutual sympathy club. No, I'm not invited to those. I don't know any special reason. Oh, maybe if somebody like Jack Warner were giving a super soirée, he might include me, but I'd be an afterthought.

"Usually, I just read about them in the papers and try not to lose sleep over it. You understand I'm not crying. Unruffled, even—that's me. I'm just stating a fact. Only thing you might say about it is this (and I'm not sure even here I'm speaking the truth): maybe I don't want to go to the parties, but I'd like to be invited. Maybe. But you can't have one without the other, they tell me, and then I'd be in a fix. The social whirl. And what does that do to my freedom?"

Apparently, to Taylor's way of thinking, that makes him a prisoner of the RSVP set. You can't fly to Jackson Hole, Wyoming, because you're due at Brenda Gushberry's for cocktails. If you don't show, Brenda positively will never ask you again, and where does that leave you?

"In Jackson Hole, Wyoming," said Taylor. "And a very nice place to be, too. For me, I mean. For Taylor. Don't think I'm running down party-goers because I'm not. Start carping at another person's way of life just because it doesn't suit you, and you're not being what you'd call tolerant.

"But this 'lonely' bit—that baffles me. It has a pathetic sound to it, doesn't it? And I'm one of the least pathetic characters I know. It's as if I were to point to my opposite number and say, 'Poor Joe, always surrounded by people,' and then wipe a tear from my eye. Maybe he looks as pathetic to me as I look to him, but I try not to say so. It could be I think he's trapped and within himself more lonely than I—and all the people like me—less inner resource, you know. Or maybe that's not the case. But I wouldn't want to stick my finger in his eye, and out of reciprocal courtesy I'd thank him not to pity me."

Well, that's the root of Taylor's philosophy. Friends contend there are external circumstances, too, that limit his appearances these days at the gatherings attended by everybody who is anybody. Of course, for a long time before his first marriage he was in that state of being known in Hollywood, as in Chillicothe, as "out of circulation."

Both before that marriage and after it ended, Taylor was in great demand. There are less presentable specimens to be sure. When he narrowed his courting range to Miss Thiess, he became noneligible for the stag-line. Taylor, by fervent testimony of those who know him best, is an impeccable escort; courteous, engaging, non-assertive and postively not the one to stalk his date from Cadillac ambush. This is offered in refutation to those who have Heard It On Good Authority that a girl could do worse than wear track shoes in his company.

It so happens that Bob Taylor, having been around long and successfully, is capable of urbane indifference toward what is mouthed about him—urbane indifference, but not callousness, a state of skin no star can afford.

He may have winced from time to time. After the collapse of his eleven-year—and supposedly idyllic—marriage to Barbara Stanwyck, there were those who said Miss Stanwyck was bitterly angry, whereas Taylor wished to make it the chummiest of divorces. Unhappily for Taylor, Miss Stanwyck was among those who said it. For at least a year, she had no wish to speak to her erstwhile mate. And that agitated a tongue or two. There was talk, as there had to be talk, about Taylor and a girl in Rome, about Taylor and a girl in Palm Springs, about Taylor's alleged wolfishness that heretofore no one seemed to have noted. Taylor gracefully kept his mouth shut.

It is suspected by some that Taylor's extraordinary looks are a key to his personality. He is a diffident man, absolutely unwilling to thrust himself forward in any company, and despite his refusal to worry about it, may on occasion rest on a shaky social basis. That is guesswork, but documented guesswork.

Sometimes he seems to be over-controlled and only recently has he conquered a somewhat mannered habit of raising his right eyebrow while listening. This trick is thought by his handful of intimates to have been simply a product of nervousness, but its effect was superciliousness.

Extreme good looks are not necessarily a psychological asset. Not for a man. And any public reference to his facial appearance cracks his aplomb. It's practically the only thing that does.

For a brief while during the war, for example, Taylor, a Naval flying instructor with lieutenant's stripes, was stationed in Washington. And having led a pretty cloistered existence, he dropped in on one or two nightclubs with some friends. At one of these, a girl came over to his table, did a long, languishing take, and said with next to unbelievable gaucherie: "Gee, you're the most handsome man in the world!" Taylor—quite literally—paled, got up from a half-finished dinner, and left the premises. He had been thrown the unanswerable observation and behaved accordingly. Yet, it is not likely another star would have been so completely unhinged —even one with less metallic poise.

Maturity has taken him out of the over-handsome class that once marked him—unfairly, by the way—as pretty. There is nothing un-masculine about his features; they are startlingly regular, that's all. And even this doesn't go for his nose. It is, without a mustache to underscore it, a trifle hawkish. And Taylor doesn't wear the mustache "unless I'm using it"—i.e., unless it is necessary to a picture.

"Bob," a friend has said, "could very well have an inferiority complex. He has it under check, naturally, but did you ever see a normal personality quite so contained as his? This guy never lets go. As a kid, he was pretty close to being a male beauty and this may have affected his relations with the other youngsters and set the framework for what he was going to be later. No one can say what he might have been if he hadn't looked the way he does, but my guess is a solid Rotarian type who'd never get to Hollywood except for an American Legion convention. Or a cello player who liked to ride horseback or fly a rented plane weekends. He was pretty fair on the cello. But the face came along and crossed him up. Naturally, that's pretty fair crossing. Big money, fame, the chance to live the way he wants to."

Face or no face, Taylor has no vanity. Witness after witness has firmly deposed that so far as he is concerned, the mirror might as well not have been invented.

Probably the key to the Taylor character is his appreciation of independence. An inch has to be left here for guesswork, since Taylor is not given to self-analysis.

Independence is a better guess, anyhow, than "lonely" or "self-centered" or "solitary." It implies a jealous regard for freedom of action. If this freedom were curtailed he would, in truth, become a morbidly unhappy man.

At the completion of Knights Of The Round Table, for instance, Taylor felt, as he usually does after any picture, an overwhelming urge to get out of town. He owns a Beechcraft—an eight-passenger plane that runs into a lot of money—but then, Taylor makes a lot of money.

So he and Ralph Couser, his long-time friend from Navy days and chief pilot for MGM, piled in and flew to Palm Beach. They had nothing special to do there but Taylor wanted to drop in on another friend to see if there was anything worth eating for dinner. There was. Later they flew back to New Orleans, one of Taylor's war-time stations, and renewed a warming acquaintance with a restaurateur who interchanges normal false teeth with a set that are diamond encrusted. Still later they caught up with New York, where they dined one night with the entire chorus of the Copacabana nightclub line. It was reported in Hollywood that Taylor alone had taken the whole chorus out!

It was a junket at once aimless and genial, and Taylor happens to like that sort of dido. He flies to Illinois once in a while for no sounder reason than an evening of reminiscence with a Navy friend there; to South Dakota or Texas or northern California to hunt or fish; or to Alaska because he'd never been there.

Robert Taylor was born Spangler Arlington Brugh in Filley, Nebraska, a little more than forty years ago, the son of Ruth Adelia Stanhope and Dr. Spangler Andrew Brugh, the latter a sort of self-made physician. That is to say, the late Dr. Brugh, a grain dealer by vocation, adopted the study of medicine in middle life to try and find a cure for his ailing wife. His efforts paid off.

Eventually the family moved to Pomona, not far from Hollywood, and young Mr. Brugh did well in Pomona College's senior class play, Journey's End.

The rest of this is paralyzingly familiar. Talent scout. MGM contract. But no parts. Discouragement. *En*couragement—from L. B. Mayer. Small break. Big break—opposite Irene Dunne in Magnificent Obsession in 1936. Then the next eighteen years could not be called unalloyed clover, but they were pretty smooth going. There were no serious interruptions to Taylor's screen career. The war arrested it but did not deflect its upward curve.

Taylor is in most respects an exemplary fellow. Punctual. Clean-cut. Doesn't get loaded. Never, in lots of ways, left Nebraska.

The anecdotes that pursue him most often go like this one. He and Couser, his pilot friend, break down while en route by car to a fishing trip. Truck driver helps them out. Truck driver, who had at first regarded Taylor with truculent suspicion, warms to him over a few nips of Taylor-owned Scotch. Would have warmed to him anyway. "Tyler," guy finally says, pronouncing it the way it's spelled there, "you're awright. First, I thought you were some so-and-so movie star."

Then again, Taylor and Couser were flying once over some country that wouldn't have been easy to sit down in, when the wings iced up and the propellers failed. They lost 10,000 feet before things got back to proper. Taylor, by solemn testimony of both, said nary a word during the whole excruciating experience. Stayed with the controls in taut-faced silence, just like in the movies.

"How could he talk?" Couser has said, in moving tribute. "He fainted!"

"That wasn't it," declares Taylor. "I was just scared speechless."

Dennis Day at the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick banquet: "The Benny-Baker wedding was really a gorgeous ceremony. I think Jack is the first father of the bride who ever wept and validated parking tickets at the same time" . . . Also: "Jack just found a new use for old razor blades. He shaves with them" . . . Also: "Jack's had one cake of soap for three years and you can still read the word IVORY on it."

Mike Connolly in The Hollywood Reporter

The median fact is that Taylor is a competent, experienced pilot, and one who loves to fly. He's a good shot, either hunt or skeet, a good man with a fishing rod and a better than good horseman. His tennis is inoffensive, his golf woeful and his knowledge of—and talent with—foods very commendable. He likes to eat simply and well—and he does like to eat.

"So," said Taylor in summation, "we go back to the loneliness. If you want to regard it mathematically, it could be true. I have exactly two friends in Hollywood. Two. That may be counting it kind of close but it's a good, round number. But if the way I live is loneliness, then it's a different word from what the dictionary says it means. For me, it's the happy way. And I still have a dollar that says there are lots like me. And we mean it. We're not taking a defensive attitude."

And it was on approximately this note that the loneliest man in Hollywood went his lonely way, looking completely happy about it—happy as a clam or a guy who'd just knocked over a big lie about himself. And every bit as happy as bridegrooms are said to be. END

salt water dillies

(Continued from page 50) in twenty seconds, and adjourned to the beach—a beautiful stretch of clean white sand, punctuated at water's edge by rocks crawling with all kinds of tiny sea animals. They had a ball game and Bob and Scott proved that each could tote a pretty girl on his shoulders endlessly up and down the strand without getting tired.

At sundown Scott disappeared into the kitchen, emerged some time later pounding on a pail with a big spoon and yelling, "Come and get it!"

"You know," Kim Novak admitted to Scott afterward, "after all I've read about you, if anyone had told me that you could whip up a dinner like that with your own two brutal hands, I'd say your press agent had gone crazy."

"I'm a homey type!" Scott retorted. "Remind me to get your phone number."

Then they all went outside to feed the sea gulls who live, they decided, much more comfortable lives than movie stars. When it grew dark they came inside and collapsed around the room.

"Nobody goes home," Scott announced, "until you say enough about yourselves so that I can report it to a magazine called MODERN SCREEN, which in turn can tell your future public. Kim, you kick it off."

"I feel a little silly," Kim hesitated.

"Don't be silly about being silly," Scott advised.

"Well, all right. My name was Marilyn Novak and for professional reasons, there being another blonde Marilyn around, I changed it to Kim. I'm twenty-one years old and I've done quite a bit of modeling. My first big break came at the auto show when some kind photographers made a little fuss over me and a kind Hollywood agent named Louis Shurr became interested. He introduced me to talent director Max Arnow at Columbia Pictures and I got a screen test. My new pictures are Pushover and Phffft! and everything's happened so fast this year I just can't believe it. I can't remember any more the time I was so discouraged."

Scott interrupted, "Can you, just for me, remember your phone number?"

Kim: "I live at the Studio Club and the number's in the book. But like I was saying, when I was young I was skinny and anemic."

"Wow," exclaimed Bob Francis. "Look now."

"Stop interrupting," Kim shushed. "I was too skinny, and the doctor put me on an endless fattening diet. I had such a terrible inferiority complex that he prescribed little theatre work. I was terrible, I know, but gradually I gained confidence and experience and finally landed a radio show job with Calling All Girls. In between all that I ran an elevator, clerked in a department store, and for a while I was a dentist's receptionist."

"Lucky dentist," Scott suggested, and before Kim could bat him down, he turned to May Wynn. "It's your turn now—and don't spare the details."

SAID MAY: "It's easier when someone else starts it off. My family was theatrical so I just naturally gravitated toward show business. First, though, I think any girl, whether her family is theatrical or not, should have experience in other fields. So I was a clerk in a real estate office. Then after a while I got a job at La Guardia field as a page girl. Then when I was seventeen I modeled a bit before I got a job as a chorus girl in the line at the Copacabana. I danced there for two and a half years before I finally got a spot of my own as a singer and dancer. My name was Donna Lee Hickey then, and I thought I was really on the way when I signed a 20th Century-Fox contract. It didn't work out, though, and now I know that whenever your boss wants to let you go it's usually the best thing that could happen to you, even though it doesn't seem like it at the time. On a hunch, I took the name of the role I play in The Caine Mutiny—May Wynn—and that's me up to now. You turn, Bob. And don't forget to tell them about your engagement."

Bob: "Oh no! I'm not saying a thing. I've just been interviewed by MODERN SCREEN. Let's make Scott Brady talk about himself."

Scott: "Not a chance. I've been interviewed so many times that any fan who can't recite my life story backward can go sit in a corner."

THE GIRLS were burned up (they said) because the men had made them do all the talking, so they let Scott and Bob wash the dishes.

"I got to warn you," Scott growled at Kim, "if some day we grow up and get married, I cook like a fiend, but I do not wash!"

The time was late, so the party broke up because they were all acting type people and had six A.M. studio calls. Let it be said, however, that this is not the end. Fast friendships were formed at this casual Hollywood party. Three future stars made their debut through the courtesy of Scott Brady and MODERN SCREEN. Wish them luck!

There's news of a romance brewing between Kim Novak and Scott Brady and if you ask Scott, it wouldn't be a bad idea. He's busy right now finishing a picture called The Law vs. Billy The Kid, but after that, who knows? END

I found God in the streets

(Continued from page 53) What was this? She had me. She knew I was lying. I was willing to fight her off, but what kind of a dirty trick was she trying to pull by saying she believed me? And apologizing? I'll never forget how shocked I was. And then suddenly I realized it wasn't just a trick, that some kind of thinking and feeling—thinking I could only dimly be aware of as being in this world—was going on, that this teacher of mine had already figured out she didn't want to prove me a thief; she wanted to show me that there was nobility in the world and here was a chance to give me a great, shining example of it.

I stood there swallowing, my anger gone. I wanted to cry. And I knew that as long as I lived I could never be guilty of putting myself in such a spot again.

Redeemed: one dirty little thief. How? Someone wanted to help a fellow man up rather than kick him down.

WHAT HAPPENED in that classroom didn't die there. I had to ask myself questions about everything I was part of from then on, and the trouble with thinking is that once it starts it won't quit. Mine led me to answers I didn't want at first, and from these, painful as they were, to a new way of living.

I never considered myself a thief when I took that pencil box. No, sir. I, in the back of my mind, rationalized that being a poor boy, denied ordinary advantages, it was natural that I must help myself. (You notice that first I helped myself to a fine excuse, after which it was easy to help myself to the pencil box.) The danger in that kind of thinking should be obvious. With the right kind of excuses nothing would be impossible for me—burglary, murder, what have you?

Or let's apply it less spectacularly. Let's see how it could work (and does work for a lot of us) in an everyday way. In my line of work if I don't get the part I want in a certain picture I don't have to waste any time analyzing my own possible inadequacies for the role. I didn't get it because, clearly, the producer of the picture is stupid or a bum or prejudiced against me. So I complain to my friends and they comfort me. Or I tell my wife and she babies me.

After a while, if I keep on being this sort of fellow, I'll get to depend on blaming someone. It will never be my fault.

This is what my teacher did when she helped me; she taught me me!

To help your fellow man you have to understand him. To understand him you have to understand yourself. I thought I had figured this out as a personal piece of philosophy when one day, while I was still a kid, I heard someone read something startling from the Bible. "Know thyself." So somehow what I was learning by such slow degrees was connected with the faith of men.

LET ME GO back to the streets of New York and the boys I knew. The most characteristic thing about us was that we held the other fellow cheaply; his suffering, his problems, his reputation. This enabled us to cheat him, to play tricks on him, to forget him. Let's take one of these tricks and look at it.

The automobile speed limit was about twenty miles an hour in our block, but most cars would shoot through at a rate closer to fifty miles an hour. And of course, we kids would be playing right out on the street—we had no other place.

When a car would pass we would pretend that it had hit us. We'd stand so close that it would brush our clothes, and at the last second we'd slam the rear fender with one hand and then fall flat. To the driver inside the slamming would sound exactly as if he had hit something, and when he looked back there would be one of us writhing on the street.

The scared looks on the faces of the drivers when they stopped their cars and came running back would tickle us. But what we were after was money. A lot of times they would pull out a bill and throw it at the kid, telling him he would be all right. And then they'd drive off again. What easy dough! And then one day the understanding of what we were really doing hit me right between the eyes.

We were holding human life—our own lives—as cheaply as they could be held. We were saying that a piece of silver could set to rights a broken body. Suppose I actually was hit by a car playing this trick? Of course I wouldn't accept a dollar then. Yet that didn't change the fact that a dollar was what I had established as the value of whatever might happen to me. The day I figured this out was the last time I ever bet my limbs, possibly my whole life, against a dollar or two! And I decided, too, that I was estimating people too much in terms of money and material possession; that I must start looking for other values.

WHAT WAS a gentleman? At first the definition was easy for me. If I were a shoe-shine boy then the man whose shoes I shined was a gentleman. I was a shoe-shine boy around Seventy-second street and Second Avenue, but I learned that a lot of my customers were not necessarily gentlemen. Once my father, who was an actor-forced-to-turn-tailor, gave me one of his old whisk brooms to brush my customers' clothes. "They'll like that," he told me. "Yeah!" I said, enthusiastically. "That's a good idea."

I tried it on my first customer. The whisk broom was old, as I said, and kind of frazzled looking. The man glanced at the whisk broom and knocked it out of my hand into the street.

"Keep that filthy thing off my clothes!" he said. Then he threw me a nickel for the shine and walked away.

I don't know what made me do it but I ran after him. I wanted to remember his face. I was thinking of the kindness of my father in giving me the whisk broom, and how warm I had felt thinking how it would please my customers. And then it flashed into my mind that this was no gentleman; this was a monster of some kind because he didn't know how to live with other people, and that it was this which made the difference between a brute and a gentleman. This and nothing else.

WHAT WAS a lady? Surely she was one of those women you see sitting in the back of the limousines that sweep up and down Fifth Avenue. She couldn't be the girl you know who lives across your own street, could she, or the one you call mother? It took me a while to be able to separate the quality of character from the appearance of respectability, to be able to recognize it out of a limousine as well as inside, against a background of poverty as well as riches. One day I met a girl I classed as just a pretty kid a fellow might neck around with. Before many days had passed I knew her as a lady for whom my admiration was boundless.

GUEST OF HONOR

Some time ago I was invited to a dinner in honor of Gloria Swanson, whom I had always considered a very aloof sort of star. Seated beside Miss Swanson at the table was the elderly film critic of one of the St. Paul newspapers. He had just broken his arm and wore a sling. I was amazed to see Miss Swanson help him throughout the meal by cutting his steak, buttering his bread and generally making things much easier for him.

Mrs. Helen Erickson
Minneapolis, Minnesota

I was acting with a small theatre school then and she dropped in one evening to see our presentations and talk to her brother who was in our group. He introduced us and I took her out. She told me she worked at Gimbels, and did some modeling, too. As we talked on I became conscious of a fine mind working in her head and an appreciation of the world and its people that made my own knowledge seem pretty puny by comparison. This was not just a pretty kid—this was a person! It was wonderful being with her even if I didn't get to hold her hand—which I did.

As soon as I could, I asked her brother about her, and what he told me confirmed my opinion. It was because of her help that he was able to attend an acting school; he had a $65-a-month G.I. grant but she made up the difference he needed to get along. She also contributed the major upkeep to the home so that two younger brothers could go to school.

I laughed. "You know," I began, "when I first saw her I just thought she was beautiful. That's all."

He nodded and smiled back. "My sister is beautiful, inside as well as out."

The memory of that girl stayed with me. When I met another one like her I knew it right away. This one was twenty-three years old, beautiful, too, well known, very busy at her own work, yet without telling anyone about it she was also busy just being a fine person. I don't want to go into too much detail because I don't think she would like me to. But she's still at it. It has to do with contributing to the maintenance and happiness of a large orphanage—and that side of this girl's life was one of the reasons I thought it a great privilege to marry her.

YOU KNOW, when you go to school you learn things in a clear order. But in life, especially in the dog-eat-dog kind of life I started out to live, you have to pick up things helter-skelter. I developed my faith, my philosophy of living, as you might if you picked up a Bible and read a page here and a page there, going backward as well as forward, and from the middle toward the beginning and end. And, as a matter of fact, what I learned from the whisperings of God in the noisy, dusty streets of New York, and for a long time thought to be my own exclusive wisdom, I later read in the Bible. The words were almost the same!

Let me say here that I am not a bit sorry I learned my faith on the streets first. That's how it came to the men and the saints who wrote much of the Bible. That way it sticks with you.

It works out in funny ways for me. Take the Biblical injunction, "Do not bear false witness." I apply it to my work every day. I do not bear false witness for others and I do not ask them to do it for me. I am not talking about telling great lies, just everyday small ones. I never go to a friend and ask, "What did you think of my work in my last picture? Now tell me the truth. I want honest criticism." I don't do this because I know from experience that I don't want him to be honest—I just want him to tell me I was great!

How did I learn this? Well, too many times I have been told I was great, too many times I found out later I wasn't, and too many times I blamed the friend for fooling me. Now I know it wasn't his fault. In such circumstances people instinctively know what the other fellow wants to hear and that's what they tell him, feeling they would be cruel if they didn't. So truth dies and a form of larceny takes its place.

In my earliest memories all life was defined sharply and simply, everything was black or white, sweet or bitter. From this I went on to the gradations. I began to see the greys and be more subtly appreciative.

From liking ice cream, which comes naturally, I went on to like music, which is more of a developed taste. From music I branched off to literature. At the same time I began to sense the beauty there can be in a snowflake, a leaf or a sunset. With these awakenings experienced, I no longer laughed when I read a poem or listened to it; now it meant something as the world was beginning to mean more to me. And not until then, I maintain, was I ready for the most subtle experience of all—the experience of being one with the whole meaning of existence, the experience of faith. END

(Continued from page 31) wrote that book. The hero, of course, was himself. The theme stuck with him. Today he calls himself Jeff Chandler. And at thirty-five, although he is already a busy and famous Hollywood star earning $3000 a week, he is restlessly and ambitiously pushing every one of his talents.

Jeff has embarked on the long shot, uphill career of a popular crooner.

He has organized Jeff Chandler Enterprises to produce his own pictures when his contract expires.

He is working on a nightclub act.

He is preparing a radio serial based on the files of a big metropolitan newspaper, in which he will star. Later he will adapt it for television.

He is writing and sketching ideas for Jeff Chandler adventure publications.

This flurry of ambitious activity is a matter of curious speculation both among the people who know him and those who don't. It has coincided with the breakup of his marriage, which looms as a contributing cause. In securing her divorce from Jeff last April, Marjorie stated in her plea: "As a result of his complete and continuous absorption in his career, he was not a companion in any way. . . . He was chronically fatigued so that he would fall asleep wherever we were. . . ."

Humphrey Bogart tells of a movie role he once had, a role which was to show him as the meanest, toughest guy in the rackets. The problem was how to establish this characterization quickly. It was Chaplin who suggested an easy, quick way: It would show an old charwoman carrying brushes and pails of water up the stairs, staggering under the burden all the way. Then Bogart would rush out and push her and the pails down all the flights.

"Then Bogey comes down," Chaplin suggested, "picks up the old lady tenderly, tips his hat and says to her, 'Pardon me, Madam—I thought you were my mother'."

The New York Post

Jeff himself allows that the reason he is pushing himself to the limit is to make more money. "I decided to be an actor when I was fourteen years old," he says, "because I'd heard they made $5000 a week. I still want to make that kind of money. I have responsibilities to my family. I want enough to be able to retire and relax when I'm forty. That gives me five years. I'm not sure I'll make it."

Jeff's agent, a dapper little man named Meyer Mishkin, whose office adjoins Jeff's, has a different explanation. "Jeff is just naturally a terrific bundle of talent," he says. "He's easy, sure-fire, no temperament, no trouble. Why shouldn't he spread himself? He just likes to work."

But there is another reason why Jeff Chandler is striking out in all directions at an age when he thought he'd be philosophically looking back at his struggles. He can't believe he's a success until he makes the best of everything that's in him—and that, in his own opinion, is quite a lot.

This is not conceit. Jeff Chandler is humble about his good fortune. His favorite phrase about himself is still "the luckiest kid on the block." At his studio he is known as a "sweetheart" to work with, serious, conscientious, prompt and ready, and exhibiting no temperament since he grunted imperiously, "I am Cochise," and became a star. He still bends over backward in a self-effacing manner both with his associates and his admirers. "Jeff always talks as if he's asking me a big favor to help him out on a deal," marvels Meyer Mishkin. "I have to ask him, 'What am I for, anyway?'"

His self-consciousness about what others think about him is demonstrated constantly. Once, when Jeff was making $800 a week, an interviewer wanted to take his salary and break it down for an article, showing how taxes, fees and expenses shriveled that sum down to almost nothing for Jeff to keep. Jeff considered the idea briefly, then shook his massive head. "If you were making $50 a week and read about poor me making $800," he asked the writer, "would you cry for me?"

After he had separated from his wife, another reporter tried to get Jeff's opinions on what qualities he admired in women. Again Jeff pondered and begged off. His reason: the qualifications of such a dream girl might imply they were those which his wife had lacked.

"I like being a celebrity," he'll tell you candidly. "I like being recognized. Except, of course, by guys like our aforementioned ginned-up friend."

Jeff Chandler always says what comes into his mind, and often answers questions as though he were talking to himself. He takes time to think before he replies and then he gives an honest answer. Explaining his drive for success, he says that from the time he was an awkward, overgrown kid in East Flatbush, Brooklyn, he always believed that he towered not only physically but in destiny, too, above the other kids, although he was at least as poor as the rest.

That feeling of being apart and having a special superiority is common to all actors in some degree. Maybe it helps them to act. In spite of Jeff's faith in his own powers, he has great humility. It is no inferiority complex however. He has been unhappy only when he has been prevented from doing everything he thought he was naturally equipped to do.

Jeff has had an oversized physique and bold, impressive features since he was a tot. Today he is a kingsized man—six feet, four, 210 pounds, 13 shoe, size 7⅝ hat. Once when his agent suggested him for a romantic leading man role, the reply he got was, "Jeff Chandler? He's a mug. But I've got another job in mind for him. If I can't get the plug-ugly I want, I'll call you."

Jeff has a regal bearing, moves easily, and his deep bass voice comes out softly. He uses meticulous grammar, not slang. When he wore a toga for Sign Of The Pagan he looked as though he had stepped out of the ruins of ancient Rome. The Indian chief "Cochise" in Broken Arrow missed an Academy Award by three votes. But it was this same strength, suggesting leadership, that gave Jeff Chandler his first movie break as the stoic Israeli in Sword In The Desert. In his radio acting days, Jeff had been called on no less than seven times to play the Christus role. There is no small doubt that Jeff Chandler, consciously or subconsciously, believes himself specially gifted and destined.

Jeff Chandler was born in Brooklyn, and he lived most of his boyhood in a moderate neighborhood, on East 37th Street. His father and mother were separated when he was three and he grew up in a house with his grandparents and an aunt and uncle. He was an only son, and a fatherless one. He thinks perhaps his burning desire to distinguish himself stems from need for love from his father.

Despite his size and his environment, young Ira Grossel was no roughneck.

"I suspect I was lucky," he says. "Because I was big the kids left me alone. It was a good thing. I was not aggressive or belligerent. Maybe by their standards I was a sissy. I don't know. I remember we lived once across the street from a family of five boys, all rough and tough. I used to cross the street before I came to their house. One day I forgot and ran head on into the most hard-boiled one. To my great surprise—and relief—he quickly crossed the street. Later, they told me that all the time I was afraid of them, they were afraid of me!"

Jeff Chandler has never hit a man in his life, except for his faked scripts for the cameras. He learned to box for The Iron Man but he would rather remain a spectator. And while he played some football and basketball in school his real joy in sports is baseball. He played sand lot ball all his youth and became a fervent fan.

All his life Jeff Chandler has had ambitions, interests and desires that had no connection with his naturally husky body. He traveled a lonely path as a boy and he still travels it as a man, prodded on by a feeling of obligation and guilt. "I'm still not up to what I've become," he observes at times, adding cryptically, "and yet what I've become isn't enough for what I should be."

FRUGALITY IS so ingrained in Jeff that his happiness over a good trade or bargain sometimes backfires.

Jeff was having dinner with a girl he had known in drama school fourteen years ago, now happily married in the East and visiting Hollywood for the first time. It happened that he had recently acquired his first Cadillac, a distress sale car which he got at a sizable discount. Excited about it, he mentioned the price to his friend—only $4,300 for a $5,300 car.

"Why," she exclaimed, "the down-payment on our house was a lot less than that!" The thrill of the new car was destroyed and he felt guilty as he drove it home. Jeff's personal wardrobe is built around six suits he had tailored for his first out-of-costume role in Because Of You only three years ago. He waited until then to properly outfit himself and bought the suits at half-price from his studio. He likes to roam around hardware stores. Not long ago a five-way tool called a shopsmith and priced at $229 caught his eye. He strolled by admiring it for five days, telling himself wistfully, "I wish I could afford it." One day he stopped still and said aloud, "What am I saying? I can afford it!" So he bought it. Jeff's business manager is always telling him, "You ought to spend more money!"

Jeff's thrift flies out the window where others are concrned. His alimony and support settlement was very generous. Around his studio he is known as a cotton-soft touch. For ten pictures he co-starred with actors making twice what he made without a squawk. "Jeff," says one friend, "wants to own the world—so he can give it away."

This trait is a hangover from Jeff Chandler's boyhood, which he perhaps ponders too much. The result is an idealistic, socially conscious, and somewhat conscience-tortured man whose past is always cropping up to influence his present. For instance, although he was an adoring dad to both his little girls, Jamie and Dana, Jeff could never bring himself to buy them a pet. When he was a little boy his pup got sick and he watched it die, unable to help it. He has shied from owning any kind of pet since.

JEFF CHANDLER, despite his formidable appearance and assured manner, is a shy, sentimental and self-critical character. That's why many of the legends about him don't stand up. The lone wolf idea has been wishfully tacked on him ever since it was known he was having trouble at home. Because Jeff has sought companionship with women (and except for publicity, premières and such, they are almost all women he has met professionally or known before) it is widely hinted that he is a quiet but deadly operator in the romance field.

Actually, Jeff Chandler verges on being a social flop—and has been more or less all his life. As Tony Curtis, one of his best friends, says, "You say 'hello' to Jeff at a party—and when you try to say 'goodbye' he isn't there." Publicity people who have tried to pair him with young actresses for Hollywood affairs testify that it's difficult. Only when he calls on his good friends, Janet and Tony, Patti and Jerry Lewis, or Sheila and Gordon MacRae (whom he knew way back in his Millpond Playhouse days) are his visits relaxed and easy.

This has been baffling to predatory ladies. Usually they have been kept at a distance despite their persistent efforts.

Jeff is no hermit nor has he ever been, although he says "I'm not even thinking about marriage again." He always has been a one-girl man. When prodded about his early romantic dreams he says, "They weren't romantic, nor adventurous. The dream I had was always the same. It was of a depression kid—like me—meeting and marrying a poor girl and together struggling out of poverty and obscurity to riches and high position." That, in effect, is the dream that he made come true—only to lose it—and ironically because of the struggle. There are so many reasons for every marriage failure that no one can pinpoint a single cause. Jeff's boyhood can supply a clue. Even then his all-absorbing devotion to one particular responsibility caused other responsibilities to suffer, quite without intention.

THE GOOD HUMOR MAN

My route as a Good Humor Man once took me past a beach. One day a flock of kids came running over, dragging along a young girl and shouting, "Oh, Paul, we want you to meet a movie actress!" I thought it was a joke and said, "Hello, what's the name?" "Elizabeth Taylor!" they yelled. Giving her a slap on the back that almost keeled her over, I said, "Glad to meet you, Elizabeth, I'm Clark Gable." Then I gave her an ice cream cup. As I was on my way home that night, a lady came out of one of the cottages and asked, "Are you Paul?" I replied that I was and she said, "My niece, Elizabeth Taylor, said she met you today. She's visiting me." I wish I had given her a pint!

UNTIL HE was a sophomore in high school he was a leader at school, wrapped up in a dozen activities and outlets that he enjoyed. But that year his grandfather's slow death from cancer, coupled with hard times all around, forced his mother to open a small candy store in their home. Jeff was called on to help out after school. He dropped all his scholastic ambitions and activities. He was a great help to his family, but to do that he abandoned everything else. There are strong hints that this is why Jeff and Marge found their marriage in conflict with his career.

At that divorce hearing, Marjorie Hoshelle said, "We could never come to any agreement or compromise . . . He said he was fond of me but found it impossible to live with me because of the many conflicts . . ." Yet Jeff had known Marge since 1941 when they were both in little theatre work around Illinois. Their romance grew out of two careers. It was Marjorie who helped Jeff learn the Hollywood ropes, bore him two children, shared his life for eight years. Yet the harassments of married life along with those of his professional existence took too high a toll. No other woman nor any other man entered into the rift.

Jeff yearns to have his life perpetually in order. Since he became a star he has tried to discipline himself. He diets religiously and is almost a teetotaler ("Soda pop tastes better"). He dresses more like a broker than an actor. He showers twice a day, keeps his tight, wiry thatch cropped once a week (barbers recently voted him "America's best male head of hair"). He is meticulous about appointments and worries considerably about a tendency to procrastinate, which business friends say he does not do.

Every day when he is not making a picture and is not out of town, Jeff reports to himself at his office bright and early like any businessman. "I like to play 'office,'" he admits. "It makes me feel I'm accomplishing something." Jeff's office is next to Meyer's and they work as a business team.

His picture scripts are neatly bound in leather on shelves, efficient gadgets are carefully aligned on his desk, his files are in shape and the walls neatly decorated with his various awards, his sketches of baseball heroes and photographs of his two daughters. In one drawer is a carefully stacked pile of the children's drawings and their notes to him over the years—a crayon coloring labeled "This is a cat" or a bunny effort and the scrawl "To Daddy—for making all Easters very happy." Jeff has sentimentally saved all these and plans to bind them neatly in books. He sees the girls once a week.

JEFF LIVES in an apartment in Westwood Village although he's usually there only to sleep and not often for that. Because he has been racketing off in all directions breaking ground for his projects. Recently he tape-recorded 200 spot announcements to be played by disc jockeys all over the country with his record, which has already reached the 125,000 sale mark and needs only a few thousand more to make him an official hit as a crooner. He has been commuting to San Francisco to raid the Chronicle files for his radio reporter series, due to start in the fall. He has just finished Sign Of The Pagan, one of U-I's first CinemaScope productions.

This gives Jeff Chandler a program of all work and very little play—but that doesn't bother him. He never has been able to mix work and play. When Jeff went to Italy for his third picture, Deported, he might as well never have left home. He saw only Naples, where the picture was filmed. He has contemplated no other foreign scenery except the bleak Aleutians where he served two years at a lonely anti-aircraft outpost during his four-year Army service. "Some day," he occasionally promises himself, "I'm going to take off in a new car to tour America, all by myself. I'll go where I please, see what I like and stay as long as I want wherever it's interesting. I won't be in a hurry and I won't give a damn." That's probably just talk. The only place Jeff has been known to relax is Apple Valley, up on the Mojave Desert. He hasn't had any regular exercise since he played right field for the Martin and Lewis "Aristocrats" softball team. His pals seldom suggest tennis or golf any more. They know what he will say: "Too busy."

"But," shrugs Jeff Chandler, "you can't do everything you want and have everything you want at the same time. I don't know whether everything I'm trying will be a success or a flop. It's really not important. I do know that if you don't make a bid for everything you feel you can do, you're a failure, any way you look at it. You've got to get things out of your system. I've always wanted to know more about music, I've always wanted to sing. If I hadn't made this record, there would still be plenty of things in my life to fill it. But since I have and there's a certain success to the effort, why, that makes more things to do and it makes everything else I try easier. Everything could change for me in thirty seconds, but right now I feel that I'm getting somewhere at last."

THAT'S A curious statement from a man who has just seen his home break up under the pressure of an expanding career. But Jeff Chandler can't help himself. This is his last chance to prove to himself what he believed as a boy—that he is different, special, above the crowd. It's his last chance to write that novel that he plotted years ago, not with a pencil but by living it—but its title might be, The Lonesome Road.

SIC TRANSIT DOROTHY

During a War Bond Rally in 1944 or 1945 Dorothy Lamour visited my home town, Lawrence, Massachusetts. She was scheduled to make a speech in the park opposite Lawrence High School, so during recess we all went over. After the speech, Miss Lamour gave out autographs and everyone was wild with excitement. I had no paper except my Latin homework with me, so I handed her that to sign. She smiled and took it and just then was whisked away into a waiting car, Latin paper and all. I still wonder what happened to it!

first flight

Without trust in Daddy's strong arms, fear would blot out the fun of first flight. But because Daddy's smiling, loving face is below, life adds a thrilling new dimension, founded in love and trust.

All our adventures begin in and come home to the security we cannot do without.

To give and to get security is the main business of living. It is a privilege and a responsibility. It provides us life's finest rewards.

Have you ever thought that this security is possible only in a democracy? We continue to grow stronger as a nation when more and more secure homes are bulwarked together. The security of your country depends on your security.

Saving for security is easy! Here's a savings system that really works—the Payroll Savings Plan for investing in United States Savings Bonds.

Go to your company's pay office, choose the amount you want to save. That money will be set aside for you before you even draw your pay. And invested in Bonds which are turned over to you.

If you can save only $3.75 a week on the Plan, in 9 years and 8 months you will have $2,137.30.

U.S. Series "E" Savings Bonds earn interest at an average of 3% per year, compounded semiannually, when held to maturity! And they can go on earning interest for as long as 19 years and 8 months if you wish, giving you back 80% more than you put in!

For your sake, and your family's, too, how about signing up today? Or join the Bond-A-Month Plan where you bank.

pat crowley

(Continued from page 54) "I don't know about you two but I'll never even make it to Sunday sitting around in my room," she said. "Why wait and suffer? We all have expense accounts from the studio. The least we can do is have a good time in California while they make up their minds. Let's have dinner together. Let's hire a car. Let's have a wonderful weekend instead of a terrible one!"

The girls she was talking to, Sally Hester, who is now in Europe, and Christine White, again working in the East, not only cheered Pat but blessed her. The three dined together that night. They rented a car and on Friday they were sunning themselves in the emerald waters off Laguna Beach. By Saturday they were dancing in U. S. Navy officer territory at the Coronado Hotel, on San Diego Bay. Sunday afternoon they hunted souvenirs in Tijuana, Mexico, sat in briefly at the bullfight arena, and that night, their money gone but their nerves in fine shape, they drove back to Hollywood.

On Monday when the studio notified them that Pat had won, nobody fainted. Sally and Christine offered congratulations, and Pat kept repeating dazedly, "I didn't think I had a chance! I just came out for the plane ride!"

Actually, the decision wasn't so astounding. Even if Pat was only eighteen then she had already been in a number of plays, including two Broadway flops, and any number of TV shows, not excluding a thirty-nine week run in the lead role of A Date With Judy. But she wasn't thinking of this. She was thinking all the way back to a small, hard-coal mining town in Pennsylvania where she was born, and finding it hard to believe that the road she took out of there could lead to such a dream-like destination.

The picture for which the girls had tested was Forever Female. Before Pat had even finished this one her studio had her working in a Martin and Lewis starrer, Money From Home. She not only did a fine job in this production, but not once did Jerry Lewis let fire with his water pistol at her. Soon afterward she was cast in her first Technicolor musical, Red Garters, with Rosemary Clooney, Guy Mitchell, Jack Carson and Joanne Gilbert. And, it might be added, Pat, who said she came out to Hollywood just for the plane ride, got a lot more rides. The studio sent her out on personal appearance tours, one schedule binding her to visit thirty-five cities in thirty-five days.

On these trips Pat took part in radio broadcasts, telecasts, stage shows, industry dinners, cocktail parties and, of course, a whole series of civic functions. She used to have to talk so much about herself that at night she would tumble into bed hating the name of Pat Crowley. Yet she will appear this summer in the little theatre presentation of Hazel Flagg at the Dallas State Fair. Such energy and ambition have not always been characteristic of Pat.

More than a hundred newspaper men around the country, and almost as many disc jockeys, have interviewed her since she got into movies, and almost all have pictured her as a youngster who dreamed unceasingly about making good, then schemed and fought her way to grabbing distance of the top with grim determination. It's not what she tells them but that's what they tell their audiences.

The way it happened really is that Pat drifted into show business, nudged every now and then by her sister Ann, who is three years older and who had worked in Broadway shows as a singer at fourteen. "Left alone I think I'd have been a nurse," says Pat. "It still sounds good to me."

Nurses became a factor in Pat's life early because she was the kind of little girl who is always sick. Not only did the minor ailments of children befall her; colic, measles, flu, croup and a whole series of poxes, but also diseases which generally wait around for a person to grow up before trying to kill her. Double pneumonia, for instance. She had it three times before she was nine.

All this took place in Olyphant, a coal and mill town near Scranton, of less than 10,000 people. Her father, Vincent Crowley, now in the coal and oil business in New York, was then a section foreman in one of the anthracite mines. Pat loved the house they lived in and thought (and still thinks) its location was romantic. A branch line of the railroad ran right past the front door, and, she points out, "You could sit on your own steps and wave to the engineer!"

Her first boy friend, Bill Sweeney, the undertaker's son, does not appear to have been very considerate of Pat's frailty. When they were both about eight he introduced her to corn silk cigarettes. Pat was so ill that for a while it looked as though she would come unglued altogether. To make up to Pat for this, Bill came through with an oft-made but never-before-kept promise—he sneaked Pat into his father's establishment and showed her the corpses in the cellar. This, oddly enough, failed to upset Pat at all.

As a child, her enforced absences from her playmates were so prolonged that they used to have to re-identify her each time she showed up again—usually by her relationship to her older and much healthier sister. "Here comes Ann Crowley's little sister Pat," they'd say. Last winter she went back to Olyphant for the world première of Forever Female, and

IT HAPPENED TO ME

One day during the filming of the picture, Frogmen, I was standing near the West Indian Company Dock, discussing movie stars with a friend: A man stopped by and joined the conversation. We talked for about fifteen minutes and I asked him, "Do you like Richard Widmark?" "No," he said. I said that I didn't either and he said he'd better be going. He gave me a card and when he had left, I looked at it. It said, "Yours truly, Richard Widmark." He has been a favorite of mine ever since.

Augustine Edwards

from the crowd came the old cry: "There she is—Ann Crowley's little sister Pat! Can you imagine her a movie star?"

Once Pat got past nine, incidentally, her body seemed to do a flip-flop as far as susceptibility was concerned. Now she's resistant to everything. It is rare for her to catch so much as a cold.

When older sister Ann was twelve she went to New York for voice training, and lived with an aunt there. Pat decided that if Ann could be a singer, she was undoubtedly a dancer. She talked her parents into letting her take ballet and "moderne." Her teacher told her she had a very flexible body.

A year later there was word of fine promise being shown by Ann and the family decided to move to New York in two sections, Pat and her mother going first, and her father following soon afterward. A year after that Ann was singing in Oklahoma! and in subsequent years playing leads in Broadway musicals.

LEGAL AGE

In 1946 Ann Sheridan appeared in Lansing, Michigan, with the Ringling Brothers, Barnum and Bailey Circus. She and John Ringling North and some other people connected with the circus stopped in a downtown nightspot for a glass of beer and some sandwiches. To everyone's delight (including Miss Sheridan's) the waitress flatly refused to bring Ann a glass of beer until she had proved that she was over twenty-one!

Mrs. Carl Doxsie
Lansing, Michigan

Pat kept up her dancing in New York. She auditioned for New York's High School of Performing Arts and was accepted as a ballet student.

As Pat reached her junior miss size, she was certainly taking on attractiveness. When she walked into the office of the head of a certain model agency looking for work he took one look at her and said yes, even though his name was Harry Conover and he had hundreds of models. But there was a sour note; although she was putting all she had into her dancing she was beginning to get a feeling that body flexibility was one thing and being a good dancer was another. Maybe, whispered a little voice inside her, she should never have passed up the nursing idea!

Then Ann, with a true, sisterly double edge, pointed out something intriguing. Pat, she recalled, had been quite a little snitch as a youngster, never taking the blame herself and avoiding it with such a flow of language that no one else could get in a countercharge. Of course, Ann went on quickly, this was no longer true of Pat, but if she thought she could remember the kind of girl she was and portray such a character on the stage, she might find a summer theatre job.

Naturally, Pat first denied Ann's accusations (and she swears she hardly ever snitches on anyone these days) but said she was willing to try out for the part anyway, just to show her good sportsmanship. Two days later the director of the Fayetteville Playhouse, just outside of Syracuse, New York, was listening to Pat read the lines which are spoken by Dinah, the brat-sister in The Philadelphia Story. When she finished he beamed with delight and said she would make the nastiest Dinah he had ever heard. Pat, whose personal nature today is really rated very much on the sunny side, gulped and signed. When the play, with Diana Barrymore starring, opened and won good notices, which included words of praise for Pat as well, she got a completely new feeling about her future. For the first time in her life she felt that she actually might get somewhere if she tried—and she thought she would try now as hard as she could.

She was still attending school, but this did not stop her from picking up any engagements that might be filled evenings and weekends. She was only thirteen when she had a walk-on bit in Carousel in which Ann played the ingénue lead. Television, for the most part, was still rough and ready, production-wise, and there was more work than reward for the actors, but Pat got started and stayed with it. She had a reputation as a girl who could register quick affability in front of the TV camera and who didn't run out of aplomb when things went wrong, as they often did. (She still has that reputation. On a Lux radio program she twisted an endorsement so that instead of saying "I love to Lux" it came out "I Lux to love." A laugh and a quick correction took care of the faux pas.)

Twice Pat got into new Broadway shows in her early teens only to have both productions die from the box office staggers. There were weeks and sometimes months when no one wanted Pat for anything—stage, TV, modeling, or demonstrating refrigerators. But by now she had a feeling of destiny.

A good break came in the long Date With Judy contract, but she believes her luckiest day was the one when she heard that the Westport Playhouse in Connecticut planned a summer theatre presentation of The Philadelphia Story starring Sarah Churchill and Jeffrey Lynn. She hurriedly mailed copies of her notices as Dinah in her Fayetteville engagement and asked if she could read for the role. Not until the company was well into rehearsal, and she had given up hope, did word return to her. It was a wire and it urged her to come at once.

Her career took wings then. The interest that was being shown in her work at Westport was not only academic, meaning that critics had pleasant comment, it was professional, meaning that agents foresaw her future slowly turning to gold, or U. S. legal tender for same.

Summer ended, and Pat went back to school for her last term, legally represented as an artist by the well-known Gus Schirmer. One of his first accomplishments was to win for her the Deanna Durbin role in the TV version of 3 Smart Girls. When Paramount started looking for a new girl to go into the Forever Female picture, Schirmer had no trouble arranging for her to be one of those tested. And Ann Crowley's little sister Pat got the studio's nod.

For her first few months in Hollywood Pat, like many newcomers, worked hard and played none. She lived alone in a small apartment, did her own cooking, took the bus to the studio. In due time she got thoroughly bored with the whole routine. She knew what was missing. It was that form of companionship defined Loneliness . . . terrible, absolute loneliness!

Have you ever known what it's really like to be lonely? The loneliness, for instance, of a wife who needs her husband, wants him at her side—to talk with, to laugh with, to love and be loved—and cannot have him?

This is the story of a bride who spent loveless nights, and who warned her husband that being apart would kill them both. This bride blames loneliness for the dark secret she must keep from her husband for the rest of their lives. But she blames herself more.

"I had Ernie's love, yet I dishonored that love. Yes, I can say that loneliness was to blame, that I was too young to know how to offset loneliness . . . the right way. I took the wrong way, and will regret it as long as I live."

Don't miss A BRIDE'S LOVELESS NIGHTS . . . this true startling story is in in simple terms as "boys." Pat now has escorts in Hollywood and loves to go out. Her dates have included Vic Damone and Tab Hunter. These are her western boys. Perhaps her heart turns tenderest when she thinks of two young men she has known for years in New York, but she won't say which (or perhaps she can't yet).

One of these, Dick Kallman, is a well-known show and nightclub singer. The other is Bill Sapphire, editor-in-chief for Tex McCrary and Jinx Falkenburg, whom Pat has known from her earliest days in New York.

Like many girls in the movies, Pat is beginning to think that the man she marries will be someone in the business. The principal reason is that it is difficult to meet an outsider who can keep on being himself when he meets an actress.

"Something happens to them," complains Pat. "You will sense that he is a nice boy ordinarily, but now he feels he has to put on some attitude or other because you're in show business. And the funny part of it is that he does it to demonstrate how little your being an actress matters to him. He'll pretend indifference, sometimes he'll take on arrogance, and worst of all is when they make show talk as if they know what it's all about. In any case, you soon realize you're not out with a boy, you're out with an actor—a real ham, too!"

Of course, Pat isn't thinking of getting married right away. There is time yet. She is moving into a new apartment. She has bought herself a new Studebaker in a pastel shade and now nobody ever gets to her place because Pat insists on going over to their places so that she can have an excuse to drive her car. Yet under all this "living" are signs of incipient domesticity. She likes to cook. Her menu for friends she invited to dinner a few weeks ago included broiled steak, a "Shrimp Louie" salad and a cherry cream pie which she baked herself. She keeps talking about Bill and Dick in New York. It is being said also that she has been buying furniture on the side, although the apartment she is renting is a furnished one. Pat denies this. She said she did buy an antique table but that she stuck it in her garage "just to get older!" END

A short while after this party, a magazine came out with an article on Brando. In this article Marlon was libeled an alley-cat who had kicked Movita out of his apartment because she was offensive. The article went on to say that Movita was so incensed at this behavior that she promptly married someone else. Later when she introduced Marlon to her teen-age stepdaughter, the actor immediately moved in and had an affair with the girl. There is not a grain of truth in this fantastic tale—and Movita is consulting her lawyer about filing a libel suit.

Marlon Brando is no angel. Everyone knows that and he is the first to admit it. He is original and exceptional, and for long periods of time, alone and filled with some nameless dissatisfaction, he is driven to seek the help of a psychiatrist. But essentially Marlon Brando is a kind man, a good man and a sensitive man. And it hurts him to know that he is being described as a psychotic bum, callous screwball and a swaggering nut.

When he reads that he loves his pet raccoon Russell more than he loves Movita, he is deeply hurt at such ridiculous lies. And he is amazed and hurt to read that his favorite hobby is carrying heavy cans of garbage to the roof and dumping them on the outdoor diners at Leon and Eddie's, a restaurant in New York.

Last January, when Marlon had just finished a film in New York, On The Waterfront, he was emotionally and physically exhausted. When he works he concentrates with such intensity that at the finish he has no strength left. But MCA, his agent, had signed him for the lead in The Egyptian. And 20th Century-Fox wanted to get it started at once.

So Marlon, with no time off, came to Hollywood. The script was ready, and the talented young actor started to learn his lines. He found it difficult. He just couldn't seem to concentrate. He felt badly confused about Movita. He wants to get married. At the same time there is so much of the world he hasn't seen. And he wants his marriage to be perfect, to last forever. The relationship between marriage and freedom, responsibility and recklessness has him puzzled.

He went back to the script. He didn't like it but a deal's a deal, and he would try to see it through. At the studio he met Jean Simmons and that made it a little better. She would make the lines sound better and raise the level of the performance. His acting would have to compete with hers. He always likes that.

But somehow he couldn't get his heart into the story. As he studied the script, it wouldn't come alive. He would get annoyed with it, then with himself for getting annoyed.

Judy Canova tells about a young boy who accidentally got into the casino room at a hotel in Las Vegas and put a dime into a slot machine. The boy hit the jackpot, and after all the coins had fallen, he started to kick the machine. An attendant came over, told him he was too young to be in the room and asked him to leave.

"I'm not going," the little boy shouted, still kicking the machine, "until I get my candy bar."

Sidney Skolsky in The New York Post

He had been annoyed before in Hollywood when he had expected to be able to help some of his friends with small roles and he had been embarrassed when they did not come through as promised.

Marlon just couldn't concentrate on The Egyptian. He was mentally disturbed, and on January 24 he returned to New York. The next day he reported to Dr. Mittlemann for psychiatric help. The doctor telegraphed the studio that Marlon Brando would not be able to work for a period of at least ten weeks.

When the wire arrived at the studio, the front office boys blew their tops. Said one, "He won't get away with it. We're going to sue. We're going to recover the exact amount our auditors find the studio has lost and will lose through the delay in the production he has caused. We can't understand the boy. Only a week ago he participated in a cast rehearsal and a reading of the script. The studio is convinced that his failure to appear has nothing whatever to do with the script or his role in The Egyptian. The studio is compelled to protect its large investment."

In New York, Brando heard about this. So they're going to sue him? Well, they'll have to find him first. How much are they going to sue for? Two million? Four million? He can't make that picture. He's tired. But how can you calm down when you're dodging process servers?

One night a man came to the door of his apartment. "I have an announcement," the man said, "about your nomination for the Academy Award."

Brando smiled and opened the door. Quick as a flash, the little man slapped a summons into his hand. "I'm a process server. Consider yourself served."

He was furious. How could he have been so stupid? Vanity. Pure vanity. Thought he'd won an Oscar for Julius Caesar. All he'd won was a summons.

That night Marlon told Movita about the summons. She laughed. He laughed. Movita told him not to worry. Lew Wassermann would take care of everything. Lew is at the MCA Hollywood office. The thing would work out. The studio needed someone to play Napoleon in Desirée. If Marlon played in Desirée, all would be forgiven. Marlon felt better.

Movita advised Marlon to relax. Why not take a walk along 57th Street? As they walked, Marlon realized it had been three years since Joy Lamont first introduced him to Movita in Taxco. He decided to celebrate with a party and give her a token of his love. A ring—that's what he would like to give her.

Marlon gave his party for Movita and because it made her happy, he was happy, too. But the happiness was short-lived.

A FEW NIGHTS afterward, a call came from his Aunt Olive in Pasadena. "Don't get alarmed, Bud, but your mother is sick. She and your dad stopped by here on their way back from Mexico. The doctor says it's an attack of high blood pressure. He put her in the hospital."

The Brando family is very close. Bud has always adored his two older sisters, "Frannie" and "Tid" (real names, Frances and Jocelyn), and all three children have always admired and loved their parents.

While Marlon was in New York under psychiatric treatment and was being sued for $4,000,000, his mother was slowly dying.

Night after night Marlon was told of her condition but usually in optimistic terms. Finally, when all attempts had been made to save Mrs. Dorothy Brando and she was not responding, Marlon was told that he should fly to the coast.

The day he left New York, another magazine article accused him of breaking up the marriage of actress Roberta Haynes and his own agent, Jay Kanter. In this article, Brando was branded a boy who spent all his spare time abusing Movita and a few dozen other girls.

Bud and his two sisters, Mrs. Eliot Asanof (Tid) and Mrs. Richard Loving (Frannie) arrived in Pasadena before their mother died on March 31.

Two weeks later, Marlon's cousin, Myles Gahan, was killed in a plane crash north of Sacramento. Tim Gahan, thirty, was not only Bud's cousin but because they were the same age, they had been inseparable boyhood pals. Tim was an American Airlines pilot who had been called back into the Air Force Reserve. He had cracked up while testing a jet.

The effect of these two deaths on Marlon was devastating. He cried for days. And it was Movita who saw him through his sorrow. It was she who encouraged him to return to the studio for two more pictures, Desirée and The Life Of Edwin Booth.

Her reward?

ONE MAGAZINE said, "Movita is old enough to be Brando's mother." Another described her as "a man-crazy Latin."

According to Movita, "I never gave any interviews to these writers, so how could they possibly know my thoughts, my attitudes, my ways? Practically everything written about me has been wrong."

Movita Castaneda was born on a train in 1921 between Sonora, Mexico, and Nogales, Arizona. She was educated in a Los Angeles parochial school and later attended Fairfax High School in Hollywood. She is one of eight daughters and two sons.

SHE GOT INTO show business by accident. When she was thirteen she accompanied the dancers Rosita & Moreno to San Francisco. Movita was asked to substitute for a sick performer.

"Just go out on the floor with your guitar," she was told, "and sing."

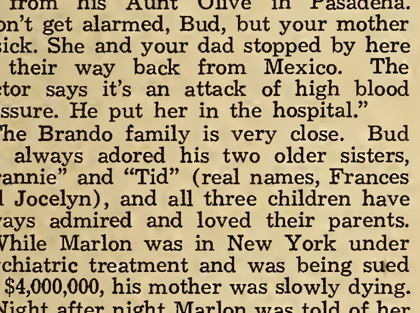
Pandro Berman, an RKO producer, caught the act and believed that Movita was old enough to work. He offered her $125 a week to play in Flying Down To Rio. Over parental objections, Movita accepted.

She wasn't happy at RKO. Dolores Del Rio was there at the time, and apparently Dolores had the idea that Movita was being groomed as her successor. Movita quit the movies and went back to school. But a few months later MGM asked her to test for Mutiny On The Bounty. When Irving Thalberg saw the test, he hired her.

Movita was fourteen when she made Mutiny and fifteen when she met Jack Doyle, an Irish prizefighter, at a party.

DOYLE WASN'T much of a pugilist but Movita found him irresistible. "After all," she says, "I was very young and naïve. He was very handsome and romantic. I believed everything he said. We were married twice, once in Ensenada and once in Dublin!" They were in Britain in 1939 and in London in the blitz.

In 1941, when Movita was six months pregnant, she was bombed out of her home. She lost that child. In 1942 when she was pregnant again her husband sent her



GENIUS RUBS OFF

Last summer while we were riding in an outrigger canoe off Waikiki Beach, our canoe was called upon to rescue several passengers from a canoe which had just been swamped. We helped two frightened women and a gentleman aboard, but there was not enough room for the fourth person. We implored the redheaded, freckle-faced man to hang on to the back of the canoe, but Van Johnson swam easily alongside and said, "Don't worry about me—I've worked with Esther Williams!"

Shrinks Hemorrhoids New Way Without Surgery

Science Finds Healing Substance That Relieves Pain—Shrinks Hemorrhoids

For the first time science has found a new healing substance with the astonishing ability to shrink hemorrhoids and to stop bleeding—without surgery.

In case after case, pain was relieved promptly. And, while gently relieving pain, actual reduction (shrinkage) took place.

Most amazing of all—results were so thorough that sufferers made astonishing statements like "Piles have ceased to be a problem!"

The secret is a new healing substance (Bio-Dyne®)—discovery of a world-famous research institute.

Now this new healing substance is offered in ointment form under the name of Preparation H.* Ask for it at all drug stores—money back guarantee.

to Southampton. There was no escape. Southampton was bombed and Movita was reported dead. But they picked her up out of the rubble, hardly alive. Again she lost her child.

In 1944, after five years of marriage, Movita and Jack Doyle decided to separate. "We just couldn't get along. He was nice but he was essentially a playboy. His friends didn't appeal to me. So I joined ENSA, the English equivalent of our USO, and I toured the front entertaining troops. I did some picture work, too."

In 1947 Movita returned to Hollywood. She played a few feature roles and then went south to visit her relatives. Back and forth she went between Hollywood and Mexico, working in films sometimes.

In Taxco, Mexico, one afternoon when Fox was getting ready to start Zapata, Movita was introduced to Marlon Brando.

BRANDO HAD come down to Mexico early in order to study the Mexican people. He is a perfectionist, and before playing a Mexican, he wanted to immerse himself in the Mexican community.

Joy Lamont, one of Movita's friends, knew Marlon before he came to Taxco. It was she who introduced them in the town square. They took to each other at once and this attraction developed into love. When Marlon went back to Hollywood Movita went, too.

Movita never tried to take advantage of Marlon's fame, never insisted on recognition as his companion. Both of them avoided reporters like the plague.

When Marlon went to New York, Movita followed. He introduced her to his friends and to his family. Everyone liked her then and they like her now.

One of his friends says about Movita, "I honestly think she's done more for Brando than practically anyone. She's matured him. She's showed him understanding. At a time when the gossip columnists were calling him nuts and creating anecdotes about his strange behavior, she was telling him that there was nothing wrong with him, that every man was stuck with his nature, and that he would have to adapt himself to find happiness.

"Bud is a good guy and Movita is a good girl. They complement each other, need each other. It's a wonderful friendship."

Movita knows when Brando is putting on an act. She realizes that his swaggering behavior is merely compensation for his hypersensitivity.

She loves Marlon for his fundamental goodness. Ask any actress or actor who has played with Brando what they think of him, not as a performer but as a human being. You will get such answers as, "He's the most considerate man I've ever met... He doesn't have a selfish bone in his body . . . He will do anything he can to help."

MOVITA SAYS that she has no desire to marry Marlon. "I only want to be his friend, to help him find happiness and integration."

Perhaps she's had enough of marriage. Perhaps not. Either way, she is much too smart to pressure Marlon into a wedding.

"With Marlon," she once said, "things spring from within. His heart tells him what to do, much more than his mind does. Not that he isn't intellectual, because he is—more than people seem to think. But he is the kind of man who obeys his instincts. They are almost always right."

Marlon Brando comes from a happy home. When he gets married he wants that marriage to last. Right now he doesn't know whether or not he has the qualities necessary to make a good marriage.

This is one problem with which no one, possibly not even Movita, can help him. END

TV TALK

Margo's two Eddies . . . Mel Ferrer fetes Audrey Hepburn . . . John Daly's blind spot . . .

John Daly is such a free and easy-going guy that you'd never expect him to suddenly turn sensitive. But he does—on one subject. His balding head. John (or Charlie, as all his friends call him) never blows his top about anything but his top. He even blushes when you joke about it. You'd think, considering that he worries about it so much, that he'd get a good toupée. But notice, next time you see What's My Line? what a bad one Charlie bought. It's mighty obvious for a man who doesn't want to admit that his hair is going, going, going . . . Frank Sinatra is pretty unpredictable, but don't be surprised if he shows up on some of NBC's fancy color "spectaculars" in the fall. He's an old friend of Pat Weaver, NBC's boss . . . What's with Walter Cronkite and Eve Hunter? They may be on competing networks, Walter with CBS's Morning Show and Eve with Home on NBC, but they certainly look cosy when they're together. Eve, by the way, is doing quite well since leaving a local show in San Francisco and heading for Home in New York. She lives in one of those fancy new Park Avenue apartments and she recently bought a yacht! . . . Usually when you read that some star gave up her career for her family, you can take it with a few grains of salt. And that's true of Margo. Much as she loves Eddie Albert, Jr., she surely is glad to be back in show business. Her happiness is the reason Eddie Albert, Sr., worked up a nightclub act with her. He didn't need it; his career has never been in better shape, thanks to all his leading roles on TV. But Margo hadn't worked in a long time, and she needed Eddie's help to get her back in the swim. The ironic part is that he wants her to get big, fat, heavy dramatic parts, and he had to put her on the road back to success by singing and dancing with her. Margo has gained a bit of weight in the last few years, incidentally, and her hair is now very red. A hairdressing trick she uses could help lots of people who have to roll up their hair in a hurry—she puts it up with beer! It's a trick that the movie studios have used for years when a star has to look perfect and doesn't have time for a real setting job. It works, too. It dries very quickly and it doesn't leave any odor at all! . . . Next to Arthur Godfrey, the hardest man to get to in TV is Robert Montgomery. He may even have Arthur beat, in fact. He never is in, and his staff always claim they don't know where he is or when he will drop around again . . . Marlon Brando has never been known for his formality, and his dates are no exception. One night recently, when he was going to an opening night at the theatre, he and his date stood out in the gutter and she combed her hair casually while everyone just gaped. . . . Mel Ferrer's surprise party for Audrey Hepburn's birthday (and Audrey swore it was a surprise) was very small, very chic and not in Mel's sister's house as was reported in the press. It was in the Ferrer New York town house (he comes, you know, from an old, once-wealthy family) where his brother José lives now. José, of course, is not the José who's married to Rosemary Clooney. No kin . . . Janis Paige's career zoomed after she left Hollywood for the stage. And her weight has, too. For her first stage part with Jackie Cooper, she had to strip down to black bra and panties, and a mighty fetching picture she was. In Pajama Game, she slips off her dress and walks around in a black slip, and you can tell she has been enjoying her lunches at Sardi's . . . Poor Red Buttons. He used to have to turn down interviews, he was so swamped with requests. Now he wistfully tells CBS that he's available to anybody who wants to see him. There's isn't a TV personality who rose to such heights so quickly—he was a smash right from his first show—and then slumped so badly. They say that one of his problems is that he's so bossy to his crew. The other people on his show have no voice, and they don't like it. What Red demands, goes. Unfortunately, he isn't always right. . . . Funny, but not all of Eve Arden's co-workers think she's the grand girl she seems to be. Some think she's quite the prima donna. Could be sour grapes, of course . . . When you read all those high salary figures, don't believe them completely. Everyone says, for instance, that Sid Caesar makes $25,000 a week. Well, it doesn't say that on his pay check. And that's one reason Sid has separated from Imogene Coca. He didn't own part of Show of Shows; NBC did, lock stock and belly laughs. But he does own part of his new solo show . . . You never see Mary Martin's husband on TV, but he's in on her TV career all right. Dick Halliday runs all her career, in fact. That's all he does. He's her adviser, her guide and her mentor as well as her husband and the father of her little girl, Heller. A tall, slim, grey-haired man with horn-rimmed glasses, Dick even gets up at six or seven to answer her fan mail! And they are two of the most outspoken lovebirds anywhere. You never hear Mary call him Dick, seldom hear her say "Richard." It's "Sweetie" or "Lovey" or "Baby" instead. They talk like newlyweds, after all these years of being married! . . . The main reason Ed Murrow is doing Person To Person is money. Though he's the highest paid man at CBS taxes eat up most of it.

New, better way to reduce decay after eating sweets

Always brush with ALL-NEW IPANA after eating . . . as the Linders do . . . the way most dentists recommend. New Ipana with WD-9 destroys tooth-decay bacteria.*

If you eat sweet treats (like Stasia Linder of Massapequa, N. Y., and her daughter Darryl), here's good news! You can do a far better job of preventing cavities by brushing after eating . . . and using remarkable new Ipana Tooth Paste. Here's why:

Mouth bacteria and their enzymes act on many foods you eat to form tooth-decay acids. But WD-9 now in Ipana is an active bacteria destroyer and anti-enzyme. Every brushing with Ipana destroys most decay bacteria, and blocks acids for hours. For best results, do this . . .

Follow Stasia Linder's lead and use new Ipana regularly after eating—BEFORE decay bacteria can do their damage.

Even if you can't always brush after eating, no other tooth paste has ever been proved better for protecting teeth than new Ipana with WD-9.

"Your family will love Ipana's new minty flavor, too," adds Mrs. Linder. And new Ipana foams better, cleans better than ever—makes your mouth so clean, in fact, that even one brushing can stop most bad breath all day long.

Try it yourself. Remember, while no dentifrice can stop all cavities—you can protect teeth after eating sweet foods by brushing with new Ipana. Get a tube today.

Try all-new IPANA®!

New taste, new cleaning, new anti-decay WD-9

PRODUCTS OF BRISTOL-MYERS

Ipana A/C (Ammoniated Chlorophyll) also contains anti-enzyme WD-9 (Sodium Lauryl Sulfate)

*Tests prove new Ipana with WD-9 destroys most bacteria with one brushing.

AFTER EATING—Tooth-decay bacteria thrive on food particles . . . form acids that attack the enamel.

AFTER BRUSHING— New Ipana with WD-9 destroys most tooth-decay bacteria with just one brushing.

MORENO THE MERRIER

Wherein Rubber Face Rita discovers that mugging is a crime.

■ Rita Moreno moved from Puerto Rico to New York when she was ten. And on her first day in the New York school she went home in tears. The kids had called her "Rubber Face!"

Rita's mother said, "Never mind. The day may come when you'll be glad to have such a face. It isn't everybody who's blessed with the power to express thoughts and emotions so easily." Once convinced that "mother knows best," she actually worked at developing her expressions.

"Sometimes I overdid it," she admits. "Like the opening night of Skydrift." There was a scene in which a mother thought she saw her son who had been killed in the war. Rita, as one of the daughters, was supposed to be quietly eating her spaghetti, unaware of the son's ghost. But that rubber face got out of control and the audience was laughing at Rita's mugging instead of sympathizing with the mother. Rita will never forget the lecture she got on the evils of stealing scenes.

She has danced since she was four. She was doing Spanish dances in nightclubs when she was fifteen, and even her rubber face didn't convince police she was old enough to work.

"The owner of one little club locked me in the ladies' room every time the police came in," says Rita, "so I decided to quit and grow up."

In films dubbed for export to Spanish-speaking countries, she has been the voice of Elizabeth Taylor, Margaret O'Brien, Peggy Ann Garner and many other young players.

Rita still looks younger than she is, but she's old enough to vote and she has fourteen pictures to her credit. Next: Garden Of Evil.

louella parsons' GOOD NEWS

"I'LL NEVER DO ANYTHING to let our boys down. They mean everything to me—and to Greta," Gregory Peck told me as we sat in my garden. "She's been wonderful about everything and she's a fine mother."

I believe the marriage of Greta and Gregory Peck has reached the end even though there may be no move to an actual divorce from either side for years.

As I write this, Greg is back in Hollywood, living at home and spending as much time as possible with his sons. But soon he will be on his way again, this time to London to make Moby Dick for John Huston.

While he was here, Greg came to see me and while he was reluctant to discuss the situation with Greta, he admitted for the first time that they are estranged.

I got the impression that neither of the Pecks plan any definite move, although the latest word is that Greta intends to file for divorce.

Greg told me he plans to spend much more time in Hollywood making films after Moby Dick—because he wants to be with his boys as much as possible from here on in.

The shortest reconciliation on record: Betty Hutton and Charles O'Curran patched up their differences Saturday, then separated again on Sunday morning. Now she has her interlocutory decree.

The trouble seems to be that Charlie and Betty's agent, Abe Lastfogel, can't get along for five minutes—and Betty, a very ambitious girl, always listens to her agent.

THERE'S SOMETHING VERY MYSTERIOUS about the affair of the story about Marilyn Monroe which ran in a London newspaper.

Marilyn was furious when she talked with me over the telephone about her shock and distress over the supposed story of her life, under her byline (but actually authored by Ben Hecht).

Titled "My Own Uncensored Story," the articles told shocking things including dramatic and heartbreaking anecdotes about her mother.

"I am going to sue," Marilyn told me, her voice shaking, "how dare Mr. Hecht, who pretends to be my friend, do such a terrible thing and without my permission! Joe is just as indignant as I am." (Continued on page 12)

NO RECONCILIATION seems possible for the Gregory Pecks; but they have reached an understanding.

JIM STACK, one of the popular Stack brothers, married pretty Wanda Hendrix. This is her second.

EXIT AVA from Frankie's life. Next stop: probably marriage to Dominguin.

LOVE WALKED IN for June and Fred MacMurray, now in their brand new home

SHORTEST RECONCILIATION on record was Betty Hutton's one-day return to husband Charlie O'Curran—who's still torching for her.

RECONCILIATION IS TAKING for my "adopted daughter," Jane Wyman, and Fred Karger, since they met at Joan Benny's wedding.

BOB STACK met Terry Moore on Juke Box Jury. They liked each other right away, started dating. Romance rumors flew, of course.

I KNEW Arlene Dahl and Fernando Lamas were getting married when I spotted one of their friends buying a wedding hat!

MONROE BURNS—and I don't blame her!—about the stories being printed under her name!

CRAIN CUDDLES with husband Paul Brinkman. These two are always so happy.

BOB FRANCIS FLOATS—he's a real athlete. Careerwise, he's walking on air, too.

I nominate for stardom: MAGGIE McNAMARA

■ The cuter-than-a-button Broadway actress is a half-pint package of Irish delight in Three Coins In The Fountain.

The ironic part of it is—ninety-five-pound Maggie, flattered as she is with her new found film success, really prefers life in New York. She tells me, "I guess my husband, David Swift, and I just have New York in our blood."

She doesn't look old enough to have a husband when she wears her favored low-heeled shoes and sweaters and skirts. But she's very proud of Swift, one of the writers on the popular Mr. Peepers TV show.

The Swifts live in a one-room apartment near the campus of UCLA in Westwood. They're both nearsighted, wear glasses and seldom touch anything stronger than beer.

All the time Maggie was working in Fountain they never attended a nightclub. With the exception of the actors and actresses she worked with at Twentieth, she knows no screen stars. "But I like to see them in public," little Maggie says. "I saw Judy Garland in the book store in Beverly Hills and I got such a kick out of it."

Missy MacNamara was born in New York City and came up the model route—posing in teen-age clothes.

Her first stage appearance in The King Of Friday's Men wasn't too hot. But the show folded just in time for Otto Preminger to discover her for the Chicago presentation of The Moon Is Blue. Maggie was so great in it she got the movie lead. I think she'll be with us a long time.

I've known Ben a long time—and he's liable to do anything. But he sounded sincere when he told me, "The story was sold by my agent without my permission. I knew nothing of the publication of the stories on Marilyn until your call."

It's difficult to believe that an agent to a writer as important as Hecht would dare to sell a story without permission.

Anyway, in this case, most of the sympathy goes to Marilyn because Hecht reveals that he has nothing but utter contempt for Hollywood and most of the people in it in his autobiography, Child Of The Century.

Pier Angeli and Anna Maria (who feel sooo grown-up) kidded Eddie and Jimmy McHugh.

Eddie Cantor and I spoke to Debbie Reynolds. So did Mr. Fisher—practically all evening.

THE PARTY OF THE MONTH was hosted by composer Jimmy McHugh in honor of the new darling of the debs, Eddie Fisher, and seldom have I seen so many teen agers at a cocktail party, seemingly most of them with a crush on Eddie.

The garden of the McHugh home was abloom with flowers and sweet young things in summery dresses—among the sweetest and the youngest, Anna Maria Alberghetti and Pier Angeli.

Later on I went to dinner with the two dark eighteen-year-old Italian beauties and Eddie. Although the girls are the same age, Pier seems far more mature because she dates without a chaperone.

She told me confidentially that her mother had had a talk with Anna Maria's parents and told them that they should give Anna Maria a little more freedom. "It's amazing," Pier whispered to me, "she can't go anywhere without a chaperone."

I have a feeling that Pier considers herself something of a woman of the world, particularly as she is supposed to have "suffered" over the break-up of her romance with Kirk Douglas who just recently married Anne Buydens.

Someone had asked Pier if she had sent Kirk and his bride a message of congratulation. She shrugged her shoulders, "Why should I?"

But to get back to the cocktail party, one of the most stunning girls present was dancer Vera-Ellen in a banana-colored chiffon cocktail dress. It was just a few years back that Vera was regarded as one of the worst dressed gals in pictures. Remember the comment she stirred up when she attended a première wearing a bouffant pink net gown, ballet slippers and a beret!!

Ever since Vera has been dating suave, witty Richard Gully she has shown the most excellent taste in clothes. Methinks the sophisticated assistant to Jack Warner has had a lot to do with Vera's smart appearance these days and nights.

I simply didn't recognize Debra Paget when she arrived. What in the world has this girl done to her hair? It's suddenly flaming pink—and I mean pink! (Continued on page 14)

I had a ball at the Eddie Fisher party

Eddie really feels at home here now, and everyone likes him. He was a big hit at the Cocoanut Grove—all the stars turned out for his opening.

Debra Paget (that's her mother in the background) has dyed her hair pink! I can't say I like it . . . but it really attracts attention.

Ann Miller looked lovely as usual—and I am just delighted with the big improvement in the way Vera-Ellen dresses these days.

(Continued from page 13) Even though she is recently divorced, Gloria De Haven looked pretty, fresh and happy. She wore a pale pink jacket over a black cocktail dress. I think Jeff Chandler has something to do with the new happiness Gloria has found.

A few days after the party, Eddie opened at the Cocoanut Grove and not since the old days when Joan Crawford used to win Charleston contests there have I seen so many stars sitting under the coconut trees. Joan, herself, was there with Jennings Lang. So were Dinah Shore and George Montgomery, Jane Wyman and Freddie Karger, Jeanne Crain and Paul Brinkman, Vera-Ellen and Richard Gully, Anna Maria Alberghetti with Vic Damone (yep, he was her date without a chaperone), Betty Hutton, Debbie Reynolds and practically all the local younger set who are real "gone" on Eddie.

IT WAS A BIG MONTH for parties—Judy Garland's birthday shindig being one of the most luxurious affairs.

For the gala occasion, Sid Luft took over the new private room at Romanoff's—which has a magnificent view of the whole city—and the motif was pink—tablecloths, candles, flowers—all very flattering to the femme guests.

Judy was like a kid showing off the new big diamond ring Sid gave her. "It's the first diamond ring I ever owned in my whole life," said the happy Mrs. Luft.

I got a kick out of Ethel Merman when I asked her if she was working in No Business Like Show Business the following morning.

"That all depends on Marilyn Monroe," said the queen of Broadway musicals who, I understand, has been patience herself waiting for the Queen of Hollywood glamour girls to show up on the set—or not show up.

When Rocky and Gary Cooper walked in just about the same time that Peter Lawford and his bride, Patricia Kennedy, arrived, every eye in the place was on this foursome. Or had you forgotten that during several separations from Gary, Rocky Cooper and Pete Lawford used to be dancing dates?

Those who expected fireworks were doomed to disappointment. Rocky and Peter were extremely cordial to each other—and I later saw Gary dancing with the new Mrs. Lawford.

It turned out that the big surprise of the evening was Humphrey Bogart's singing! With all this professional talent in attendance—Bogey got up at the microphone and gave with "September Song," and he was plenty good.

Lauren Bacall remarked, "The old boy can do anything," but she was plenty proud of "the old boy," believe me.

Mona Freeman, who is Judy's closest girl friend, came with Bob Neal (Frank Sinatra being up in Las Vegas). All Mona can talk about is how wonderful Judy is in A Star Is Born.

"If she doesn't get the Academy Award," Mona told me, "they should stop handing out Oscars."

The Dean Martins seem absolutely lovey-dovey since their reconciliation. I didn't see either of them dancing with anyone else the entire evening.

Van and Evie Johnson are always so sweet and thoughtful to everyone. I had to go home early—too early for such a good party—and they brought me to my door.

I had to tell Van how good I think he is in The Caine Mutiny movie.

"Thank you, Louella," he said, "my days of the howling bobby soxers are over. But I'm thankful that my career has moved into maturity without too big a jolt."

Evie told me that she and Van were bent double the other evening going over some of his old fan magazine stories. The worst was titled, "The Kutest Kid In Town."

AVA GARDNER'S NEW LOVE is costing her plenty—in more ways than one. She is completing her six-weeks stint in Reno divorcing Frank Sinatra and my money says that she will be heading immediately to Madrid to marry—and I said marry—bullfighter Dominguín!

MGM has suspended her, which means no more fat salary checks, for refusing to do Love Me Or Leave Me, the story of singer Ruth Etting.

Ava took a beautiful house on Lake Tahoe and imported practically her entire family to be with her while she sat it out. Two sisters were with her, one brother-in-law and her secretary.

If the Reno-ites expected her to go into seclusion, as have many stars in quest of freedom, they were pleasantly surprised.

A fan writes, "Ava is at a nightclub or at one of the gambling palaces almost every night—all dressed up and looking anything but unhappy.

"When Ann Sothern opened her nightclub act in Reno, Ava, sitting ringside, attracted almost as much attention as Maisie Sothern. When Ann introduced her, she stood up in the spotlight and took a bow and threw kisses. She was very gracious to fans who came to her table and autographed menus for several of them—including me.

Tony Curtis was

Tony never suspected a thing when Janet suggested hearing Sammy Davis, Jr., at Boston's Latin Quarter.

Party idea was Mitzi Green's. She's Mrs. Joe Pevney; Joe is directing Tony's Five Bridges To Cross.

"Don't help!" Janet begged, but pals Julia Adams and George Nader puffed at the candles anyhow.

really surprised

Then all of a sudden a party of their friends, singing "Happy Birthday," appeared—with a cake!

Janet got gifts and congratulations, too, because it was also the Curtis' third wedding anniversary.

Tony and Janet really seem happy now; everyone's so glad their recent troubles were just temporary.

on my soapbox:

I CHALLENGE BOB MITCHUM

■ I'm challenging Robert Mitchum to make me eat my words that he is the most miscast actor of the year as the sensitive young doctor in Not As A Stranger.

In the right role, I say there are few better actors than Bob. And most of the fans agree with me. But Bob should see the letters I've received from fans who have read Mort Thompson's best seller—and not one believes that Mitchum is the star for the part.

I even discussed this with Stanley Kramer, the producer. He said, "Wait. I think Bob will surprise you." I'll wait. And I'll be the first to say that he's great—if he is.

Here are some of the objections to Bob I've received in letters:

"He's too old to be convincing during the large part of the story when the young doctor is a medical student."

"He has been associated with too much personal sensational publicity to be acceptable to the medical profession."

"He represents physical, almost animal, appeal which will be a jarring note in the playing of a sensitive, misunderstood man who is dedicated to medicine."

"All the time I'm watching him, I'll be thinking of that picture he posed for in France with that girl who stripped off her brassiere."

And so the letters go.

With all these strikes on him before he goes to bat, I say that Mitchum has the hardest assignment ever handed an actor. But if he overcomes all this in a fine, fine portrayal I'll be the first to say so—and also to say that he deserves an Academy Award.

the letter box

CAROL LEVIN, Buffalo, New York, is furious over the "snide hints that Jerry Lewis is most responsible for the troubles between Jerry and his partner, Dean Martin. I have relatives in Los Angeles who are closely associated with Mr. Lewis and they hold him to be as fine a man as he is funny. Let's remember, it takes two to make a quarrel." Right, Carol.

PHYLLIS EMRY, Ogallala, Nebraska, believes that Gene Nelson is the most wasted talent in Hollywood. "He's a greater dancer than either Gene Kelly or Fred Astaire and yet he gets just mediocre musicals." Buck up, gal. Your boy has one of the two top male leads in Oklahoma! and that's no mediocre musical.

KAY KEEGAN, of Texas City, Texas, is crazy about Sterling Hayden in Johnny Guitar and wants to know if he's married and has any children! I'll say! Married, separated, and four (or is it five?) children—I've lost count.

CATHERINE CARTER says she hears that Kathryn Grayson plans to retire when she marries Pat Nerney. Wait a minute, Catherine. It's Jane Powell who will marry Pat Nerney —and neither she nor Kathryn Grayson have retirement plans.

Betty Grable is not only PAUL CONN's favorite star, she's inspired him to write a poem which goes:

"A shapely young matron named Grable
To buy ermine and sable is able,
Since her figure divine
Is a box-office mine
In pictures that carry her label."

Betty, attention please!

(Continued from page 14) "The only time she seemed disturbed was when a fresh guy asked her if she knew that Mona Freeman had gone to Las Vegas to visit Frank Sinatra.

"Ava frowned and snapped, 'I care nothing about that.

"She wears simply scrumptious clothes. Even her denims have pearl and rhinestone trimmings and her slacks outfits are divine. A boy who makes deliveries to her house says that Ava has pictures of her bullfighter boy friend all over the place—even in the kitchen!

"At cocktail time she wears the cutest matador pants in bright red or green satin."

Thank you, Miss Fan, for this inside peek at Ava getting her divorce.

PERSONAL OPINIONS:

If you think 20th Century-Fox isn't sold, sold, sold on Robert Wagner, listen to this: the studio took up his option eighteen months ahead of time.

I have a hunch Jeff Chandler and Gloria De Haven will marry when both are free. They're soooo gone on each other.

Everyone is so happy for Wanda Hendrix—now Mrs. Jim Stack. Wanda was a miserable little girl when her marriage to Audie Murphy went on the rocks. Now she's living in the clouds again, so in love with the handsome and wealthy socialite who is Bob Stack's brother and who recently came into about $4,000,000 inheritance on his thirty-seventh birthday.

Back in the days when Peter Lawford was romancing various Hollywood beauties, he never liked them to visit him on the set. But that's all changed since Patricia Kennedy became his bride. She lunches daily with him while he's making his TV series and remains on the set 'till he's finished for the day.

A certain little doll-faced ingénue is hitting the bottle too hard and she can't disguise it under the guise that she's just "peppy" much longer.

A fashion I wouldn't exactly advocate—unless you are another Marie Wilson—is her new gag of wearing colored wigs to match her evening gowns.

The night I caught her, Marie had on a soft pink wig that exactly matched a décolletté gown she was wearing.

She also has one in pale blue, another in white and she's toying with one in orange!

There is no bigger fan than that great actress Shirley Booth who is just as wonderful in her new movie, About Mrs. Leslie, as she was in her Academy Award winning Come Back, Little Sheba.

Whenever Shirley sees a picture or a play that impresses her she sits down and writes a personal letter to the actor or actress. Most of them are bowled over by such recognition from a great actress.

"But there are two," says Miss Booth, "who didn't answer—or didn't send me a photograph with an autograph. I'll give them a little while longer. And then, I'm going to name them," she laughs.

There's a bit of a catch to the contract Mario Lanza has signed with Howard Hughes. It is effective only if the singer loses at least fifty pounds.

To many actors, this might seem like a slight stipulation. I'm not sure it will be so easy for Mario. A very close friend of his tells me that he will diet strenuously for a day or two—and then he just can't resist spaghetti.

Poor Marie MacDonald. Even before she was picked up by the Beverly Hills police for ramming three parked cars, and was booked on charges of driving under the influence of sedatives, I had suspected that she was a sick girl.

She frequently called me for no apparent reason. But not too long ago she called to say that she had come to the conclusion that she could not go on with her marriage to Harry Karl.

Within a week she called again to say that Harry had bought her a station wagon, filled it with fishing poles, "and now we have reconciled our differences." This is hardly the reasoning of someone in control of herself.

As for the charges brought by two newspaper cameramen that Harry Karl deliberately tried to run them down when they tried to take Marie's picture—I can only believe that he was distraught and hardly knew what he was doing—except blindly trying to protect his ill wife.

I talked with Ann Blyth McNulty exactly twenty-six hours after the arrival of Timothy Patrick McNulty, who weighed in at seven-and-a-half pounds, a big baby for such a little girl.

"Now that Timothy is here, Ann," I laughed, "break down and admit you and Dr. Jim wanted a boy all along."

"That's right, Louella," Ann chuckled, her voice strong and happy, "we did want a boy first and we couldn't be happier."

"You always get what you want," I said.

"And, I'm deeply grateful," she agreed. "I guess I'm just lucky."

If you ask me, I'm sure it's more than luck. This beautiful and religious girl is just getting back some of the joy and helpfulness and consideration of others which she gives out.

TV TALK

Wedding bells for Wally . . .
New stars: Eva Marie Saint and Kaye Ballard

Mr. Peepers and his TV bride are happy, too.

Wally Cox was so secretive about his wedding that only a handful of people know much more than the name of the bride, Marilyn Gennaro, and the name of the town (Bozman, Maryland). Here's the rest of the story. Wally and Marilyn had been going together for about four years—not steady but pretty frequently. Wally had lots of other dates, but he kept going back to Marilyn, whom he met when she was in the chorus of his first Broadway show. He had been wanting to get married for a long time—partly because he is dying to have a family. One of the reasons he decided Marilyn was the girl for him was that she liked him before he became famous as Mr. Peepers. He was always afraid that his other dates were going out with him because he was rich and famous. But he knew that Marilyn liked him for himself. (Wally is so tired of people calling him "Mr. Peepers" when they see him on the street that he has been known to scream, "Cox! Cox! Cox is the name!" at them in a fury.) And he always felt at home with Marilyn. The reason you read so little about the wedding itself was that Wally believes that marriages are sacred. Hardly anyone knew that he was going to be married, and when a few reporters did find out and follow him to Maryland, he almost called the whole thing off. If you'd seen him bawl them out for twenty minutes, you wouldn't have recognized the meek and mild Mr. Peepers you see on the screen! Marilyn and Wally's best friend drove down to Maryland three days before the wedding to get the license; Wally didn't go—which helped keep things quiet. And very few people were invited. The minister was the most nervous person there; it was his first wedding. No relatives of either the bride or the groom were present. Wally and his mother are not too close, and his father was at Wally's farm in Michigan (where he and Marilyn spent some of their honeymoon). Marilyn's parents are separated. Wally and Marilyn took them out to a fancy dinner and told them the good news. (They undoubtedly didn't celebrate riotously. Wally, you know, can take about one drink of beer and feel a little dizzy.) Marilyn gave up her dancing job in Pajama Game a few days before she married Wally, but she wasn't out of a job long. Wally insisted that she have a part in the play he did in summer stock, and a special one was written in for her—just so she wouldn't be lonely while he was working. Wally may not like being called Mr. Peepers, but he surely seems to be just as considerate of Marilyn Cox as Robinson Peepers is of Nancy Peepers! . . . Everybody who knows Eva Marie Saint loves her. She's just as pretty and slim off screen as on—and could pass for a college freshman any time she wanted to even though she's in her thirties. Her voice surprises you a little when you meet her, though; it's deeper than you'd think, and has that little crack in it like Jean Arthur's. You won't be seeing as much of Eva Marie on TV as you'd like to because she's fussy about her parts. She prefers live hour shows—and topnotch ones. They're hard to find. She also won't be in the movies as much as you undoubtedly wish if you've seen her in On The Waterfront. She won't leave her husband, who's a TV director in New York. That's one reason she agreed to make Waterfront. It was made in Hoboken. The other reason, of course, is that Eva Marie is a serious young actress and she couldn't turn down a chance to work with director Elia Kazan and Marlon Brando. (Eva Marie's husband, by the way, thought the love scenes between his wife and Marlon Brando were some of the most moving and powerful he had ever seen.) . . . One person whose success hasn't gone to her head is Kaye Ballard. All in one season, she made a hit in The Golden Apple on Broadway and got an NBC television contract. Most people with that kind of luck would pack up, move to a fancy apartment and hire at least one servant. Not Kaye. She still lives in her old tiny one up three flights of steep stairs. Notice sometimes how Kaye is reminiscent of Judy Garland when she sings a sad love song. . . . When Walter Cronkite moved to New York, he found a pretty snazzy place for himself and his wife and two little girls—a big modern apartment overlooking the East River. When they lived in Washington, their furniture was mostly Early American, but it wouldn't fit in with their New York picture windows, so they got rid of all of it and started all over again. Walter is all recovered from his operation. It was an old ailment and he kept putting off having it taken care of. But he finally went off to the hospital one night right after he finished You Are There. Incidentally, Walter is one of the few men who is really nuts about his mother-in-law. She stays with them quite a bit of the time, and he loves it! . . . You'll notice the change in Ray Milland's show this fall. It's going to be much more sophisticated and much more like Ray Milland. He just felt that the shows last year were too silly, and he put his foot down . . . You should see behind the scenes on Ed Murrow's Person to Person. It looks so easy, you almost forget that the people's homes are full of men and equipment. On the afternoon of the day of the show, a big CBS crew shows up. They take up rugs and stick big batteries in odd corners, and generally turn the home into a TV studio. But no one has ever complained. Ed has given his crew strict orders to leave the houses the way they found them, and they do. By midnight, after the show, you'd never know they'd been there. Ed, by the way, sometimes never meets the guests except when he's interviewing them (and then, of course, he's in a CBS studio and they're at their homes). But sometimes they go out for drinks and dinner together before the show. That's why, sometimes, the guests are so relaxed!

Women Astounded By Make-Up Miracle On TV

MODEL SHEDS 10 YEARS IN 10 SECONDS

Now Available For The First Time! — The SECRET That Famous Screen, Stage, TV Stars Learned From Their Make-Up Artists

Why Do Famous Actresses Look So Young and Glamorous So Long?

Your own common sense will tell you a multi-million dollar movie can't be held up because the star comes on the set with dark circles under her eyes or because nature was mean enough to make a pimple pop out on her nose.

You always assumed that nature played favorites — or else that they did it with make-up. But the truth is make-up alone cannot do it because make-up must be translucent enough to let your skin show through. Otherwise, you'd look as if you were wearing a mask.

If the stars used make-up alone, their dark circles, blemishes, lines would show.

The Secret That the Stars Had to Learn

After all, they can't touch up motion picture film. So they must touch up the stars themselves. That's why the make-up artists in Hollywood had to develop a new cosmetic.

Before any make-up artist thinks of applying make-up, he first touches up all imperfections. Then and only then does he apply make-up. That is what keeps stage, screen and television stars looking so young.

Remember When Only "Hussies" Used Lipstick?

Remember — actresses used cake make-up, lipstick, eye make-up and mascara long before the general public did. And they never shouted from the housetops that they owed all their glamour to make-up secrets.

Charles Antell hates to give away their last and most carefully guarded secret. But business is business. So now, at last, Charles Antell is making this secret cosmetic available to everybody. We call it Touch-Up Stik.

The Cosmetic the Whole Family Will Use

In the morning, if you're in a hurry, a touch of Charles Antell's Touch-Up Stik, a touch of lipstick—and your husband will look at you, instead of the morning paper.

For the beach, Charles Antell Touch-Up Stik will conceal unsightly broken blood vessels on your legs.

Teen-agers use Charles Antell Touch-Up Stik to hide the blemishes and pimples that always seem to pop out just before a date.

ALWAYS TOUCH-UP BEFORE YOU MAKE-UP

WITHOUT TOUCH-UP STIK WITH TOUCH-UP STIK

Make this miraculous difference as easily as applying lipstick.

Your Friends Will Think You Found "The Fountain of Youth"

To look your glamorous best, blend your make-up over the Touch-Up Stik. Instead of looking more made up, you will look less made up—because it takes far less make-up to give you the smooth, even, creamy-looking complexion that every woman wants and every man admires.

Rememer—Touch-Up Stik is invisible. People see the results—not the Touch-Up Stik itself. And it's actually good for the skin. The ingredients have been blended together with beautifying, softening lanolin. It will not flake, peel, crack or rub off. It will stay on until you wash it off or cream it off.

The Greatest Beauty Revelation Since Lipstick

Many of you have seen the miraculous demonstration on TV where a model shed ten years in ten seconds right before your eyes. You know that a touch-up stick has been working for years for stars of stage, screen and radio.

Now, at last, it is available to you. Think of how you will look without dark circles under your eyes, harsh lines softened, freckles, scars, birthmarks and blemishes all made invisible. The kind of perfection you always felt was out of your reach is now as easy to achieve as putting on lipstick.

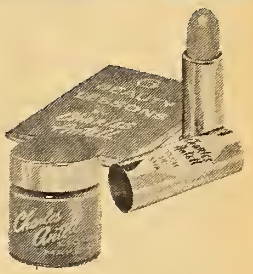
Stars' Secret Now Yours During FREE Introductory Bargain Offer



Is it expensive? No. A Charles Antell Touch-Up Stik that will last you up to a year is only $2. But to induce you to try it now, to see for yourself how easy it is to shed ten, fifteen or even twenty years from your appearance, here is what we are going to do.

With each Touch-Up Stik, we are going to give you FREE a $1.50 bottle of Charles Antell's Liquid Make-up with Lanolin that matches your Touch-Up Stik. This is a revolutionary new kind of liquid make-up that has a natural affinity for the skin. That's why it stays on longer, looks better and is actually good for your skin. It needs no foundation under it, it needs no powder over it. It is the first complete make-up.

Now besides that, we are going to give you FREE a series of beauty lessons to teach you all the simple little make-up tricks of the make-up artist.

In other words, you get the $2 Charles Antell Touch-Up Stik, the $1.50 matching Liquid Make-up with Lanolin, plus the make-up lessons—for the cost of the Touch-Up Stik alone. Only $2.

Forgotten something?

Bags all packed, tickets all bought, and here you are—ready for that long-awaited vacation. But if you don't have a certain product tucked into a suitcase, at least a part of your vacation might be spoiled.

For what's more likely to spoil a vacation than not being able to go swimming? Yet, if you use external pads for sanitary protection, you may even feel an understandable reluctance to go to the beach. (External pads with their belts and pins are so bulky!) In fact, you may feel self-conscious about shorts, tapered slacks or clinging dresses.

How different—how delightfully different—when you have Tampax with you. Tampax is internal sanitary protection. It never "shows" under a wet or dry bathing suit. And is it comfortable! Actually, you don't even feel the Tampax, once it's in place. (No chafing, not a speck of irritation.)

Tampax is made of highly absorbent surgical cotton in disposable applicators. The Tampax itself is so easy to dispose of that you just don't have any worries. And of course you can wear Tampax in your shower or tub.

One last bit of good news: Tampax actually prevents odor from forming! Choice of 3 absorbency-sizes at any drug or notion counter: Regular, Super, Junior. Month's supply goes into purse. Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Mass.

The story of The Egyptian revolves around the splendid but corrupt court of ancient Egypt, where Pharaoh Akhnatan (Michael Wilding) clashes with the priests over his belief that there is only one God. Peace-loving, the Pharaoh refuses to arm against his enemies, the Hittites.

Hero of the film, Sinuhe (Edmund Purdom) celebrates becoming a physician by getting drunk, is taken home by army cadet Victor Mature.

Mature and Purdam save Akhnaton from a lion, are received at court and meet the Pharaoh's proud and passionate sister (Gene Tierney).

Picture of the Month: THE EGYPTIAN

■ Twentieth Century-Fox emptied its treasury for The Egyptian, a lavish CinemaScopic production which recreates a culture that existed 33 centuries ago. Based on the best seller of the same name, it is a highly involved story of the days when men worshipped many gods and were tied by superstition and ignorances. Yet, even then, some groped for new truths and died fighting old misconceptions. The movie revolves around a young physician named Sinuhe (Edmund Purdom) who was cast on the Nile as a child and rescued by a poor physician and his wife. Purdom actually was the Pharaoh's son, although he never acknowledges it. An early idealist, he seeks the meaning of life but finds instead violent passions, greed and malice. Akhnaton (Michael Wilding) the present Pharaoh, is probably the first Egyptian to believe in the concept of one God. This naturally leads to his downfall since it threatens the livelihood of a great many priests. The idea that only truth (not Pharaohs) is immortal and that evil must be condemned divides the characters into two camps. Among the corrupt are Bella Darvi, a Babylonian seductress who lures Purdom away from the good Merit (Jean Simmons), Victor Mature, a husky, power-loving warrior who finally ascends the throne with Gene Tierney (Akhnaton's sister). Colorful, exotic, full of intrigue and the decadent splendor of a fascinating civilization—that is The Egyptian.

HOBSON'S CHOICE Charles Laughton, as Henry Horatio Hobson, is an unusually obnoxious father. He's so tight with a pound he'd rather his daughters were old maids than have to pay a dowry. Besides, life is comfortable as it is. His three girls work (without pay) in his bootshop and when he staggers home after a day at the Moonrakers Inn dinner had better be on the table. Eldest daughter (Brenda De Banzie) brings this blustering tyrant to heel. She drags his bootmaker (John Mills) out of the cellar, dusts him off and marries him. Somewhat shocked, Mills acts like a lamb going to slaughter but he recovers fast. And with a shop of his own he is soon pushing Hobson out of business. That's the framework of a film rich in humor and warmth. Excellent acting makes ordinary situations into freshly comic events and a "merry England" flavor runs through it all.—U. A.

THE COWBOY If you've seen so many westerns you've forgotten what cowboys are really like this will refresh your memory. It is a documentary about the men who first came out to the west, started rounding up cattle and driving them to market, started catching wild mustangs and breaking them in as working cowhorses, started putting up fences and laying down laws. Narrated by Tex Ritter, Bill Conrad, John Dehner and Larry Dobkin, the movie has a pastoral quality to it. The life of the cowboy was hard and lonely but there was something about the vastness of the land and of the job that seemed to catch his imagination. You'll get a glimpse into the life of two modern cowboys whose long working day starts at 4 A.M. Tired they may be, but they'll ride 20 miles to a square dance on Saturday night and risk their necks on Sunday in a country rodeo. Music by Carl Brandt. Eastman Color.—Lippert Pictures.

THE VANISHING PRAIRIE Walt Disney's second True Life Adventure (his first was The Living Desert) more than lives up to its promise. You marvel at the wizardry of the cameramen who catch the animals and birds of the prairie at their most unguarded, most typical moments. (To film the birth of a buffalo calf cameramen draped themselves in buffalo hide and moved right in with the herd.) Courtship, death struggles, nesting habits of mountain lion, antelope, prairie dog, marsh bird and others are all here in Technicolor with music that sets a lively, often humorous pace. You move from spring to winter in that great expanse of land between the Mississippi and the Rockies, from tender moments of birth to the stark drama of survival in flash floods, drought and fire. The camera, always alert and inquisitive, beautifully recaptures that time when these animals not only roamed the American prairie but presided over it as well.

THE ROYAL TOUR OF QUEEN ELIZABETH AND PHILIP Queen Elizabeth and Philip traveled 50,000 miles in six months, visiting their empire. It was an historic tour and here it is recorded in Technicolor on a CinemaScopic screen. The scenery is impressive, so are the hordes of loyal subjects in Australia, Africa Malta, Gibraltar and other small islands of the realm. Colorful native dances, various celebrations, drills and garden parties for the royal entourage are shown. Twice Elizabeth wore her coronation gown to open Houses of Parliament. Once, part of a fleet plowed out to sea single file to welcome the Queen's yacht with 21-gun salutes. Interesting as a document, the film never descends from its high level of formality and is therefore somewhat exhausting. After an hour and a half you've more than sensed the intense discipline and rigorous routine which rules Queen Elizabeth's life—you've almost experienced it yourself.—20th-Fox

SABRINA The Cinderella story never goes stale and when Audrey Hepburn plays her it even seems inspired. She's the chauffeur's daughter on an immense estate in Long Island. Ever since childhood she's been secretly in love with young heir David Larrabee (William Holden) who lives in the mansion and not above the garage. Pop sends her off to cooking school in Paris. Forget David, he pleads, he's beyond your reach. But girls learn more than cooking in Paris and when Audrey comes back she's a chic sophisticate with French poodle. David drops his fiancée (Martha Hyer) to woo her. Older brother Humphrey Bogart, who long ago married the family's business, takes desperate steps to stop this romance. That is, he woos Audrey himself. But his intentions aren't honorable—not at the beginning, anyway. You'll love Sabrina (that's Audrey). It's gay, sweet and funny. With Walter Hampden, John Williams.—Para.

LIVING IT UP Martin and Lewis aren't funnier than ever but if you're a fan you'll probably enjoy Living It Up which is vaguely based on Broadway's Hazel Flagg. Concerns a small town boy, Homer Flagg (Jerry Lewis), who thinks he's radioactive. Reporter Janet Leigh sees a story in him and saddles her publisher Fred Clark with all the expenses of bringing Homer and his doctor (Dean Martin) to New York. After all, says Janet, the poor kid has only three weeks to live. On the strength of that she proposes to him, Mayor Edward Arnold hands him the key to the city and Homer, wild with joy, turns his lavish hotel suite into pandemonium. Clark foots the bills while everybody waits around with tears in their eyes for Homer to drop dead. Trouble is, he won't. Not only is he a fraud, but you couldn't kill him with a cannon. Technicolor, with Sheree North.—Para.

SEVEN BRIDES FOR SEVEN BROTHERS When you base a movie on a story by Stephen Vincent Benét you can't lose. It's bound to be whimsical, unique and full of homespun charm. This musical has all those qualities in addition to dances by Michael Kidd and lyrics by Johnny Mercer. The seven brothers (headed by Howard Keel) are a bearded, sloppy crew who live in the hills. One day Keel goes to town to pick a wife, and comes back with Jane Powell. Jane shudders at the sight of her in-laws but she's trapped. Only thing to do is reform them. Pretty soon the boys want to get married, too. Keel tells them a story of the Sabine women who were carried off by Romans. Swell idea, say the brothers, and proceed to kidnap their would-be brides. The frightened (but thrilled) girls are their prisoners all winter because the pass is blocked by snow. Comes the thaw, comes the irate fathers, comes the grand climax. CinemaScope.—MGM.

GARDEN OF EVIL There's this fellow lying near to death in a gold mine and his wife (Susan Hayward) wants to rescue him. She strides into a saloon and behind a beaded curtain finds Gary Cooper, Richard Widmark, Cameron Mitchell. Come with me, fellas, she says, and I'll give you two thousand dollars apiece. So they go with her up hills and over cliffs—riding, riding, riding through Mexico's remote Indian country. Cooper doesn't talk much, but you know he's masterful. Widmark talks maybe too much but he's harmless, always with the card tricks. Mitchell doesn't talk. Attack's his game. Well, they reach this mine where lies Hugh Marlowe near to death. "So you come back?" he sneers at his wife. She swallows tears of humiliation. Sure, she came back. Now the problem is to come back to the saloon where the fellas can spend their two thousand bucks apiece. The Indians save Susan a heap of dough. CinemaScope.—20th Fox.

THE HIGH AND THE MIGHTY (Warners): John Wayne and Bob Stack are the tense pilots of a plane in trouble. Claire Trevor, Laraine Day, Jan Sterling are among the passengers, who range from calm to terrified. An exciting film. CinemaScope.

DEMETRIUS AND THE GLADIATORS (20th-Fox): This CinemaScope epic picks up where The Robe left off, follows Victor Mature as Demetrius through encounters with Susan Hayward, Debra Paget, Michael Rennie and numerous hungry lions. Technicolor.

ON THE WATERFRONT (Col.): One of the year's best films, this tense and exciting story of longshoremen vs. corrupt union bosses stars Marlon Brando, Karl Malden, lovely Eva Marie Saint. Directed by Elia Kazan.

DIAL M FOR MURDER (Warners): A topnotch thriller, this is an adaptation of a hit play. Ray Milland stars as the jealous husband trying to get his wife, Grace Kelly, indicted for murder. Bob Cummings is around to add to the terrific suspense. Warnercolor.

OH MY PAPA!

The MacDonald Careys' fifth is a half-pint of note!

■ It's not every baby who can be a long-awaited Blessed Event and at the same time almost wreck Papa's career. Edward MacDonald Carey, Jr., almost managed it, though, merely by showing up in Hollywood while MacDonald, Sr., was on stage in New York, doing a performance of his hit Broadway show, Anniversary Waltz. A helpful friend in the wings made signs to Papa indicating that he was a father for the fifth time. MacDonald, naturally thrilled (and possibly impressed with his own record), promptly forgot his lines and stood in full view of the audience, making signals like telephoning so that there would be a line open to the Cedars of Lebanon Hospital on the coast as soon as the act was over.

Producers being men of heart and MacDonald being an actor of note, he was not removed from the cast nor even gently reprimanded. If anything, it was felt that he had once more proved his claim to have one of Hollywood's happiest home-lives as well as rosiest careers. In the fifteen years between his discovery in Broadway's Lady In The Dark (which also sent Vic Mature to Hollywood) and his latest, most important movie, Fire Over Africa, with Maureen O'Hara, Carey has received almost nothing but praise from critics for his scores of films. This last one, in fact, has drawn forth rhapsodies, causing one lady reviewer to murmur soulfully, "He's even younger and more romantic than he was fifteen years ago!" Which would seem to prove that MacDonald need fear no competition, even from Junior, who, like his father, is growing more handsome daily, but unlike Papa, is beginning to show his full age (about four months) and will probably go right on getting older!

Marilyn Talks About Joe And Babies

the most intimate interview ever given by Hollywood's most exciting star

■ "I'd hate to think that marriage was Joe's only interest," said Marilyn Monroe. "There are twenty-four hours in each day. How many hours can you give to being a husband or a wife? You must have other interests, too, to make for a full, happy life." This is "The Monroe Doctrine."

Marilyn was giving me the frankest interview of her life, revealing her most secret thoughts on marriage and babies—and she threw in the famous calendar for fascinating good measure. She's a trifle old-fashioned. She believes a wife should not be separated from her husband and she believes a mother should not be separated from her children. She has definite ideas about child care—having been a neglected child herself. She discussed all of this with the honesty that has always existed between this reporter and the blonde, beautiful and most exciting movie star of our generation.

Some of the women reporters in this town have given Marilyn a bad time. They've called her cheap, tawdry, a bad actress. She has always been grateful to me because way back, even before the bit in Asphalt Jungle, in the days when only the late diminutive agent, Johnny Hyde, believed she would one day be a great actress, I regarded her as a nice girl, caught in the Hollywood jungle. I must confess I didn't think she had much chance of breaking out of the overgrown forest into the bright sunlight of stardom. I like her even more now, because success has loosened the tight bonds of an inferiority complex that used to bind her tongue when you asked her the simplest question. But now?

"Joe," said Marilyn, "will always come first with me. He is the human being closest to my heart. He's the most important person in my life. Everything else is second. But he understands that my career is very important to me. I fought hard to get it. Sometimes starved. And the same goes for his career with me. We both had our jobs before we (Continued on page 67)

SO, SUE ME!

"Being careful isn't living. I've been . . .

in clover and I've been in jail and busted . . .

flat. But I've loved every minute of it."

When a lady gets something off her chest, who gets involved? Mitchum, of course. Even when he's innocent, he's fall-guy supreme!

BY TONI NOEL

■ Any accident that's on its way to happen just waits around for Robert Mitchum to stroll by. Then it happens to him. He is philosophical about it. He knows he must take the falls, but he doesn't know why.

The trouble is that Mitchum thinks he's just like other men. He isn't. "Mitch is a classic in himself," said an admiring Jane Russell, his longtime stablemate at RKO. "He can do anything—act, write, sing—just a little bit better than anyone else."

Mr. Mitchum is a mere six-foot, one-inch, hundred-and-eighty pounder, but he looks immense, possibly because of the tremendous breadth of his chest and shoulders. Physically, he's a man women must look up to, which makes him different from the average run of Hollywood males. And there are other differences.

Male stars tend to fall into two camps as to hairstyle. The younger heroes like the swirl-about that results in careless curls; the aging idols prefer the crewcut as a means of maintaining the illusion of youth. Our Robert wears his light brown hair in a spiky, bristling in-between that goes nowhere. Ladies tenderly describe it as "stubborn."

The Mitchum profile, altered if not improved by a broken nose, strikes them as exceedingly manly. If any other gentleman appraised them with sleepy-eyed boldness equal to that of his hazel eyes or with such a curling lip, they'd exclaim, "How dare you!" To Mitch they murmur, "Why don't you?"

Other guys could walk on their hands without attracting the amount of feminine attention Mitchum achieves simply by putting one foot before the other in the prescribed manner; the delighted distaff reaction to his relaxed amble is that of hep cats to catnip.

Women he has never seen before in his life make outrageous requests ranging from "one kiss" to his autograph on their unmentionables. To comply would require an abundance of (Continued on page 86)

AVA and her BULLFIGHTER

With the ashes of her marriage to Frankie barely cold, Ava is involved in a flaming new romance—with the fabulous Dominguín—of Spain!

BY STEVE CRONIN

Inseparable in Spain, Ava and Dominguín (world's greatest matador, the Spanish say) were chaperoned by Ava's sister Beatrice.

■ Ava Gardner settled down on the Nevada shore of Lake Tahoe to wait for her third divorce. But she was being questioned as much about prospective husband number four as about her divorce.

The prospect was in Madrid and his name is Luis Miguel Gonzalez y Lucas—better known to the Spanish-speaking world as Dominguín, the bullfighter.

"What's this about you and Dominguín?" Ava was asked. "Is he going to be your next husband?"

Ava is basically a gentle, good-natured girl and a truthful one, but when it comes to the men in her life, she is capable of making up some whoppers.

For example, a few months before she married Sinatra three years ago, she said, "Why should I marry him? I know that men in show business usually don't make good husbands. I've had two of them and I've learned my lesson."

Of Dominguín on June 11, Ava declared, "He is just a friend—as is Clark Gable."

In Madrid Luis Miguel said there was a possibility of his coming to the United States sometime in July or August, and the chances are very good that he will have arrived by the time you read this.

"Would you visit Señorita Gardner?"

"Of course, that would be one of the main reasons for coming!"

"Do you and Señorita Gardner have an understanding?"

"I do not understand," Dominguín said.

"Do you and Señorita Gardner plan to get married?"

Dominguín laughed.

"How long have you known Señorita Gardner?"

"Many months," Dominguín said.

"When she was in Madrid, didn't you take her out steadily? When she was in the hospital, didn't you visit her every day? Didn't you take her out to a famous ranch where they breed fighting bulls? Didn't you go to the bullfights with her? Wasn't it you who introduced Señorita Gardner to Ernest Hemingway?"

At the Madrid airport Dominguín started to give Ava a brotherly goodbye kiss, but it turned into a Hollywood embrace and made international headlines. Ava promptly took off for Nevada to start divorcing Sinatra.

There is nothing like a dame

■ A man named Harry James, famous for the sweetest trumpet this side of heaven and for being married to Betty Grable, was wakened from his slumbers at the unearthly hour of eleven A.M., one Saturday not long ago. Groggily, since any hour before noon is before sunrise to a band man, Harry staggered to the window and looked out upon the lawn of his five-acre Beverly Hills estate. Then he weaved his way back to bed, nudged the pillow on which the beautiful face of his wife Betty reposed.

"Wake up, doll," he muttered. "They're at it again." Then he fell back upon his bed.

So Betty Grable rose, dressed in pure white slacks, slapped on a touch of lipstick, ran a brush through her hair and went down to the side lawn. As she approached a group of four people enjoying a picnic lunch on the cool green grass, Betty said, "Hi!"

The little grey-haired, round-faced man who was picnicking with his plump and pretty wife and his two plump and pretty daughters, responded graciously. "Sit down," he said, "and help yourself to the deviled eggs, Kansas style."

Betty sat down, helped herself and talked to the people from Kansas. Sally, the older of the two girls, about fifteen, grinned. "If I were reading about this in a movie magazine," she declared, "it would say that I told you that you looked exactly like Betty Grable. But this is for real. We know that you are Betty Grable and that this is your place. That's why we're having a picnic here. We were sure you wouldn't mind."

Betty assured them that she didn't mind and said she'd have another shot of that delicious lemonade. After a while the picnickers packed up, thanked Betty for her hospitality and prepared to move on. Betty started back to the house and to Harry, but she reckoned without the sense of humor to be expected from a Kansas tourist.

"Wait a minute, Betty," he ordered. "When we have a picnic, we always leave the place clean."

Marriage is no happy ending for Suzan Ball. It's the happy beginning of a life filled with love and hope—and work!

■ As Black Shawl in Universal's Chief Crazy Horse, you'll see Suzan walking straight and true into the arms of Vic Mature. After which, if you care to do her a service, forget she's the girl who lost her leg. Think of her as she thinks of herself: Suzan Ball, working actress, and Suzan Long, cherished and cherishing wife to Dick.

"I won't be able to leap fences, but I wasn't doing much fence-leaping anyway. I can learn to ride horseback again. I'm already driving."

"Neither more nor less dangerous," comments her lord, "than other women, including the three-legged."

Through his dry foolery the tenderness shows, free of mawkishness. Suzan is not mawkish either, merely aboveboard. "I'm sticking a sign on him: Attention All Girls! He's Married!"

"And I'm sticking blinders on her." Then he relents. "But very fancy blinders!"

If you're listening for sobs beneath the surface, you'll hear none. She's a gipsy-faced beauty, her passion for life so intense that he calls her Tiger. He's poised and mature, his reflective spirit deepened by two years in Korea. The past is past, the present and future are theirs. They teem with plans. "Mainly," says Dick, "to live happily ever after." As they tell the story, shifting from grave to gay, a picture emerges of two young people who found in each other the same will to accept reality, the same need for honest thinking, the same release in humor. They also found strength in love. But only because they had forged their own strength to build on.

Suzan, eighteen at the time, was undergoing deep-ray therapy for what she'd been told was a tumor of the knee. Little by little, suspicion took root. "People talk very strangely to me," she told a close friend. "They call up and say they're praying for me. I (Continued on page 72)

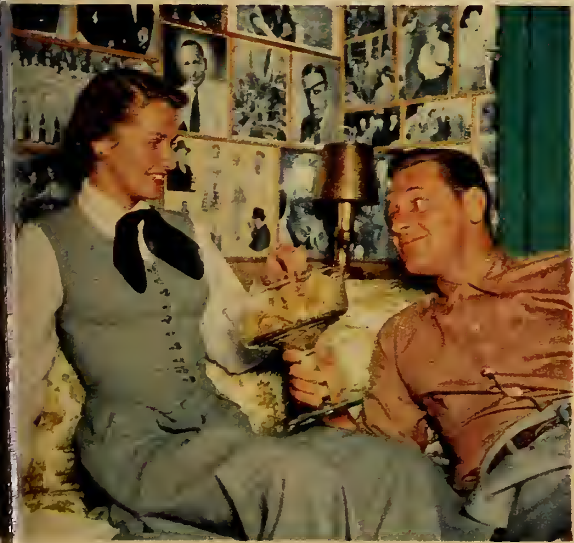
the private world of BILL HOLDEN

Relaxing on weekends, Bill swims or plays lifeguard for the kids and their friends, who are not allowed to use the pool unless Bill or Ardis is watching. Gardening is another favorite—and keeps the ground soft for kids falling off the brick wall (background, below).

Ardis uses the Early American trestle table in the den for Bill's mail, magazines and messages; they spend most of their evenings in this comfortable room, listening to records and talking.

Furnished to survive any number of Cub Scouts, the cool green and white livingroom boasts tables imported from English taverns.



The picture-gallery bar adjoining the den houses the Holdens' photo collection but is not yet filled. Ardis is considering removing the pictures and painting the walls.

The Holdens don't own a movie-star mansion; they do their living in a Sunday kind of home.

■ Bill Holden was hard at work cleaning out the area behind his garage when he suddenly spotted hundreds of empty beer cans dumped into the compost pile.

"This called for a little investigation," he said, "so I got hold of the boys and questioned them." It seems that his sons, Scott and West, and some of their pals had, for reasons known only to small boys, started to collect different kinds of beer cans. They had traveled all over the neighborhood asking for different brands. They'd even ridden their bikes over behind some restaurants and searched through the trash barrels. It was an impressive assortment. Once they had grown bored with the game, they had simply dumped all the cans into the most convenient hole.

Bill had the boys gather up their empties and carry them outside for the rubbish collectors.

■ If you are any kind of actress at all you become what you play, saint or sinner, while in the role. There is no other way in which you can give your portrayal realism. But believe me, some of the girls I have played—the hard-eyed queens of dubious morals—are strangers to the mother who raised me.

Mother didn't even think I could pretend to look and act like that. I knew I had to in order to win recognition as an actress. But I do not find any familiar reference to my actual past in these parts.

I would like everyone who has seen me on the screen, and perhaps wondered about me, to know this. Not because I am concerned about my reputation or that I may be misunderstood. This is not important. BEAUTIFUL BUT DUMB?

by George Sidney

One of Hollywood's most famous directors of winsome women reveals a little-known fact: those pretty-eyed babies are pretty wise babes—or they wouldn't be where they are!

■ If I were asked to select the smartest screen beauty I know, I would pretend to be deaf or retire behind the Fifth Amendment. A man can get a terrible bump on his head falling off a limb like that.

Certainly one of the smartest is Esther Williams, whom I happen to be directing currently in Metro's Jupiter's Daughter. I don't know how much you know about Esther's off screen activities, but I can tell you they are extensive, the tireless work of a good business woman and a wonderful wife and mother. The Ben Gages, of whom Esther is half, are seeing to it that their children will be off to a flying start.

Probably you know about some of her business ventures—the filling stations, the West Los Angeles restaurant (which began modestly enough and is now breaking in big name acts for Las Vegas) and the partnership in a nationally known bathing suit business. She has on paper the blueprint for the time she will no longer be in pictures.

She has worked out a personal appearance routine, beginning with a "dry" aquacade. This she will try out in Vegas in October. In it (I am a trifle vague on this myself, but Esther has it mapped to the last detail) she will do all the things out of water that (Continued on page 78)

You'll re-live a deep emotional experience in this true story of what is happening to Judy, in her career and in her marriage.

BY WILLIAM BARBOUR

IF YOU LOVE

All of her life, Judy Garland wanted what most girls want. But most girls get it more easily than Judy did.

"I've been married before, you know," said Judy, "But neither Dave (Rose) nor Vincente (Minnelli) ever gave me an engagement ring. I don't know why. They just didn't.

"But I've always dreamed somebody would give me one, ever since I was a little girl. And when Sid said he had a little 'thing' for me and slipped the ring on my finger, I just cried. I really did. Honestly, Sid's the most thoughtful guy!"

So on the second anniversary of her third marriage, Judy Garland received her diamond engagement ring and her girlish wish was fulfilled. Judy and Sid Luft had celebrated this anniversary with a party at the Mocambo. After the festivities were over, Judy and Sid climbed into their Cadillac convertible and Sid drove to their picturesque new four-acre estate in Holmby Hills. There, in the wee hours of the morning, he gave his wife the ring she had always wanted.

A few weeks before their anniversary, Judy and Sid had been down in Palm Springs at Jimmy Van Heusen's house with Mona Freeman and Frank Sinatra. Judy and Frank sang and sang and both couples had a wonderful time.

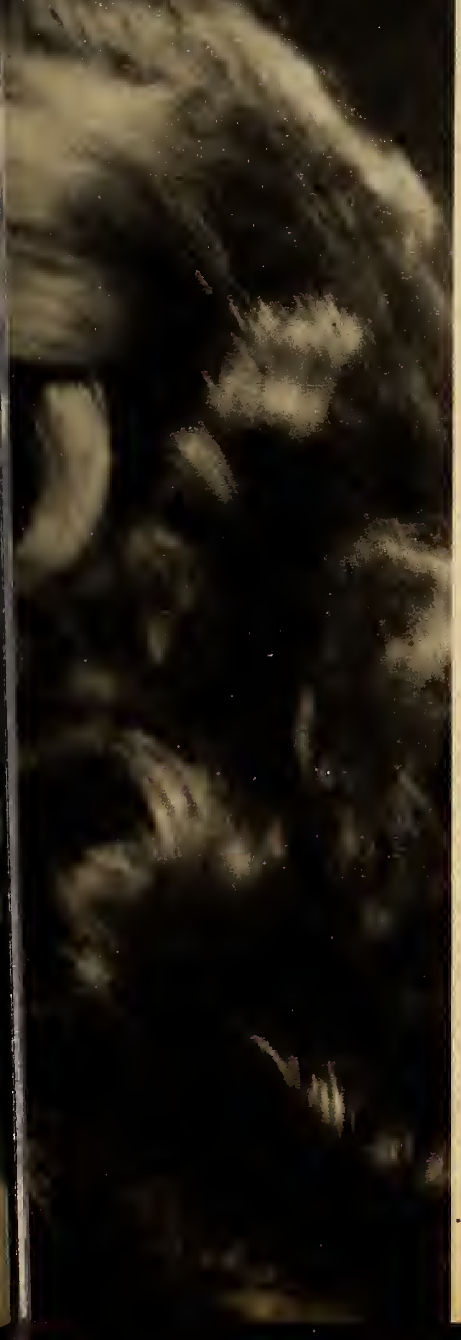
I knew we would marry in due time

But there was no sense rushing.

Arlene is what a man wants in a woman.

I know. I've been lucky with women.



DAHL- that's all!

■ Fernando Lamas has showed up the prophets.

The wise guys who thought they knew his kind kept saying for months, "He'll never marry Arlene Dahl. He's just using her to keep his name alive, to get jobs. He knows that marriage would ruin his reputation as the great Latin lover."

But Fernando did marry Arlene.

He is not the shrewd, conniving, razor-sharp cookie he has been made out to be. He is so forthright that no one could fathom his directness. Therefore he was accused of the most devious motives.

He was blamed for breaking Lana Turner's heart. But Lana almost cost him his career by refusing to star with him in Latin Lovers, a picture written specifically for the two of them.

Worse yet, the Argentine actor was accused of the most ungentlemanly conduct. It was said in confidence (so that most of the world could hear it) that Fernando had "roughed up" Lana because she and Lex Barker had danced too cozily at a Marion Davies party.

Fernando was described as a violent, jealous, uncontrollable hothead.

Then it turned out that Lex Barker was crazy about Lana. He pleaded with the actress all over Europe to marry him and finally broke down her resistance in Italy last year. In retrospect, Fernando's annoyance doesn't seem odd.

Fernando Lamas is experienced in the ways of love. He understands women and he is extremely practical about them. And he understands marriage. He was not in any great hurry to marry Arlene Dahl, but when Arlene's divorce from Lex Barker became final on October 15, she was anxious to get married.

Arlene was waiting for Fernando to propose. She had told practically every interviewer, "Fernando is really the only (Continued on page 84)

No sad songs for Janie Powell now—and maybe never again! She has a brand new life to match her bright new love—and a new way to forget what she calls "the trouble."

BY JOHN MAYNARD

THE BEST

Before love's young dream became a nightmare, Jane and Gene Nelson were confident that their romance was worth the price of two broken homes.

But soon a broken-hearted Janie learned that Gene wanted to return to wife Miriam, was willing to give up Jane in vain attempt to reconcile.

Today, however, Jane is radiant again, secure in the more stable affection of Pat Nerney—who, character-wise, resembles Jane's ex-husband, Geary Steffen, more closely than her lost love, Gene Nelson. By the time you read this, Jane and Pat may be on their honeymoon.

IS AHEAD

Jane Powell has had a rough year. After basking in the sunshine of public approval for most of her life, she found herself groping through one of Hollywood's longest, darkest tunnels.

Now light is showing up ahead. Both Miss Powell and her friends will tell you that. But their separate statements are not quite the same.

The friends—or, as they say in Hollywood, those on top of the situation—have the feeling that Jane's present state of mind, gay and healthy, is neither more nor less than the consequence of her love for a young man named Pat Nerney who sells cars—and Pat Nerney's love for her.

These witnesses are reasonably certain that the two will marry this summer, more than possibly by the time you read this, and live happily either ever after or for a somewhat lesser time.

Jane does not deny this but she does not affirm it. Her public utterances do not include the name Pat Nerney, although it is unlikely it has slipped her mind.

She does confess to dating one man a great deal of the time. She concedes that she cooks for him more nights than several. She even allows that he peddles automobiles. But she doesn't tell his name. Therefore, if you prefer to regard it as Nerney, you do so on your own.

As to the happiness, Miss Powell is considerably more voluble. She attributes it to a kind of re-grouping of inner forces, new values, a new design for living. She does not say her association with Nerney didn't trigger these, but she doesn't say it did.

We come now to the long, dark tunnel through which Miss Powell presumably has been groping. Most people sidetracked into excursions of this sort prefer not to discuss them afterward and Jane Powell is no exception.

"I won't talk about it any more," she told an acquaintance recently. "It's finis. Taboo. And if you want to know something else, I don't think the public's curious about it. I don't think they want to hear about things like that—personal unhappiness and mix up. I'm a fan and I know I don't. I like to hear about the up-beat side. Then again, how intimate can you get?

"I know the goldfish bowl argument—that if you happen to be in the public eye, you owe the public every last scrap of information about yourself. I guess I even once subscribed to it."

There was a phase of Jane's career in which she was less than reticent. There were incidents about which she was less than reticent. In the flush of what she now refers to guardedly as "the trouble," she talked with much more freedom than she does today. But if the broad picture is no longer available from her, it is available elsewhere. There are no cones of silence in Hollywood.

"All right," said Jane. "Get it then. But I don't believe any more in total revelation. There are limits. During the—the trouble—for instance, a friend of mine, a reporter, came to me, and said, 'Break down, Janie. Give me the real, (Continued on page 77)

They're Married!

■ A man cannot sever himself from his past at any given moment. But if he knows he must, he can succeed in finally blocking out of his consciousness the sadness of a loved one's death.

This purge of sorrowful memory came to Fred MacMurray only a few weeks before he married June Haver. Without it, Fred might have postponed indefinitely his marriage to June. For sensitive men have been known to remain in love for countless years with the memories of wives long gone.

It happened to Fred at the old house in Brentwood, the one he and Lillian had bought many years ago from Leland Hayward and Margaret Sullavan. And it happened one evening after Fred had finished a hard day's work on A Woman's World.

He walked into the bedroom where his wife had lain hopelessly ill for so many years. He sat down on the bed, and he tried, really tried, not to think about it. But the whole ebb and flow of their seventeen years together came back to him, the unforgettable years of their youth and struggle and climb, the years when Bobby and Sue were freshly-adopted little children, the years in which they had built and planned and formed their life. And thinking of Lillian, Fred MacMurray began to cry.

It is heart-rending to hear a big man cry. You know his sorrow lies deep, and you must feel for him. That evening when Fred walked out of Lillian's bedroom, his face wet with tears, Cleo Howard, the housekeeper who had been with the MacMurrays for many years, saw him. And she, too, began to cry.

She ran down to the kitchen where Lee Martinez, Fred's other servant, took the girl in her arms and tried to comfort her.

"It's good for Mr. Fred to cry," she explained. "Good for him to cry away all his sadness." Then wisely she pointed out that it does a man no good to love one woman with his mind and another with his heart. "When Mr. Fred marries Miss June, he's got to start all over with a clean slate."

Fred had come to the same conclusion. There could be no going back, and even if he could, he didn't want to.

and Fred MacMurray welcomed said goodbye to the past forever.

He and June must start afresh and give their marriage every chance to succeed. They must never burden it with an anchor from the past.

The next day Fred paid $135,000 for a new Colonial house in Brentwood, a lovely, rambling structure built by Nelson Eddy. Then he ordered that the furnishings from the old house be moved to the new one gradually.

At the same time he, who had formerly gone to very few parties, began making the social rounds with his fiancée. Fred MacMurray, who wouldn't even go to see his own pictures, was now attending previews. And as far as June was concerned —well, she and Fred were inseparable.

Hollywood has rarely seen a mature couple so much in love. June would breakfast with her mother, but she would usually turn up for lunch and dinner with Fred and his two children, Bobby, ten, and Sue, fourteen, both of whom are very fond of her.

Early in June, Fred called his bride-to-be one morning and said, "Know something? I've forgotten all about your engagement ring. Let's go around and pick one up today."

June was so excited she could hardly alk. "Okay," was all she could manage.

Here are June's engagement and wedding rings.

Little did she know that a few days previously Fred had phoned Ruser's jewelry store in Beverly Hills. "I may be coming in shortly for a couple of rings," he said. "I want only the best."

When June and Fred arrived at the hop, June took one look at a single tone 2¾-carat ring in a platinum setting nd gasped. She slipped the ring, size ve, on her finger. It was a perfect fit. he looked up (Continued on page 70)

LIBERACE AT HOME

Mother Liberace drops backstage to add her bit of grooming to her popular son's high polish.

Hollywood hasn't seen an artist like Liberace in years— and maybe there should be a few more like him!

■ Tourists from the outside world who motor into Hollywood no longer ask for the shortest route past the homes of Errol Flynn, Tyrone Power or Clark Gable. Their motto is, "Leave us know where lives Liberace." On a corner, they can spot Liberace's $75,000 mansion by the big white mail box in the shape of a grand piano. In case they should miss, his name is inscribed thereon, and at night the glamorous façade of his home (with gold plates on either side of the door) lights up, spelling his name. Floodlights play a gentle magenta light over the front lawn with its Chinese modern garden blooming out of white crushed rock that looks more like ice cream.

All this causes Hollywood's weary sophisticates to complain about Lib's extreme bad taste. But jaded Hollywood could use characters like this in large doses. In recent years it has become fashionable for popular new favorites, once they begin earning three or four thousand dollars a week, to assume an attitude of utter boredom with the public.

Not so Liberace. If he's at home when people ring his front doorbell, he comes out, greets them cheerfully, signs autographs, poses for pictures. He is so popular that the City of Los Angeles may have to put on special police to handle the Sunday traffic. Celebrities who have lost the knack of showmanship reveal their jealousy with wisecracks about "Lee" Liberace, who says, "The people gave me all this and they have a right to say hello to me if they want to."

Proof of the handsome Milwaukee pianist's great popularity is that 17,000 people packed Madison Square Garden in New York, paying the artist better than a gross $60,000. Of a Sunday Liberace can be heard accompanying the St. Cyril choir on the organ.

Currently, Liberace has completed fifty-four television shows for 1955, and is at work on thirty-nine more, in addition to planning fifty-two new radio programs, completing records of "Oh Promise Me" and "I Love You Truly" for Columbia, and planning other fall releases with his brother George. He still has time to improve his suntan, basking by his backyard pool, built in the shape of a grand piano with a flagstone terrace of black and white "keys." For this enterprise he wears over his muscular torso loud black and white checked trunks.

It is true that Liberace is flamboyant. Insincere he is not. It is not true that he shuns romances. (He has been engaged and disengaged three times waiting for the right girl to come along.) His manager says, "He is the least egotistical artist I have ever known."

The miraculous Mr. Handsome loves show business more than himself, which is a unique attitude. And if there were more like him Hollywood might gain back some of the glamour which rubbed off when it became "the thing" for stars to consider themselves above the public, by whose happy and unreasoning affection they all live and prosper.

there is nothing like a dame

"Thanks for stopping in," she said, "thanks a lot."

Harry James was having his two P.M. breakfast in the kitchen. "You know, Harry," Betty said, "I think it's time we stopped living like a couple of movie stars. It's not that I mind meeting the public, but I'm afraid it disturbs your sleep. Besides, only ten miles away is Griffith Park, than which there is none larger, and they are much better equipped to handle the tourist trade."

THIS MAY seem to be entirely unbelievable. But there are other stories that could be told—and Betty wouldn't tell them—which are far less charming. Mr. and Mrs. James gradually found themselves fed up. Unlike most Hollywood homes, their graceful and spectacular Doheny Road mansion, a stone's throw from the Sunset strip, was not surrounded by a high wall. It was as public as U. S. Highway 66. Having cost upwards of $150,000 to rebuild, it could best be afforded by a retired steel magnate.

"You might say that I've had it," Betty told Harry.

There is more to the sudden purchase of a new home by Betty and Harry than meets the eye. Shortly after they gave out the news that their Beverly Hills establishment was going up for sale, an eastern columnist printed an item to the effect that the Jameses had just enjoyed one terrific battle and suggested that this one meant the beginning of the end. This set off a chain reaction, with other reporters repeating the story.

One columnist finally got Betty on the phone around midnight. "What's this about you and Harry breaking up?"

"Glad you asked," Betty replied. "No truth to it."

"But you did have a fight?"

Betty laughed. "You mean this morning or this afternoon?"

"Gosh, is it that bad?"

"Of course not," Betty said. "I can't help being a little facetious. I'm just leveling with you. As I've told you before, we have our arguments. Thank heaven we do. If we didn't we'd be a mighty abnormal couple. The way I feel is that any member of the press has a right to ask any one who lives in the limelight a question like this. I know there's no offensive personal curiosity involved. It's just your job."

NOW, ABOUT that argument: this is what it turned out to be, just for the record. Seems that the James family has two canine members. Punky the poodle is crowding fifteen years of age. Bugle the beagle is a little more than one year old. They hate each other. To make it worse, Bugle has a natural affinity for Harry and thinks that so long as Mr. James is boss of the establishment, he is the top man in the dog department. Even the fact that the James home is about the size of the Yankee Stadium, making it possible for the dogs to have separate quarters, doesn't settle the matter. It turned out that if Punky the poodle joined Betty and Harry in the livingroom, Bugle the beagle's nose got out of joint for days.

So they worked out a compromise. After one big brawl Bugle was sent out to the Double EE ranch in the valley to learn some manners. This was fine for Bugle, because (honest to Pete) there is a swimming pool for dogs who like that sort of exercise, and during the holidays they even have a Christmas tree on which hangs presents for each of the pups. Every now and then Betty, Harry and the kids take a run out to see Bugle, and they take Punky along to see if they'll make up. They never do.

Betty isn't quite sure, but during the couple of days recently during which Mr. and Mrs. James weren't speaking much to each other, the irritation began because Harry decided after dinner one night that he ought to take a run out to the Double EE and take Bugle out for a short ride. He wanted Betty to go along, and they'd stop by a drive-in restaurant in order to buy Bugle a meatball sandwich which he dearly loves.

Betty wouldn't go, indicating how completely unreasonable a wife can be. Her attitude was you can go too far pampering a dog. "Are you kidding?" Harry wanted to know. "How about the way you are always pumpering Panky?" Betty thought that was pretty funny, so she laughed when she shouldn't have.

Anyway, that's our story.

BETTY AND HARRY JAMES will have their little arguments. Every now and then they will be reported. But, they'll stay married for the sake of their children, Victoria, age ten, and Jessica, age three; also for the sake of their mutual custody of a string of horses known as Laughing Louie, Big Noise, James Session, Count Cool (named after a trumpet player), Piperess, Fly Quest and four weanlings, still to be named. There is another solid reason Betty and Harry will never head for the divorce courts, and it's not that their personal and livestock family is too big ever to work out the custody problem. It's that they love each other very much.

Harry James is still as gone on Betty Grable as the day he married her over eleven years ago. Pressed for the reason why, he could refuse to answer on the grounds that any man married to Betty would obviously be in love with her. Then he'd probably relate a story credited to him some time back about the time a man first took a look at what is known as a female. He examined her with dubious eye and said, "It's beautiful, but it will never work." Well, Betty has worked for twenty-one years. And for eleven years, she has worked not only at show business but at her marriage. She has done a standout job, and so has Harry. He could have packed the trumpet away in moth balls, Betty could have handed in her make-up kit and they both could have retired with the fortune they had melted together along with their hearts.

They kept on working because they both love show business. Harry likes to be a big wheel band man and Betty loves being a movie star.

"It's a wonderful life," she says. And therein lies the difference between Betty Grable and nine tenths of her glamorous sister stars. Most of them, once they attain riches and stardom, profess to be bored by the whole thing. They can no longer recall the names of those who helped boost them along when they started. Betty can. So she has a personal following of loyal friends no other star can match.

Someone was talking to Betty about how simply awful it is that young girls have to do such silly things to become famous in pictures. And how girls with practically no talent become famous over night. "For instance, that Marilyn Monroe calendar, and all those pin-up pictures of you that are floating around. I'll bet you're sorry you ever climbed into a bathing suit."

"Stop right there," Betty retorted. "I don't work for 20th Century-Fox any more, but no one can trap me into saying I don't like Marilyn Monroe or that I was ever jealous of her, because it simply isn't true. I know Marilyn too well not to like her. She's a great girl, a real down to earth type. Now she's settling down as a fine actress and I'm happy for her.

TV's Wally Sherwin, when his studio audience didn't respond as he desired, told them: "Thank you. You've been a swell bunch of seats."

Sidney Skolsky in The New York Post

"As for pin-up pictures, don't ever talk to me about 'cheap publicity.' How I hate that phrase, and actresses who complain about it are just plain phony. Why, almost none of us would have what we have today if it weren't for an army of hard-working publicity men and camera men who dream up those ideas. I certainly wouldn't be anywhere near my happy station in life if it weren't for pin-up art.

"I'll never forget the old days when I'd go into the still gallery at eight A.M. and not be out until seven. Nothing but 'leg art.' Easter, I popped out of the newspapers from fancy shells, or with my bottom perched on a big colored egg. Thanksgiving, I waved an ax at prop turkeys—in a bathing suit, naturally. Doesn't everybody? Christmas, I was stuffed into long silk stockings and the top half of a Santa Claus outfit. Silly it was, maybe, but that started me on the way up the ladder. I could never take exception to it!"

HAVING DELIVERED herself of this pertinent interview on the set of her Columbia picture, Three For The Show, Betty turned her back on the offending questioner. Back in her dressingroom, she got to thinking about the one picture that had made her Hollywood's all time Pin-Up Champion.

Anyway, Betty picked up the telephone and called the publicity department.

"I have an idea," she began.

So when the picture was finished, Betty showed up early one morning in the still gallery for a conference with veteran photographer Charlie Rhodes. He had a copy of the famous Grable pin-up. He put it up beside his camera, Betty went into her dressingroom and stepped out in a sleek yellow bathing suit. Charlie whistled. Then he went to work with the notable result on page 34.

Afterward, someone looked at the proofs and said to Charlie, "I don't believe it! Why, Betty is thirty-eight years old!"

"You're kidding," Charlie replied. "Why, this dame has the figure of a well-stacked teen-ager. Look! Not one of these pictures has been retouched. But don't give me any credit—I just borrowed the original pose and shot what was in front of the camera."

"I wish some day a magazine would promise to print a complete list of all the people I know who have helped me," Betty said, remembering the day she posed for the famous photo. "The trouble is it would

ANYWHERE THEY WANDER . . .

. . . any show they do, Peter Lind Hayes and Mary Healy will stick together!

Mary joined Pete's nightclub act in 1945. "All she did," he says, "was bow and bow!"

■ When Peter Lind Hayes is called upon to perform without his pretty wife, Mary Healy, he experiences a sense of loss he can only compare to losing a leg. "I've become so used to having Mary there beside me always ready with the right words at the right time," he says, "that when she isn't, I feel I'm toppling over."

Mary shares this feeling, and claims that when they are working together onstage, she and Pete unconsciously lean toward one another. It's been like that ever since they eloped to Arizona on December 19, 1940.

"Even when we argue, which is seldom," says Pete, "I always know what Mary's next line will be."

This fall Pete and Mary will begin a new phase in their career together. Signed by CBS Radio and CBS Television to an exclusive long-term contract, they have more than half a dozen top guest spots scheduled. Pete will also be Arthur Godfrey's regular substitute when the redhead gets grounded in Florida. This spring they began a weekly CBS radio show (Saturdays) which will soon have a TV version. 1954 will be a big year.

There have been a lot of big years since Pete and Mary met in 1939. Mary was a 20th Century-Fox glamour doll then, and Pete was under contract to Paramount. "We thought it was all set," says Pete. "We'd just stick around Hollywood, grow a few years older, and end up as movie stars with twin Cadillacs and an inlaid swimming pool."

But the war fixed that. Pete went to the Pacific with the Army Air Corps and played before more than 1,000,000 G.I.s while Mary played leads in three Broadway shows.

Pete came home from the Pacific, polished up his act and debuted at the Copacabana in New York. The audiences laughed the coconuts out of the fake palm trees and Pete signed a nice, fat contract with Universal-International and went west.

Hollywood was nothing new to Mr. and Mrs. Hayes. Pete had made his film debut at eighteen and had been comedian Ted Healy's stand-in for nearly three years. At his mother's nightclub, the Grace Hayes Lodge, he had met everyone in films. Bing Crosby occasionally lost money at golf to him. That sort of thing.

Mary and Pete bought a home and furniture, and settled down to live on the scale of the future predicted by Pete's studio.

But although his four or five pictures were good, especially one called Mr. Peabody And The Mermaid, critics said they were a bit too sophisticated. So Pete tried radio—a comedy show with Dinah Shore that started about the time radio was gasping for breath. All of a sudden, Hollywood got sort of quiet for Pete.

At this point Mary entered the act and everything looked up. They made a sensational nightclub tour across the country and ended up in New York just as television began its first boom. That winter they played every important TV guest spot and ended up with a CBS Television show of their own—Star Of The Family. They have been easterners ever since.

Three years ago, Pete and Mary bought a home in New Rochelle, New York, and moved in with their children, Peter Michael and Cathy Lynn. They still own their home out in Hollywood, but they don't miss it any more. Someday they may want to go back to the west. But not now, while their future in TV looks so bright. They don't know exactly what's in store for them, but one thing is certain.

"Wherever we go, whatever we do," says Pete, "it will be together."

take about ten pages in small type. I do hope, though, to get one in right now. That's Frank Powolny, the head portrait cameraman at 20th Century-Fox. He'll tell you it was nothing. That I just happened to stand in front of the camera. But it wasn't easy, even if it was an accident.

"We were making a picture called Sweet Rosie O'Grady at the time, and in one scene an artist was to draw me for a cover on Police Gazette. He wanted the measurements and the figure just right, so I climbed into the tight bathing suit and posed for a bunch of pictures. Frank, as usual, wasn't quite satisfied. Then he got the idea for the pose with me looking back over my shoulder. It never was really intended for publication, but when the boys in the publicity department saw it they had a few thousand prints made. Thanks to the service men overseas it turned out to be a pin-up sensation and it did a lot for me. But back of the picture was Mr. Powolny and his camera genius."

THAT WAS MORE than twelve years ago. Sadly, Betty has no secret to divulge to girls everywhere on how to keep a figure perfect for more than a decade. She says, "I watch what I eat sometimes, mostly a couple of weeks before I start a picture. I don't have any set exercises. I'm just real lucky, because the minute I start to work the extra pounds come off. I swim a lot, but not with the figure problem in mind. It's just that I love swimming."

That's another thing. One of these days the two little James girls are going to be bathing suit wows in their own rights. Victoria and Jessica go to Westlake School for Girls, along with Shirley Temple's daughter. Susan takes swimming lessons with them and sometimes is dropped by to swim with the James sisters. "I'm looking forward someday to being Grandma Grable," Betty says. "In the meantime, they've built a pool for us at our new house. I took a friend by to look at the place the other day and she looked into the empty pool which is twelve feet deep at one end and not very shallow anywhere. 'Goodness!' she yelped, 'You're not going to allow your kids to swim in that!'

"Sure I am. The youngsters aren't a pair of Esther Williamses, but they're good."

The new home of the James family is quite a contrast to the one in which they've been living for the last five years. It's Hawaiian modern, a style Betty loves. It's an eight-room house that could be duplicated in most communities for around $35,000, and it's perched on a hill, looking down toward Beverly Hills. Unfortunately for the visiting tourists, there'll be no more picnics on the front lawn. Not that Betty and Harry want to be inhospitable. They just want a little more privacy, which is now provided by an electric gate which only opens on signal.

THE PIN-UP QUEEN of Hollywood hasn't abdicated. "People keep asking me about my next picture. I think Three For The Show is a good one. I don't have another one right now, but don't think I haven't had offers, because I have. Some from television. Like the one from Colgate—oh my! But my feeling right now is, why should I? I know when the time is ripe whether it's with Harry or alone there'll be a lot of people who'll help make it good. Right now I don't want to rush into that. What a magnificent egg you could lay on TV!

"I know I'm a bit of a disappointment when it comes to living up to the gossip stories that circulate every now and then, but honest—I'm happy, and so are Harry and the children. I'm just a dame who never had it so good!"

Yes, there's nothing like a dame—and nothing approaching the dame named Betty Grable! END

the private world of bill holden

"Must be more than 200 cans in that barrel," one of them said, with proper awe.

"Yeah," said the other. "And all this time I'm thinking those Holdens are a nice moderate family."

Well, the garbage men were right the first time. The Holdens are nice and they are moderate.

You wouldn't be able to distinguish their home from any of the other nice, unpretentious homes on the street—except for the white Cadillac in the driveway and the extra-large pool.

The Bill Holden swimming pool in North Hollywood is something of a community project. Bill has two boys and a girl who are always inviting the neighborhood gang in for a dip. That's fine with Bill as long as he or his lovely wife, Ardis, is around to act as lifeguard.

A few Saturdays ago Bill volunteered for lifeguard duty. He had an appointment later in the afternoon so he didn't bother to put on swimming trunks. He just sat on the sidelines watching the kids enjoy themselves, once in a while calling out a word of instruction.

When it was West's turn to dive—West is Peter Westfield Holden, age ten—he announced ceremoniously that he was going to try a jackknife dive.

The husky little boy leaped off the board with a good spring. He cut the water so cleanly it hardly rippled. Bill Holden watched his son with pride. A few years back, before they had put in the pool, West didn't know how to dog-paddle. Now he was diving like a junior champion.

Suddenly Bill realized that West hadn't come up for air. The other boys seemed to be watching the water anxiously.

Bill didn't wait. He dived in, clothes and all. As he plunged to the bottom desperately searching for his son, he caught sight of West grinning and holding on to the drain. West pushed himself up to the surface and scampered out of the pool.

The act was a plot to get Bill into the pool with his clothes on.

Bill came up mad and sputtering.

"Don't you ever do that again," he warned angrily, trying to shake the water out of his watch. Quickly, the humor of his position dawned on him. And he laughed as loudly as the boys who went around North Hollywood for weeks telling about the "old gag Bill Holden fell for."

Then one Sunday afternoon the senior Holdens had to go to a cocktail party. Bill called Scott in and placed him in charge of the yard.

"No one must use the pool," Bill cautioned, "because Mother and I won't be here to watch you."

"What else is there to do?" Scott and West asked.

"There's plenty else to do," their father asserted. "Just remember. I'm putting you in charge of the yard. No swimming."

A few hours later Bill and Ardis returned home to an ominous silence.

"Scott," Ardis Holden called out. "West! Where is everyone?"

Hannah Reeves, the Holdens' reliable housekeeper came running out of the kitchen, tears streaming down her cheeks.

"Hannah!" Bill demanded. "Where are the boys?"

"Mr. West is in his room and Mr. Scott is in the hospital, I think," Hannah answered.

Ardis was horrified. "What do you mean, you think Scott's in the hospital? What's happened?"

"Well, you told the boys not to go in the pool," Hannah explained, looking at Bill, "and they didn't. Instead Mr. Scott decided to walk on the brick wall. He fell and broke his arm. Mr. Lerner from next door took him to the emergency hospital."

Ardis turned to her husband. "Oh, Bill," she sobbed. "Why didn't you just tell them to go ahead and swim?"

Bill threw out his arms and turned his face skyward in the traditional stance of the martyr.

"I," he said, "am blamed for everything."

You can see that Bill Holden's family life is just about typical of upper middle class life in America.

Of course the Holdens have more money than most people. But the windfall is relatively recent. It hasn't been so long since Bill was making fifty dollars a week at Paramount.

There is nothing ostentatious about the Holdens. Their way of living is simple.

An actor's house is probably more indicative of his values than any other tangible thing. The Holden house is a solid, unpretentious stucco and stone job designed for growing children and harried parents. It is located in North Hollywood which is not so fashionable as Beverly Hills, Bel Air, Holmby Hills or Brentwood. That doesn't disturb handsome Bill.

"When Ardis and I were first married," Bill explains, "we bought a little six-room house. It was neat, cheap and very comfortable. But our family increased." In addition to Dee-dee (Ardis' daughter Virginia by a previous marriage) there were two sons, Scott and West, born during World War II.

"With the passing of every week," Bill continued, "the kids seemed to grow bigger and bigger. Soon it became a question of getting a bigger house or suffering a nervous breakdown."

"You can say that again," Ardis interjected. "We were pretty close to living on top of each other. So Bill and I got up one morning and decided that the next thing on the agenda was house-shopping.

"Well, we started looking and it was quite a job. We didn't want to get in too deep, financially speaking, and yet we needed a spacious place.

"Most of the homes we looked at lacked something or other—closet space, yard space—or the rooms were too small. Bill just can't abide small or low-ceilinged rooms. He likes them big and open."

It wasn't until they walked into the home of Leon Errol, the famous stage and screen comedian, that Bill and Ardis felt they'd found the place. This two-story English country house on a quiet dead-end street in a family neighborhood fulfilled their every need.

Upstairs are three complete bedroom suites. The largest went to the boys. Deedee has her own bedroom and bath, and Bill and Ardis took the end rooms so that they might convert a sunporch into a larger dressingroom for Bill.

Downstairs there's a large, folksy livingroom and a smaller den. The Holdens spend most of their evenings in the den. As Hollywood stars go, they are not particularly social.

"Frankly," Bill confesses, "we're not members of the Hollywood party set. I don't see much point to those big wingdings filled with noise and smoke. As far as I can see, they're run on the basis of taking your wife and losing her for the evening. In the meantime you shout across the table to strangers. That's not for me.

"In five years Ardis and I have gone to one première and the Academy Award presentations this past March." (Bill won an Oscar for his performance in Stalag 17.)

Bill Holden loves people but not publicity, and he refuses to patronize nightclubs and stylish restaurants just to have his picture taken. In the last three years he has starred in ten major films. That makes him Hollywood's busiest actor.

"At the end of a day," Ardis explains, "he's really beat. He gets home after seven, usually, and then he freshens up. I guess we eat later than most families do.

"When dinner's over Bill likes to sink into his favorite leather chair. It's in the den beside the fireplace. He turns on a background of recorded music and we talk. He tells me about the day's shooting and all the crazy incidents that happen at the studio. I bring him up to date on the mail and the bills and what's new in the life of two Cub Scouts."

A unique feature of the Holden house is a picture-gallery bar which adjoins the den. This was one of the delightful extras that first caught Bill's eye. The bar used to be lined with an amusing collection of Leon Errol photos. Now, some eight years later, two sides of the room boast Holden shots, but there are still dozens of frames left to be filled.

"As a matter of fact," Ardis says, "I'm seriously considering painting over the walls and getting a simple scrapbook for our pictures. The trouble with this gallery is that you've got to get pictures the right sizes to fit the various frames. Then the glass comes out and has to be held in place while the frames get nailed back.

"Don't quote me, but Bill's not very handy and lots of times he hammers his thumbs and breaks the glass and gets thoroughly aggravated."

Another distinctive part of the Holden house is the outside stairway that leads to the second floor. When the real estate agent was showing Bill the house for the first time she pulled the kind of boner that could have cost her a sale.

"Just think, Mr. Holden," she suggested, "when you have an early-morning call you can tiptoe out of the house without disturbing a single soul. And sometimes," she added coyly, "you can slip in without anyone's seeing you."

Bill shook his head violently. "There'll be no tiptoeing in this house, in or out. Do you understand?"

The agent was silenced and Ardis started to giggle.

"If a man gets up early and goes to work," Bill carried on, "and I'm that man, then I want the rest of the family to know about it. I want 'em to know that I'm working long and hard for a living."

Bill meant that. He's an early riser who sings in the shower and stomps down to breakfast. He doesn't like to eat alone.

Since they bought their house the Holdens haven't made any basic changes. They have added a pool on the extra lot that adjoined their property and recently Bill installed a high fidelity music system. But that's about all. The rooms were furnished slowly.

"We've tried to stay with the 18th Century English," Ardis says, "because it's informal and it's solidly built. All but two of our wooden pieces in the livingroom are genuine antiques so you can see they've passed the test of time. There's not a table that will suffer if you put your feet on it. Most of them came out of English taverns. There's really nothing the boys can break or destroy—no fragile bric-a-brac, no delicate fabrics."

Bill Holden maintains the strong conviction that no dinner party should include more than eight people—if you really want to enjoy your guests. With this thought firmly in mind, their decorator imported an oak diningroom table from England and specified "only eight chairs."

Asked what one thing he likes best about his home, Bill had a funny answer. "Sunday afternoon," he said. And what he enjoys about Sunday at home, oddly enough, is what is known in the Army as "policing the area." This is a general clean-up in which the boys work with Bill, sweeping out the garage, hosing down the walls, gathering up old magazines and empty bottles—and, on occasion, beer cans. When the job is done, they all go for a swim.

It may not sound to you like a movie star at play, but in the private world of Bill Holden the quiet family life is the good life. END

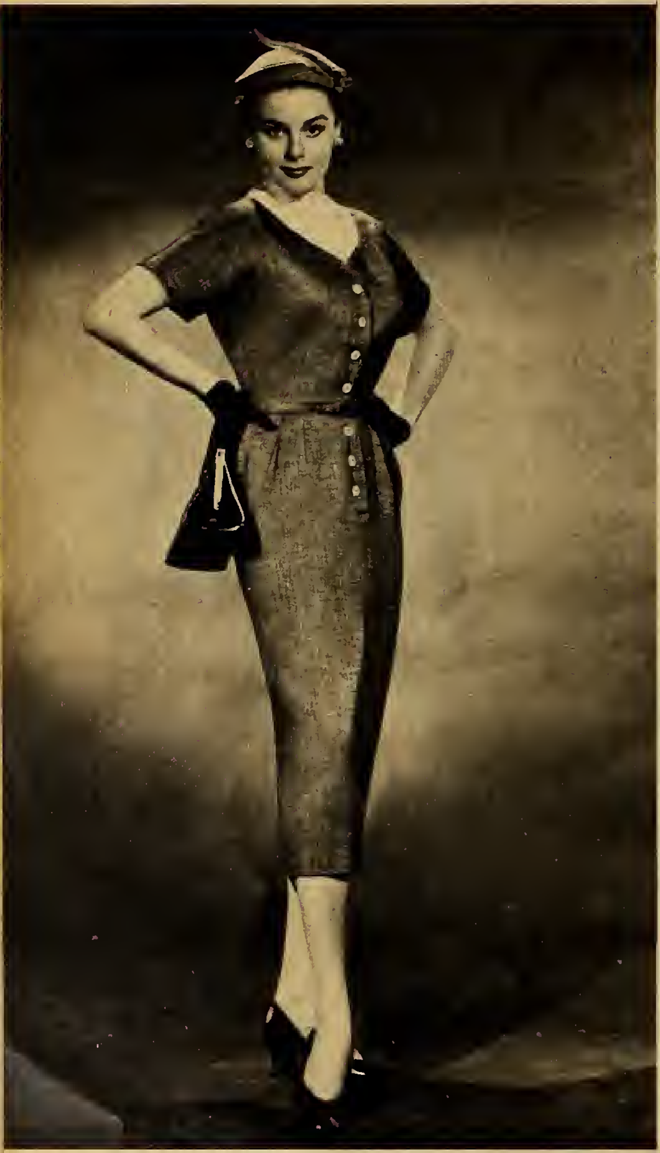
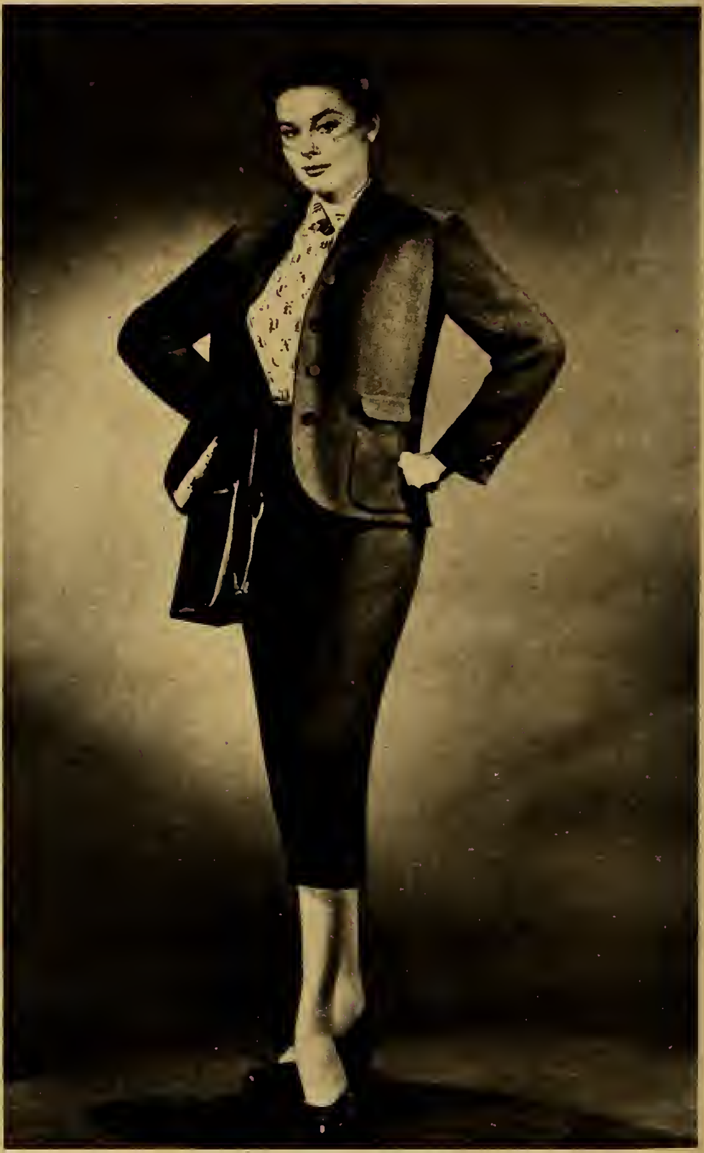
glamour for the tall girl





Photos by John Engstead

■ If you are over five feet, seven, tall girl fashions are for you! Where to buy them? In Over 5′ 7″ shops! Elaine Stewart, an MGM glamour girl, poses in two favorite tall girl styles. The dress of rayon and acetate has white contrast buttons and detachable rayon and cotton bib—short sleeves, sheath skirt. Black or navy with white pin check. 10 to 20. About $12.95. The tall girl's pet is the box jacket wool suit. The jacket features patch pockets with flaps—the lining is in the same fabric as the printed cotton blouse. Oxford grey, Oxford brown or Oxford blue. The blouse fabric has a gay colored geometric print on a beige background. 10 to 20. Ensemble, about $35. In Over 5′ 7″ shops in Lane Bryant stores (as well as other shops listed on page 68). Elaine stars in Walter Wanger's CinemaScope film, The Adventures Of Hajji Baba, a 20th Century-Fox release.

marilyn talks about joe

(Continued from page 28) were married. And we expect to continue them in the same way. But with one big difference. If we can help it, and we can, we'll never let our work separate us. It's no fun to be married and parted all the time."

This is why Joe DiMaggio told his TV sponsors in New York that he would not renew his contract with them. "It meant," said Marilyn, "that Joe would be away for weeks at a time. And he had to travel backwards and forwards and every which way for us to be together. I was always making a picture and I couldn't leave Hollywood. We decided that when we married Joe would work from San Francisco or Hollywood so we never would be away from each other by more than an hour's plane trip."

I HAD HEARD from a usually reliable source that the famous Yankee ballplayer was so infatuated with his wife that he was giving up his own line of work to be a co-producer in the pictures Marilyn plans to make independently (allowed in her new contract, eventually).

There was another story that Joe was planning to turn actor. When I asked about it, Marilyn yelled, "God forbid! I couldn't take that. And I'm sure he doesn't want to be an actor. I hope not, anyway. And as far as I know, he wouldn't want to be a producer. Of course he could do anything he wanted to do. He's the most intelligent man I ever met in my life. And if he were an actor, he'd be good. But he loves his own profession. I just can't see him in mine."

. . . Leo Guild reports that Frank Sinatra, who wears a gun in his picture, Suddenly, broke up the crowd by saying: "Fellows, get me a gun for my other side. I'm beginning to tilt!"

Earl Wilson in
The New York Post

"How about the previews and parties, now that you're married?" I asked Mrs. Joe. To my knowledge (and Marilyn confirmed it) Joe, who is shy and unhappy outside his own crowd, has never escorted the blonde he loves to any party, nightclub or première. Rumors have a way of starting when a star attends functions without her husband. "If you won an Academy Award or something like that, wouldn't you like to go with Joe?" I wondered.

"It wouldn't matter what I won or whether I'd want him to come with me or not. He never would," Marilyn replied. "At least Joe's very consistent," she continued. "He hates premières and parties. So do I. But it's my business to go. It makes no difference that we're married. Joe has always been like this. I knew what he was like before we married. He wouldn't come then, and I don't think it's fair to him to try to change him now. I married him for what he was when I fell in love with him."

I think she has something. How many women fall in love with a man because of what he is, then immediately after the wedding try to make him over into their preconceived dreams of what a husband should be. But not our Marilyn. She doesn't want Joe to change her, so why should she change him?

YET THE FACT that Marilyn will always have to attend certain "career must" functions, and apparently without Joe, will present some possibly irritating situations. "Because," Marilyn told me, "Joe doesn't mind my (Continued on page 69)

(Continued from page 67) working in the day time. But he wants me home at night." I think that if the situation ever became really difficult, Joe would swallow his antipathy to Marilyn's world. Or Marilyn would sacrifice her movie stardom. I believe her when she says Joe will always come first. And I believe they are going to stay married. Forever? That's a long word. But, yes, forever. They're so intelligent about each other. Especially Marilyn about Joe.

"I'm not too interested in baseball," she told me. "I've been around Joe long enough to pick up a few rules and expressions. But I wouldn't break my neck to go to a game with him. I'm not crazy about watching television either. But Joe loves it. That's his idea of real fun, staying home and watching television. Don't tell anyone, but I don't care for watching television too much. I like to read and I have to study my scripts."

A WIRE STORY from Korea reported that Marilyn had announced that she and Joe wanted to have six children. "That isn't true," she told me candidly. "It's too many. Joe already has a child (with his first wife, Dorothy Arnold). Of course I'd like to have a baby with Joe very much. Maybe two. But when you have children you must give them a great deal of your time. With my own unhappy childhood, I know this too well. Joe comes from a big family and they're all so devoted to each other. Right now our work is important to us both, and it wouldn't be fair to raise a big family. But whatever Joe wants will be all right with me."

"How does Joe feel about the calendar?" I asked. And perhaps I shouldn't have asked. Because even though Marilyn smiled, she said quietly, "Will you please pretend you didn't ask me that question?" So I assume that Joe isn't crazy about the calendar. And you can't blame him. But it never has visibly embarrassed Marilyn, even though she is one of the few people in the world who does not own a copy.

"If I had one," she told me with a grin, "I'd save it for my grandchildren." She meant it seriously and I knew what she meant. It's the most beautiful body ever exposed to the not-so-casual scrutiny of the world, including Manet's Olympia, Goya's Duchess of Alba, all of Renoir's nudes put together. And Venus de Milo.

"You mean that when you're an old woman, you'd like your grandchildren to know what you looked like once upon a time, and they'd be proud of such a body." She flashed me a thoughtful look and said, "You really do understand, don't you?" Understand! All I know is I'd give my eye teeth to have a figure like the Monroe's.

"People are sometimes so embarrassed for me about the calendar," she continued. "In Korea, for instance. I arrived at one place and they weren't expecting me. In the middle of the hall, there was a huge blow-up of the calendar. There was complete silence when I came in, and everyone seemed to be looking down. Well, I couldn't hide my head in the sand. I had posed for it. So I went to the mike and told them all, 'Gentlemen, I'm deeply honored that you have put my picture in the place of honor.' Everyone laughed and we were all friends. But you know, Sheilah, I really was honored." Today, I'm sure that Marilyn would give ten years of her life not to have posed, but she has never been a girl to cry over the past or even look forward to the future too much. This so-called dumb blonde has learned the happy knack of living in the present.

She was reading my thoughts. "I've often been asked," she revealed, "does it bother you when someone refers to you as a dumb blonde? It never has, Sheilah. You see, I've always known I wasn't. Things go on in my mind that no one knows about. I've always figured things out and done them according to plan. Oh no, I'm not calculating or tricky. But I know what I want." And she certainly knows how to get it.

MARILYN INSISTS to this day that her refusal to do Pink Tights had nothing to do with wanting a new contract. It was the story she didn't like. At the time, the hottest property in Hollywood was earning $750 a week. It could have jumped to $1,250, but on advice of agents she didn't accept. When she went on strike, Darryl Zanuck who has never professed to like Marilyn (she has kept him waiting too many times) was ready to forgive her any time. But she took her time, made the boss sweat it out, even after he signed Sheree North to take her place. Marilyn knew he was bluffing. She didn't have to be told that no one can take her place. Today she is paid by the picture—$100,000 each, and she'll do at least two a year.

She was just as unhurried and determined about Mr. DiMaggio. "When I started going with Joe, people said, 'Oh, you shouldn't get married.' That my career would be ruined and my appeal would be all gone. They said all men liked to dream they had a chance with me. All that so-called friendly advice. But when I went to Korea it didn't make any difference. No one asked me there if I felt different because I was married. And they didn't care. All they knew was that I was there and they were happy about it. And I'm so happy I went. All those men—it was the biggest thrill of my life. They didn't care if I was hot or cold, married or single—just so long as they could see me."

According to studio count, Marilyn's fan mail has not decreased since her marriage to Joe. But I remember passing a shop window in Hollywood just after the sudden San Francisco wedding of Joe and Marilyn, and the famous calendar had a line through the price of $1.50, and underneath, "$1—due to marriage." And a friend of mine in the locker room at UCLA reported a general tearing down of her pin-up pictures. But I don't think marriage with Joe will hurt Marilyn's career. She never professed to be a saint when she was single. There's no real difference now. Marriage merely gave her a partner as glamorous as she is—but in the world of sports. And fans who did not care for her before, now love her because DiMaggio is her husband. Ask any small boy.

"We're going to build our own house in Hollywood," Marilyn told me happily. "Nothing large or flashy. Neither of us wants the bother of a huge home." So I asked what kind of home. "Maybe a two-bedroom house somewhere in Beverly or Brentwood. Not in the valley. We looked there and it's too hot. We'll probably have a pool, but that's not essential. I'm not very much the outdoor type. But maybe Joe's son would like to swim. How will I furnish it? I know how I won't. I hate early American. Let's say modern rustic. I don't really care what, as long as it's warm and cozy." Meanwhile Joe and Marilyn have rented decorator Barbara Barondess McClean's fancy two-bedroom-with-pool home in Palm Drive. And if you want to know which house it is, look for two new Cadillacs, one all black (Marilyn's) and one pale blue (Joe's).

"What about the report that you and Joe bought a house in an expensive San Francisco suburb?" I asked Mrs. Joe. "Honestly," she exclaimed, "there've been more wrong stories about us than anyone else. Joe owns the family house in San Francisco. He bought it for his parents, but now they have both passed away. And we live in the house when we are there. That's where we'll live mostly, when we don't have to work in Hollywood."

You'd be stretching a point if you called Marilyn the domestic type. But she can cook. "Nothing fancy though. But Joe is terrific." He learned in his father's restaurant, which is now operated by his brother. "He's teaching me to make spaghetti the way he likes it," said Marilyn. Joe is teaching his beautiful bride something else—and that's even better for a busy reporter. Marilyn was actually on time for our lunch. In fact, she was waiting for me! For a girl who took seven hours to prepare for the Millionaire première, it's a revolution.

Fortieth Infantry Division in Korea captioned its publication photo of Marilyn thusly: "If You Don't Know Her Name, Soldier, Lie Down—You're Dead."

Mike Connolly in The Hollywood Reporter

But more important than anything, Marilyn's marriage is giving her emotional security. She's still keyed up before the camera. This makes her break out in a rash sometimes. But her contentment shines clear through her lovely blue eyes. She's singing, "I've got my man." And she doesn't ask for very much more. END

"Another ring comes with this," Ruser offered. Then he showed the marriage ring, a band of five round diamonds. "I know," he said, "that there is some significance in the number, five, to you and Fred." Fred and June had first met or had first started going around together last November 5.

In the shop, the lovers kissed and the next day the engagement was formally announced.

A reporter asked Fred, "What kind of ring?"

"Diamond."

"How many carats?" Fred was asked.

He said he didn't know."

"If it's not too personal how much did it set you back?"

"They haven't sent the bill yet."

Mr. Ruser said later the rings were worth approximately $10,000.

A week after June was given her rings, she returned to Ruser's jewelry shop and ordered a house gift for Fred—a gold-plated key to the front door. On the key there is engraved a gnarled oak tree and on the oak tree the figure of a very small heart and the legend, "J. H. loves F. M."

Last week Fred gave June an identical key. Hers says, "F. M. loves J. H."

"When are you and Miss Haver getting married?" the reporter persisted.

"Pretty soon," Fred smiled.

"Church or civil ceremony?"

"Civil."

"Where?"

"I don't know," Fred answered, "and even if I did I wouldn't tell you. I was talking about this with June last night. 'I wish I had a yacht and a private plane like Bob Taylor,' I said. 'Then we could do it very quietly.'" Actually, they were married at Ojai Valley Inn, June 28.

Just why Fred and June were so secretive about their marriage no one knows. Fred has always been chary of private-life publicity. For years he paid a press agent to keep newspaper people away from him. He likes reporters as people but not as interviewers.

June, on the other hand, has always been accessible to the press, but when she started going with Fred, she, too, clammed up, at least about Fred.

When Mrs. Carl Johnston, a friend of the family from Rock Island, Illinois, had a shower for June on her twenty-eighth birthday, the little actress finally conceded, "Fred and I have known for months that we'd get married."

At the shower were Gail Patrick, Claire Trevor, Mary Cummings, Fred's mother, Mrs. Melita MacMurray, and his aunt, Mrs. Hazel Martin. "They gave me enough lingerie to last a lifetime."

A week later, Mrs. Bo Roos gave another shower for June. Result: more lingerie. Mrs. Roos is the wife of Fred's business manager. Bo has managed June's money, too. In fact, June has never made a sizable investment without consulting Bo Roos.

Not that she needs her own money. MacMurray is wealthy in his own right. Early in 1940 Bo Roos insisted that he invest his surplus funds in Los Angeles real estate, and as a result Fred's holdings have appreciated tremendously. Undoubtedly, he is a millionaire. But June Haver has no intention of abandoning her career.

"There's a very good chance," she said, "that I may do a musical with Gene Kelly later in the year. I'm also interested in making some recordings for children.

Whatever I do, I certainly want to stay close to Fred. That's why I didn't do Catch A Thief with Cary Grant. I would have had to go all the way to Cannes."

Asked if she and Fred considered the South American trip a pre-honeymoon trip, June answered, "It was wonderful fun meeting all those movie fans in Brazil and Peru and the other countries. Fred and I would be walking along a street and suddenly a little girl would come up to me and press a rosary into my hand and I'd look around and she'd be gone.

"Irene Dunne and Joan Fontaine went to several South American schools with me, and it was really an educational trip."

RIGHT NOW, June's primary interest in life is her husband and her stepchildren and, of course, her new home, in which she will have a new domestic staff, understandably.

The actress is an experienced decorator and she says, "I'm very much on a merry-go-round buying this and fixing that."

June is so busy that it's difficult to believe that less than a year ago she was a quiet, reclusive ascetic who was prepared to devote her whole life to God and the Catholic faith.

She is still extremely pious but the transformation in her personality is absolutely amazing.

Her hair is very blonde, her eyes sparkle, her wardrobe is spanking new. Her mother says, "She has spent a small fortune on clothes ever since she began going with Fred." Her voice is vibrant and her behavior lively.

No one would ever imagine that last year at this time, June was a novitiate in a Roman Catholic convent in Kansas.

One of her friends said, "June Haver is today the luckiest girl in Hollywood. In Fred MacMurray she's landed the best catch of the season.

"Fred's got everything: money, looks, career, position—well, you name it and he's got it. He's understanding and tolerant. He comes from a strict Presbyterian family. His grandfather was a Presbyterian minister. So was June's. But June converted to Catholicism, and Fred believes her religion is her own business. And he admires her piety.

Texaco Star Theatre introduced Bruce Cabot, who was supposed to bring on the much heralded figure of history, Julius Caesar. But instead he said: "And now the conquering hero and leader of armies —Sid Caesar."

Leo Guild in The Hollywood Reporter

"As you may know, he suggested a civil wedding ceremony because that was best for Junie. She has been seeking a Papal Dispensation for her marriage to Jimmy Zito, and if she and Fred had been married in a Presbyterian Church, for instance, then the chances are she never would get the Dispensation."

HOLLYWOOD has seen so many marriages turn sour that the community is now ultra-sophisticated about weddings. A prophecy of divorce usually goes hand-in-hand with a wedding announcement. But that didn't go with the wedding of June Haver and Fred MacMurray, two people who are widely loved and deeply respected throughout the community.

No one has ever suggested that Fred married June on the rebound or that June married Fred because she wanted to further her career or establish a nest egg.

The key to this whole relationship has been love—simple, beautiful and binding. Love from the very beginning. END give her mountains to climb

"No one can answer that except your doctor."

So she asked the doctor and after that she brushed evasions aside. If it was cancer, why pretend it was something else? But her nature turns toward the light. Fully aware of the connotations of her illness, she still refused to meet shadows halfway. "Given the choice between brooding or not, I don't. It changes nothing." Or, as Dick explained: "She'd rather escape into laughter than gloom. It's a healthy instinct. In her darkest hour you could make her smile at a joke."

During those months of treatment her smile seemed unforced and, swinging on crutches, she followed pleasant pursuits. Always self-reliant, she moved from the home of friends to her own apartment, furnished it with antiques inherited from her beloved grandmother. There her cronies gathered—Julia Adams, Mala Powers, Shelley Winters—and presently Dick Long, returned from war to resume his U-I contract. They fell in love.

Last October he asked her to marry him. With her heart crying yes, her lips said no and stuck to it. "It wouldn't be fair. Not till I know about the leg." Respecting her integrity, unwilling to complicate her problems, he agreed to shelve the question as unfinished business and continued to see her constantly. One day he came in to find her bubbling over an ad in the paper. "Poodles for sale! Let's buy one." They drove to the kennels and bought Cezanne who, in his clumsy innocence, proved the deus ex machina. Suzan slipped in a pool of water from his overturned bowl and broke the bad knee.

After three hours in surgery at Temple Hospital, she woke to find Dick bending over her. "Honey, they had to open your leg to set it. The tumor's inactive. Everything's going to be great. Will you marry me now?" The words rang like a peal of joyous bells. If Dick said it, it was true. Dick wouldn't lie just to make her feel good for a minute. The leg was saved. She closed her eyes against the great tide of thanksgiving and opened them to smile at her love. Their engagement was announced from the hospital next day.

Dick had told her what the doctors told him. They had found the tumor inactive. By that miracle which happens once in ten thousand times, it seemed to have died. They would do a bone graft and within weeks Suzan would be walking on her own two legs. Thus ran the first reports.

The second showed some divergence of opinion. Dr. Francis Engelman, newly called to the case, agreed that the signs were encouraging but refused to commit himself until he had gathered and examined material from all the other specialists and tissue from the leg had been further analyzed.

For two weeks Suzan lay in traction, spirits high, convinced that everything was going to be great, steadfastly ignoring any ominous alternative. Then Dr. Engelman had to walk in and perform the most agonizing job a good physician faces. The laboratory tests showed malignancy. The leg must be amputated. Dick stood beside her. Eyes huge in a face gone suddenly white, she broke the silence. "Maybe—there's still a chance?" It was less a question than a desperately faltered plea.

"I'm sorry," said the doctor.

She said she'd like to talk to the other doctors. The talks brought no comfort. She said she'd like to think for a while. A dismal rain dripped outside, matching the cheerlessness within. She stared through the window. This girl not yet out of her teens wrestled with the facts and at length reached her decision, foolhardy and magnificent. "I won't let them take my leg off. I'll make myself well." Advice fell on deaf ears. A resolve once taken, Suzan draws from some inner source the iron to stand firm. Against all sound opinion, against all odds, she determined to fight this battle out by herself.

"Little Miss Medical Association," she scoffs now. "Doctors were idiots. I was the kid who'd show them."

"She was dead wrong, of course. But," added Dick, "what a show of pluck!"

Up to her neck in casts, she had herself transferred to a sanatorium. The experiment lasted a week, while Dick stood by leadenhearted and, for the first time in her life, Suzan lost weight steadily without trying. At eight one Saturday night Dr. Engelman came in with fresh reports, which showed rising infection. He spoke quietly, without mincing language. "I feel the deepest admiration for your spirit, Suzan. The mind can do tremendous things. But it can't do this. Unless you agree to amputation, you're committing suicide. Unless you allow me to operate, I'm leaving the case. I'll be back for your answer in the morning."

The die had been cast. Between your leg and your life, there is no choice. The room was very still. Into the stillness Dick dropped a gentle question. "Do you want to talk about it?"

"No."

This he could certainly understand. "There are times when words are senseless and serve only to embroil you." The scene that followed may have seemed strange to some people. It didn't seem strange to Kay Biddle, Suzan's nurse, who took one look at dark head and fair bent over a board, and withdrew. They were playing gin rummy. If terrors gathered, neither girl nor boy gave them voice. Through the deepening night and into the dawn, all you could hear was the slap of cards. At four, Kay broke it up.

Under sedatives, she slept for a few hours. Dick lay wide-eyed in a nearby room. When the doctor arrived, Suzan was ready for him. "All right, you can go ahead and operate."

Within ten minutes she was whisked to the hospital. Dick stayed behind only long enough to pack. For two days they built her up with transfusions. On the third day they operated. Coming out of the fog, her eyes rested on Dick who had to stoop to catch the murmured words. "I'm going to get that artificial leg . . . and buy me a red, red dress . . . and walk into the studio and knock 'em dead . . ."

"Since when," says Dick, "we've been on the merry road to happy ever after."

Not quite, so far as Suzan was concerned. She had a piece of unfinished business pending. "It wouldn't be fair," she had told him months earlier. "Not till I know about the leg." Well, now she knew and now she gave him every chance to depart in good grace. He laughed the outrageous suggestion off, but that wasn't the answer. He grew angry at last, but that wasn't the answer either. Her smoky eyes held his. "Look at it my way, Dick. Put yourself in my place."

There he found the answer. "I'll do that, honey, and you put yourself in mine. Suppose I'd lost a leg. Would you love me any less?"

"More," she was bound to admit, against his tweed shoulder. Which settled that.

Three factors sped her amazingly rapid recovery. Dick's singleminded devotion. Dr. Engelman's understanding. Her own valor and sanity. She'd have no truck with invalidism, in which course the doctor egged her on. If she wanted a crew of chattering kids around, he said, "The more, the merrier." If she craved a hamburger instead of hospital fare, he said, "Let her eat what she likes; it'll do her good." With Dick, it wasn't a matter of dropping in to see her. Except for two days on Playgirl or a necessary errand, he never left her. She neither dragged in nor avoided mention of her leg, no more self-conscious than if it had been an appendix. Reporters clamored for interviews. In rosy bedjacket over a black gown, she received them exactly one week after surgery.

"Nobody wants to lose a leg or his eyesight or even his teeth. It's an inconvenience. But if you're asking me if I feel sorry for myself, the answer is no. In return for my leg, I've been given my life. That's a pretty wonderful exchange, and I'm about to enjoy every minute of it."

She glowed over letters from war amputees and others. "At first you're a little uncertain. You wonder how it's going to look and feel. These kind people told me how easily they'd adjusted, how normally they lived. Suddenly I had a whole new world of friends. They gave me not only an emotional lift, but practical help. I'm forever indebted to them."

"And to my studio, which spared no expense in taking care of me. I didn't have to worry about the money. One of the few times I cried was when they told me and wouldn't even let me say thanks. They can't prevent me from saying it now in print."

TOWARD THE END of February she went home with Kay, bent on a triple goal. To walk again, to become Mrs. Richard Long, to go back to work—in that order. Once the prosthetic leg had been made and mastered, they'd set the date. But that process takes weeks, often months. "We're in love," Dick pointed out. "We should be together. What are we waiting for?"

"So your bride can walk down the aisle."

"Does it matter, Suzan?"

"Since you put it that way, no."

They picked April 11 as the day, Santa Barbara as the place. They drove up and down house-hunting, but the rents were awful. "How about staying here?" Suzan waved an airy arm around her modest apartment. "Save all that beautiful money for the beautiful time when we can buy or build."

"A tent suits me," said Dick, "as long as you're in it."

They got busy at U-I, too. Bill Thomas came over and laid a sketch before her. It showed a bride in a floor-length gown of rose-point lace over ruffled petticoats of palest pink chiffon and a peach satin underslip. Empire sleeves billowed to the elbow, tapered to the wrist, delicate embroidery traced the neckline. A tulle veil, hand-appliquéd with matching lace, flowed from a tiny coronet. Each detail had been wrought by Thomas with exquisite care to set off Suzan's slender dark loveliness. She looked from the sketch to him, from him to the sketch and struggled for words. "Oh Bill, oh Bill—"

He cleared his throat. "Any changes? Speak now, or forever hold your peace."

Her head went down on the drawing. "I'm so happy," she wept.

NOR DID IT sadden her when, among other preparations, she found them wrapping a pair of crutches in white satin. "I just think it's silly. You're wasting your good time. I'm going to walk." They reasoned, cajoled, bullied. "You'll have all that froufrou around your feet. Even on two sound legs, it's a nervous business. Fine thing if you tripped. Please, please Suzie, forget it."

Six days before her wedding, the artificial leg was delivered—only a practice leg at that. Painfully, doggedly, she began trying it out. Three evenings later Dr. Engelman called to say he wanted to come by with a wedding gift. "I'm going to meet him at the door," said Suzan. By a heroic effort, Kay kept her mouth shut. Torn between admiration and dread, she watched the tortured progress across the room, heard the breath drawn in gasps, saw the perspiration break. But when the bell rang, Suzan was at the door. "Hello, doctor, how are you?" she said, and fell against his chest.

He helped her to the couch. "That was swell, Suzan. But your wedding's three days off. Better use the crutches."

From the swelling chorus of protest, only one voice was absent. Dick knew what lay behind Suzan's insistence. It was neither pride nor stubbornness, but her love for him. He never had seen her walk. She had been on crutches when they met. Walking into wifehood would be a kind of symbol, a gift and pledge to him, another of those things that you can't put into words without getting embroiled. Dick said, "It's up to Suzan. If she thinks she can make it, there's no reason why she shouldn't."

FIVE TIERS of tall pink candles flickered softly above the oaken altar of El Montecito Presbyterian Church. Two hundred guests rustled—and quieted as the Reverend Paul Gammons took his place, followed by Dick and his brother Philip. The groom looked self-possessed, but probably his pulse could have been registered on a seismograph. Whether Suzan would walk or not was still uncertain. Studio spokesmen said no. Even Dick wasn't sure. She might have turned jittery or let the judgment of others prevail.

The first notes of "Lohengrin" brought Kay, matron of honor, into view. Then the doorway framed Suzan on her father's arm. Without crutches, with the barest trace of a limp, she came down the aisle, luminous face turned toward the altar and Dick. A great sigh rose from the guests. All such moments are touched with mystic solemnity. This one held more. It crowned the affirmation of faith over fear, of courage over darkness—the soaring triumph of life and love over death. It humbled and lifted the hearts of all who bore witness.

She placed her hand in his. The brief ceremony started. "What token of your love do you give?" The rings were offered. "These are precious metal, symbolizing the quality of your love." Each slipped a ring over the other's finger. "I now pronounce you man and wife, joining your gallantry, Suzan, with your devotion, Richard, as long as you both shall live."

Danny Kaye's finger was infected from hypnotizing a lobster. You hypnotize a lobster by rubbing its belly. This puts it to sleep. Danny ordered a lobster in Bookbinder's in Philly and rubbed its belly. The lobster clawed his finger. And that's how Danny's finger was infected from hypnotizing a lobster.
Mike Connolly in The Hollywood Reporter

Her head went up, tossing the veil aside. Their lips met. On her husband's arm she walked back.

"I always knew I'd be married without crutches," she cried.

"My spine," said Dick, "was jelly until I saw her coming. Then it stiffened with pride."

HER THIRD objective was to get back into harness. Only on that score did she ever fret. "If I can't work again, I'm not going to be happy." Six weeks after their marriage she and Dick appeared together on TV for Lux. Suzan played a girl whose husband's death had tied her psychotically to a wheelchair. Dick played the doctor who needled her to her feet.

The chair angle didn't appeal to her at all. "I'd rather do something that shows me dancing at Ciro's. I don't want to stress the loss of my leg." On the other hand, she'd be working, and working with Dick. Besides, she'd walk at the end.

"This hypoed me," she laughs. "It was like a deadline. They had taken my practice leg away. The permanent one wasn't even ready yet. You think you have three months to learn, then suddenly you've got to walk. So you do."

It wasn't that simple. The first try had been for Dick and 200 friends. This would be for millions. Frankly scared, Suzan played a small trick on herself. Rising to her feet, she hung on to one thought. "This is a movie," she pretended. "If I stumble, they'll just cut the scene and do it over again." She made it like a breeze.

Next day the studio called with the topper. "Any girl who can do live TV can make a picture. We're sending you to the Black Hills of South Dakota. To be an Indian with Mature and Lund. On one condition. If it's okay with the doctor."

"On one condition," echoed Suzan joyously. "Give me mountains to climb."

AT HOME THEY have fun doing nothing much. Dick painted a bedroom wall, paused for two weeks, and clambered out one fine midnight to tackle the second.

"Why?" asked his wife drowsily.

"Inspiration," he explained.

She found this reasonable. "I used to have to scrub the kitchen floor on Saturdays. So I'd gambol in from a Friday night date at twelve and scrub it then."

"What were you doing out until twelve?"

"Twelve isn't very late and besides, it's none of your business. I wasn't married to you then."

"You've got a point," he conceded, and went on painting. She went back to sleep, being an early riser. Dick fails to share her ardor for activity at six and insists that she drags him out of bed by brute force. Once out, he likes it. They drive through the fresh morning into the country where a curious thing happens. Inevitably, at gas station or coffee shop, they met some boy Suzan went to school with.

"Must have been a terribly large school," comments her husband.

"Average," Suzan assures him primly.

Nights, they mostly stay home. When Dick turns on the fights, Suzan escapes to the TV in the bedroom. "Come out!" he yells. "You're missing the battle of the ages." To her all fights look alike—a couple of guys pasting each other. But she indulges the male till he's engrossed again, then sneaks back to her own program. Or they go to a drive-in theatre, where she falls asleep and never sees more than fifty per cent of the picture. "I'm trying to get her in half-fare," says Dick.

As a cook, she works by flair rather than book. Uninhibited, Dick calls her, though never dull. "Dumps shelves of stuff into everything, don't ask her why, and it turns out deliciously." The first time his folks came to dinner, they set and re-set the table nine times before it seemed worthy of the banquet Suzan prepared. Now they haul out the TV tables and toss a salad.

DELIGHTING IN today, their dreams for tomorrow include a house in the hills, where it's quiet enough to hear the birds sing. Dick's only other requirement is a king-size bed. "So I won't be kicking him all the time," says Suzan. "Me, I need fireplaces in every room."

"Mr. and Mrs. Richard Long," he muses. "At home in a barbecue pit."

Their dreams include children, but not yet. "Suzan is only twenty. I don't think she should take that responsibility now. We have things to do—like seeing Europe together, like working together in pictures or on the stage. We both feel strongly that a mother should dedicate herself to her children. The time comes when you're ready. We'll wait until then."

One wonders where two people so young gleaned all their wisdom. One feels that, hand in hand with Dick, Suzan has climbed her mountain and won the top, where the view spreads wide. It's a view rich with the sweetness and splendor of life. Unlike most of us, she'll never take it for granted. END

I reached for his hand

(Continued from page 41) from the Grace Presbyterian Church of Montclair, inscribed by the minister and all the deacons. They wrote, "Stay close to the Word of God." I have.

For me it has been a lifesaver to have faith. I can't imagine anything more important to the members of today's younger generation who face times in which clear thinking is almost impossible.

The other afternoon I saw a young couple walking slowly with downcast faces and it seemed to me that I knew their story—the story of hundreds of thousands whose future the state of the world has thrown almost into dishevelment. They know for sure only that the country's military needs spell enforced separation for them. They know also that if and when they marry they face trying times in which to keep a family together. I know what it's like. I've never been married, but my folks had a difficult time from the start, and since I was the oldest child, I soon shared their burdens.

My father and mother met on the boat coming over from Germany. He had ideas about studying law. She was a seamstress. Before the boat docked in New York, he had proposed to her. This was in 1927, almost ten years after the end of the first World War. Mother, who planned to go to Chicago, had old fashioned ideas about being swept off her feet—and wasn't. Three years had passed before Mother thought they were sufficiently well-established to marry. And then they weren't. Dad was down to his last nickel, and I was just born when he got his first steady job as a member of the Montclair police force. From then until the day I became well-established as a model, poverty was never a stranger in our home. But neither was God. My first sense of Him came to me in words my mother always spoke as a sort of report of her prayers. "It will happen for the better," she would say. I was sure none other than God was whispering assurances in her ear and this cheered me in the face of many a skimpy meal, clothes I couldn't have and parties I could not attend.

There was little material comfort for us in those days, which made spiritual comfort all the more important, of course. And we got it. Even when religion was just a word to me, I would experience an awareness of the presence of Holy Love in our household. As a matter of fact it was a long time before religion was anything more than just a word. I will never forget how actual understanding of it came, or rather how I taught it to myself. It did not happen until I was teaching a Sunday School class.

REAL GEORGE!

At a Hollywood drive-in, late one night, the battery in my '36 coupe failed. The car was so situated that the only way to move it was to push it back toward the street. A tuxedo-clad man got out of the sleek new convertible parked next to me and offered his assistance. He told me to get into the car and steer while he pushed. To my surprise, my assistant turned out to be George Sanders!

B. W. Owens
San Diego, California

My pupils were a dozen children, none older than six years, and I used to spend my time trying to put the story of Christ to them in simple words. Eventually, I must have put it so simply that one Sunday afternoon I began to understand it all myself! Ever since then I have had a pretty good idea of what my mental age is, and any time I find myself getting a little egotistical about my accomplishments I remind myself of this episode and get my feet back on the ground.

This revelation of faith which came in my Sunday School work awoke quite a hunger for spiritual activity and I remember I kept after my mother to help me to satisfy it. One summer she went with me to the "Stony Brookers" series of religious conferences for young people, in Stony Brook, Long Island. I don't think I have ever had a better time in my life, up to and including anything Hollywood has had to offer. Perhaps this was because I was so young and eager for experience, and the conferences were so different from anything I had ever known.

Up to now I had been terribly conscious of the mechanics of living because ours were always so close to the breakdown stage. But here in Stony Brook all this faded; my stay was provided for and I was transported into a different realm, a world in which the mind and the spirit were most important.

Mornings we would have services amidst the fragrant pines. In the afternoons many of us would swim. Evenings there would be get-togethers in which we exchanged experiences and sang hymns. Great men who had been to such far-off (and to me, mystical) places as India and Africa talked to us and reported how they had helped spread Christianity there. There was such a unanimity about the acceptance of Jesus Christ and secure faith in eternal life ahead, that one almost glowed with it. And when I left Stony Brook something shone clear and sure in my mind, lighting up all the shadows. It was that no one has to walk alone. There was a hand—His hand. I only had to reach out for it.

I am almost certain that strongly contributing to my success has been a conviction, then born to me, that very little is impossible if God is on your side. I had it when I got back to Montclair, and the power of it was amazing. No longer did our poverty seem like a weight preventing me from holding my head as high as I wanted to; no longer did a career as an actress loom insurmountably high; no longer was I consumed by fear that if I attained high places I would be tumbled again by inborn inadequacies.

It is amazing, perhaps, that the strength of my faith gave me not only religious solace, but made me feel fit for a practical world. I could not have such a feeling without my faith. It helped me to become a better model then, and later a better actress before the cameras.

I know that many readers here will wonder how it is that a girl who speaks of such a background would accept the roles that have characterized my movie path—the sexy queen, the playgirl, the hussy. I can only say that because of such a background I can throw myself into this sort of part and feel confident that in no way will it reflect on me personally. There must always be someone in any film involving the study of good and evil, to depict the Mary Magdalene before her repentance, for instance.

Many people do not seem to understand this—and I used to be one of them! Following my first important screen role, as a sort of adventuress in The Bad And The Beautiful, I made a trip home to Montclair and posed for magazine pictures with my dad and our minister, the Rev. Frank Hunger. Dr. Hunger got a letter suggesting that it was a sin for him to pose with a movie star.

Well, some similar fear of Hollywood must have been in my mind when the opportunity to sign a studio contract originally came to me in New York. I worried, too, and I asked Dr. Hunger about it. He felt I shouldn't accept. I remember his questions. "Isn't it a wild kind of life?" he asked. "How will you fit?"

His words disturbed me, of course. It may surprise some people but I have an old fashioned streak and I visualized the extent of my discomfort if I did find myself out of place in Hollywood (I'm so old fashioned that I still wear my hair long, and any time you see it cut short you can be sure it isn't mine, but one of the hair-dressing department's illusions). I spent a day thinking and praying for help in making my decision. It finally came to me that whatever Hollywood is like, it need have no bearing on me personally; that if only I could make sure of this it would be all right to go.

LET ME BE truthful. Of course I wanted to go. I was crazy about the idea. But I would not have gone if I had felt that all my time there would find me upset. I would never be able to stand the strain of having my emotions in turmoil all the time. And believe me, if the life I had to lead was to be a questionable one, my emotions would really whirl!

Well, I had little to worry about. Without comparing Hollywood with Montclair or any other place, the important thing is that no one here stands between a person and his own morals or conscience. Here you can be whatever you want to be—and a lot of people want to be good.

I think that one of the first times I found myself talking to a man in a Hollywood studio our conversation concerned not acting, but religious faith. The studio was M-G-M and the man was Mel Ballerino, a casting director. I remember that when the announcement was made that I would play with Kirk Douglas and Lana Turner in The Bad And The Beautiful, I got my first gift from a man in Hollywood. The man was an assistant director and the gift was a St. Genesis religious medal.

Whenever I am on a set in a picture and meet new people it is surprising how many times the conversation turns to matters of faith; I am beginning to think that acting, because so much of the strength of it comes from the spirit within, naturally inspires one to thoughts about the why and wherefore of being. The minister tells people about themselves. The actor shows people themselves. He sometimes plays the good man, sometimes the bad. It is not surprising that he thinks about the difference.

MAYBE THIS CAN help explain why I can play the roles I do and still be me, why a Jane Russell can do the same and still join her mother in running that wonderful chapel of theirs in the San Fernando Valley which I have visited so often. My religion has never interfered with my roles—and my roles will never interfere with my religion. On the contrary, my work, involving so much traveling, has showed me faith brings comfort.

I make a guest appearance in a Philadelphia radio station and when I leave a woman steps up and hands me a crucifix. I cross the country in a plane and the girl next to me talks of the many times she has prayed that her husband, an Air Force pilot in Korea, would return to her unharmed; when we get off the plane in Los Angeles—there he is to meet her. I share an apartment with another girl when I get to Hollywood, the wild and wicked film capital, and when Sunday comes around she wants to know if I will spend it as she likes to spend her Sundays. I agree. We go to the Westwood Presbyterian Church.

And as I sit in this beautiful church listening to the sermon of Dr. Haven N. Davis, I feel, for the first time since I have come to California that at last I am again anchored to something secure. I am back again walking with Him. END

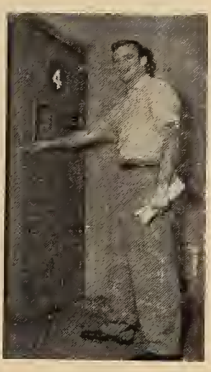
(Continued from page 55) confidential dope, the inside story. The readers want it.' Well, I wouldn't. He was my friend, but I wouldn't. There's some place you have to draw the line as to what is people's business and what isn't, and that was the place. Well, he didn't like it. He didn't like it a bit. He thought I was trying to make things rough for him. But then—now listen to this—then later on, he, mind you, got into the same kind of difficulty. And one day he came to me and apologized. He said he understood now how I'd felt about it. He didn't want to give the real, confidential information, either, you see, now that he was on my side of the fence."

Jane Powell was married in 1949 to a man named Geary Steffen (pronounced Gary, not Geery), a blondish fellow with a good deal of chin and a talent for figure skating so exceptional that he was, at the time of their wedding, leading man for Sonja Henie's annual tours. When they married, however, Steffen put all that behind him to stay home and become a solid and industrious citizen, a successful insurance man.

Roughly 125,000 rhapsodic words were written about the union of Geary and Jane Powell Steffen and that's the way it seemed to be. There were two children, a boy and a girl, a quiet and dignified life on a leafy, pleasant street in Brentwood.

WHO DO YOU LIKE, I HOPE?



I was standing in the lobby of a San Diego movie theatre when a young man came up to me and asked, "Don't you like movie stars?" "To tell the truth, I don't know," I said. "I've never been lucky enough to talk to one and find out." He said, "Well, when the picture is over, how about telling me how you like me?" I agreed, though I hadn't any idea who he was.

When the movie was over he waited for me at the door. "Well," he said, "what do you think?" All I could say was, "I think you are swell, Mr. Ray." He smiled and handed me a photo. On the back I found written, "I think you are very nice," signed, "Aldo Ray"!

Frances Brooks
Union Springs, Alabama

It was not until after the birth of the second child that fissures began to show in the marital structure.

You can get yourself an argument both ways here, but majority opinion holds that Janie was getting a little fed up some months before she became actively aware of a dancer named Gene Nelson, alleged to be the cause of the ultimate split. At least one prominent woman star has said that Janie had only one beef, but it was a big one: Geary, after a good start, was letting the insurance business slide in order to sharpen his water-skiing. A less pleasant way of saying this is that Janie, though conscious that few husbands can match a film star's salary, still felt that her mate ought to go through the motions.

The Steffen camp, on the other hand, contends that Janie, along about then, was getting to be the Movie Star in spades and that Geary wasn't liking it at all.

Given this much, the time may have been fairly ripe for a break, and this came along when Jane met Nelson on a picture.

To put it not too delicately, there was hell to pay. Nelson had left his wife Miriam and their child. Soon, there wasn't a doubt in the world that Gene was fond of Janie and Janie of Gene. The cover-up was attempted but reporters broke through. Steffen set his considerable chin and growled to a friend that he'd reconcile but Janie would have to make the first move. Janie wasn't doing that. By and by, Janie played Las Vegas. Steffen was there. Janie's opening night songs could not have been more unfortunate. Knowing her personal story, the audience became acutely embarrassed. Goodbye, baby, she sang, I'm leaving you. How could you believe me, she sang, when I said I love you, when you know I've been a liar all my life? Ouch!

But Steffen came backstage later and kissed her—on the forehead. Then he went back to Los Angeles. Onlookers reported faithfully that he looked like a man who'd been hit by a pool ball.

Janie told the press she was going to think things over. She did. Then she came home and divorced Steffen, decree effective momentarily.

Four lives had been damaged, excluding children as no more than problematical casualties. Jane and Geary had gone their separate ways. The Nelsons' estrangement has not proved other than hopeless. But fate had still another rabbit-punch to wing Janie's way. She fell out with Nelson, and so came to the darkest, most noisome part of her personal tunnel. There was, it seemed, nothing left to salvage.

But there was. There was life to salvage. Although Nerney, too, maintains silence under a mutual consent pact with Jane, there is no doubt in the minds of those who know him that they will marry at their earliest convenience. Nerney is an engaging, hard-working man, not wholly unlike Steffen in personality but a rather far cry from Nelson. He is devoted to Janie's children. And the word is that he can take water-skiing or leave it alone.

Steffen no longer talks for publication on the mess in general, feeling with some correctness that anything he said now would be superfluous. But Hollywood thinks that he, too, is finding his way back to a normal life, appearing on the town now and again and reportedly working harder than he has for some time.

Nelson has been seeking reconciliation with his wife, but without any conspicuous success. Miriam Nelson, thought by many to have been the one clearly outraged party seems to be the happiest of the four today. She gets around, shows every evidence of genuine gaiety and none of emotional strain.

Jane Powell and Miriam Nelson ran into one another at a party the other night. Jane saw Miriam first and made a motion as though to leave, but it was too late. Miriam had turned. A few seconds later, the two were in warm conversation, punctuated by chortles. Thus they relieved their host of the necessity of shooting himself.

There is no word to date of Steffen and Nelson's setting up shop together, but perhaps it's only a matter of time.

"It'll seem funny," Jane said, "coming from me, but at last, happiness is getting to be something I know about. I have learned this for a beginning: the future is a dream and the past is dead. When something is done, it's done, and you turn your back on it. You live in the present, and if you do look forward a little, it's to something real and tangible and not so far ahead you can't even see the outlines.

"Right now, I'm working on this picture, Athena, for Metro. And when I go home tonight, I'll cook or I'll be with the children—excuse me, I'll cook and I'll be with the children. On Monday nights, I go to painting class. Busy. Oh, it's so important to keep busy, keep active. Or it is for me. That's what I've found out—the wonder of living from day to day."

Hollywood is now on a terrific kick about the power of positive thinking, but Janie denied that this was precisely what she had in mind.

"No, it's just living, instead of regretting or dreaming. I never want to look back again. I never want to look too far ahead. I want to be, right where I am and at the moment I'm there. Does that make sense? I've found happiness in the simplest things, like eating and seeing the sun rise and set or be any place it happens to be. In being with people or being alone. There's so much I've never imagined.

"Here's another one—reading. I've discovered reading! Can you imagine that? I've never read before. Now I read all the time. In the Powell household, reading has threatened television. I don't watch TV much any more—and I used to be one of those who couldn't live without it.

"And painting! I mentioned painting. I'm simply terrible at it but I love it. I started with houses. I've graduated to elbows now. Some day I'll even paint something you can recognize. I could paint tonight. Maybe I will. Play with the children. That's how it is with me these days. I'm a shut-in but I love it. No nightclubs. Not many parties. Once in a while is all. Now and then I go downtown to the theatre. That's a big night. But this evening—well, maybe he won't be by until nine because he has to work late, and we'll just sit for a while."

You note the bland use of "he."

"You know," said Janie. "My date."

And why wouldn't he be there till nine?

"Because of his work."

Which was?

"Insurance," said Janie. The silence was appalling and prolonged. "What did I say?" said Janie. "Insur— Oh, no! Cars! He sells cars! Insurance, yet! My goodness!"

Happiness, as someone must have said before, is an elusive thing. Often it is not for those whom life embraces too fiercely and too soon—child screen stars, for example. Whether these become emotionally jaded, or suffer the let-down common to youngsters who are given their dessert first, or simply are not allowed to grow in the orderly progression that is supposed to lead to well-adjusted adulthood—that's for the experts to decide.

But a lot of times they have it rough—as rough as Janie Powell has had it.

Jane was born on April Fool's Day, cute as any baby, the daughter of Paul and Eileen Burce of Portland, Oregon. But she grew up with a remarkable singing voice, and her life became unlike that of most cute babies.

Jane Powell says all she has missed from not having a normal childhood is playing with other children. She regrets that, but she will not link it with marital catastrophe—nor blame heartbreak on premature fame.

Besides, you know, all that is past. Dead. She's turned her back.

Yet Hollywood is curious to know whether she can turn her back forever. The optimists think she will marry Nerney and enjoy a happiness greater than any she has ever known. Others have a foreboding that the past never can be left fully behind, and that one dark day the shock of another setback will possess her.

But the optimists are more numerous and more convinced.

They point to the poised, courageous comportment she has exhibited from the start of the trouble, to her unflinching acceptance of a none too sympathetic role that became public property, to a touching dignity throughout an excruciating ordeal.

If she can weather all that, her admirers say, she's already over the hump, and the best is ahead. END who says beautiful but dumb?

(Continued from page 47) she ordinarily does in it. Presumably this does not include a dive from a ten-foot tower onto a nightclub floor, but the rest—yes.

I see no immediate danger of Esther's departure from our midst—indeed Leo the Lion likely would burst his appendix if she decided to check out tomorrow—but none of us lasts forever. Esther has the fine intelligence to be conscious of her limitations. Some recurrent trouble with an eardrum may have spurred her decision to design the future. Whatever it may be, Esther Williams' mind never stagnates for a moment.

Beautiful? Assuredly. Dumb? I wouldn't say so.

Then one might have said Ann Blyth had everything—certainly enough that she could rest on her oars, had she wished. Beauty, talent, great popularity, a handsome, successful husband, a loving family. But for Ann—and for so many like her—complacency does not exist. She wished to use her charming singing voice on the screen, to add a new dimension to an already versatile personality. It meant a tremendous amount of work, but what of that?

Let me get this point in now: The clearest mark of intelligence in the successful screen star is the absolute willingness to work, the recognition that without that willingness, one's career is in genuine danger. Laziness is the unforgivable stupidity and the majority of those who have failed have failed because of it.

The film star's life is not an easy one. Besides the constant battle for self-improvement, it is a life of appalling hours and often appalling drudgery. She gets to the studio about seven, is busy until nine when she arrives on the set, ready to go. The actual shooting creates strain, tension and stifling boredom—the waiting period when sets are struck or cameras realigned. During breaks, she may be called on for fittings, interviews, rehearsals, one of a hundred related chores. She is always studying. When she gets home she's dead tired—sometimes too tired to eat more than soup with comfort. But she still has the next day's lines to go over.

I contend that no woman beautiful but dumb would subject herself to such an ordeal. Your answer might be that she's too smart. But I do not think so. The rewards for such rigorous, unstinting application can be great, both the material ones, and the tremendous compensation found in doing what one likes to do as well as one can do it and with every last ounce of energy.

I may be prejudiced but that, to my mind, is smart. It is more than smart; it is an order of high intelligence, the artist's sort of life.

In Annie Get Your Gun, another directorial éclair of mine, Betty Hutton, had to learn to shoot and shoot so well that there would be no suggestion of fake. We wanted it so that Annie Oakley herself would have approved. Skeet is a hobby of mine so I'm pretty fair at it. I took Betty out to the back lot and put a gun in her hands. She handled it at first as though it were a golf club with a cobra wrapped around the shaft. But in a few days she was knocking the tops off bottles. I'm not fooling you. She gave hours at a time to nothing but shooting and became a crack shot. For what? Just for a few scenes. Conceivably, a double could have been used in most of them. But doing it that way is not what has made Betty Hutton what she is.

Look at her now. She's in a fascinating phase of her career—nightclubs and other personal appearances—helping to get vaudeville back on its feet. She is not doing it for peanuts. If she feels she made the move at the right time, who am I to argue with her? She's too smart to have made it any other way. As I understand it, she didn't like the pictures she was getting so she took her case to the country. When she comes back to Hollywood, she'll be writing her own ticket.

Rosalind Russell, a truly brilliant woman, did the same with that superb New York show, Wonderful Town. So did Judy Garland, an incredible talent.

Jane Powell, one of the sweetest and most intelligent mothers I have ever known or seen, will be striking out on her own one of these days (Las Vegas last year was an impressive preliminary) and so will Kathryn Grayson.

Kathryn's Las Vegas engagement wasn't just a routine, agented deal. Katie set up every last detail herself. They wanted her, of course, but she took care of her own end right down to the way the costumes should be stitched—and that niggling matter of dragging down $90,000 for three weeks.

She wasn't sure whether a classical program would be welcome in nightclubs. Normally the procedure would have been a kind of sneak preview on a modest tour. But that wasn't for Katie. She let Vegas pay for her gamble—what better patron would there be?—and then went on to the double satisfaction of proving that supper clubs did like her. Very, very much.

The point of Kathryn's beauty has been satisfactorily settled long ago. Now you can see what else there is.

Jeanette MacDonald, like Judy Garland and Betty Hutton, has a feel for live audiences and is on the road much of the time. But she can't be said to leave things to chance, which is intelligence on her part as it would be on anyone else's. I am quite impressed that she carries with her her own lighting, setting it up in each new auditorium. And I am very much impressed by the fact that in one night recently, she drew down $17,000. Beautiful but what?

Mae West has a similar gimmick for her tours, but on a very special scale. Miss West still is a big apple of the public eye and after each of her performances large numbers of her fans swarm to her dressingroom. They're entirely welcome—but not until Mae has lighted herself at her dressing table with a special battery focussed and adjusted for Mae and Mae only. Thus she makes sure she looks as striking off as she does on—and Mae, believe me, is still very much something to see.

You may tend to look down your nose a bit at capers like this. But I don't. I speak here from a rather insular point of view, as part of the film industry, but I think they're great. We're showmen out here, and showmanship is as much our business as body-lines are Henry Ford's. I want to cheer when Marilyn Monroe makes one of those entrances, when Terry Moore cuts loose with her latest nip-up, when Joan Crawford never for a second behaves like less than a movie star—and would you say that dumbness has kept her on top for twenty-five years? Janet Leigh, a prime example of the hard-working, level-headed girl, continues to consent to those eye-filling picture layouts. That's a piece of this business, and it is a very vital piece. It's wonderful—and it's smart!

Then there are samples of what I think of as cool, no-nonsense intelligence. They may not seem like much as isolated episodes, but it's trouper stuff, little victories of poise and common sense over the sort of upset that unstrings a low-calibre brain.

I directed Ava Gardner in a scene in which she was to fondle a monkey. It was rather long but she played it without a hitch. This was noteworthy, for throughout the sequence, the monkey had been chewing steadily and painfully on Ava's forearm.

She could have stopped the action immediately. But it would have (1) cost money, (2) necessitated a re-take.

Ava declined to be heroic about it. A re-take, she explained, would simply have meant more chewing, so she wanted to get it over with the first time.

If I had been chewed by a monkey, I never would have thought of that—and I haven't the excuse of beauty to defend my short-sightedness.

You may recall the cat in Cass Timberlane. Now Lana Turner is kindness itself to animals but she has, like many persons, an aversion to cats. She feels about them much as some people feel about snakes. There is nothing to be done about it. Judy Garland is that way about horses.

That presented us with an impasse, of course, since Lana was one of the stars of the film, and she was called upon to lug that cat around. I defy you to this day to read the slightest trace of fear or revulsion in her comportment throughout the picture.

If Lana were feather-brained, she might have refused to touch the animal or succumbed to hysterics. But she swallowed an authentic phobia and went ahead with her job.

No one has ever suggested that the magnificent Ethel Barrymore is in any way dumb. But she plainly is beautiful and she is incontestably an actress. One of my favorite stories bears on my point.

I had done some early scenes with Miss Barrymore and afterward I asked if she would like to see the rushes to determine for her own satisfaction whether she wa happy with the way she was screening.

She asked me, "Were you satisfied with them?"

I said I was.

"Well, then," she said, starting to walk away.

"But, Miss Barrymore!" I called to her "Aren't you curious in the least about you performance?"

"Mr. Sidney," she said, "I have appeare in many, many plays, and have yet to se myself in one. Why should I start now?"

On the Metro lot, we have yet anothe highly intelligent young woman. He mind dominates her moves and decisions which usually are cagey ones. She is witty and cool, well-balanced and well-read, humorous and highly receptive and sensitiv to direction. All this proves is that she i not dumb. It does not establish her beauty But as one who knows every plane o Elizabeth Taylor's face, I will leave that to you, confident I am in safe hands.

Finally, real stupidity, dumbness, woul come through on the screen; not mock-dumbness in character parts, but the trul vapid expression of low-cell mental equipment.

So why should anyone be surprised tha film beauties are not dumb? Intelligenc registers vividly and on occasion it is eve misnamed "personality."

The faces of the new crop are alive wit intelligence. This is an integral part o their beauty, not a contradiction.

Beautiful but dumb—all these lovel women of Hollywood? Not a bit of it. A contraire, as they were saying in hig school French the last I took note of it. EN if you love judy . . .

(Continued from page 50) weekend, Mr. and Mrs. Luft turned up at the racetrack together. Sid was so attentive to Judy that several fans commented on his solicitude and Mervyn LeRoy, who had directed Judy in The Wizard Of Oz, remarked, "You are behaving like honeymooners!"

At Romanoff's, Chasen's, Sun Valley, Palm Springs, Warner Brothers studio—wherever you see Judy—chances are that Sid Luft is at her side or on his way there.

DOES ALL THIS sound as if the Luft marriage might be foundering?

Of course it doesn't. But Hollywood skeptics insist that Judy and Sid have yet to find true happiness. They tell of an incident which occurred several months ago n Holmby Hills.

"It was late at night," one neighbor recalls, "and I heard all this screaming and yelling and shouting. I knew Mr. and Mrs. Luft were in their house. And yet I didn't know what was causing the commotion.

"Of course it wasn't any of my business. But the Lufts do have children, wonderful kids, and we have had robberies in this neighborhood, quite a series of them. And I thought for a minute that maybe it was just a domestic quarrel. What couple doesn't fight once in a while? But the noise seemed to be too loud for that."

Anyway, the police were called and a prowl car whizzed up to Judy's house. The officers knocked and Sid answered. It was a quarrel all right, he explained, but it involved one of the domestic staff.

Hollywood pessimists have tried to blow ıp the incident into a marital crisis. But Judy and Sid refuse to be disturbed.

"I used to mind all those things they wrote and said about me," Judy admits. 'But now I don't care. I've found some peace of mind."

A SECRETARY who knows Judy well, says, "The best thing that ever happened to ıer was Lorna. I can measure the change n Judy's personality from the day she gave birth to that cute baby girl.

Jay Dratler's line about people who spend their time in Palm Springs playing cards around the swimming pool: "Obviously, dolling, they want their cards should get a tan."

Mike Connolly in The Hollywood Reporter

"Childbirth does many things to many vomen, but it settled Judy and matured ıer. It gave her a new set of values. It olidified Judy's marriage and changed her utlook. She looks back on her own tormy, hectic youth, and she knows that orna and Liza, who is eight now, must be pared all that confusion.

"The most important thing in the world o Judy used to be Judy Garland. Now it's er children who count. So long as they're vell and happy and she's capable of working, she isn't worrying about what the ise guys have to say about her, Sid or A tar Is Born.

"I remember not too long ago, someone uggested to Judy the possibility that Sid as merely using her to establish his eminence as a motion picture producer.

"In the old days, the girl would have lown her top and cried and gone off on a eeping jag. This time she merely spoke short, sharp word that left no doubt in e reporter's mind as to what she meant. nd what she meant was that he was lking through his hat."

Judy Garland insists, "I am happier now than I've even been." And she certainly looks it. Her weight is 110 pounds. Her luminous brown eyes are sharp and clear. Her voice is bigger, better and more controlled than ever. And she is optimistic.

Perhaps Judy has gained some confidence from her new system of periodic physical checkups. Every six months or so, she checks into the Cedars of Lebanon Hospital in Hollywood and submits to a thorough examination.

After each visit to the hospital, the rumor goes around that, "Judy Garland is on that pill-kick again." Not true.

Judy sleeps well these nights because she has found peace. How lasting it will be no one knows. Judy's nature is volcanic and may erupt without a moment's notice, especially if another marital disappointment were to spark the flame. But she had the strength and will power and stamina to finish A Star Is Born.

Undoubtedly you've heard and read about Judy and Star.

Last year when she announced that she was going to use its musical version as a screen comeback vehicle, most of Hollywood was doubtful.

"Maybe Judy will start the picture," one producer offered, "but she'll never finish it."

"I don't care what anyone says," another executive confided. "This kid's strung tighter than an E-string on a violin. Worse yet, her husband is producing the picture. Luft knows a lot about horses, but what does he know about pictures? You'll hear them scrapping way off in Cucamonga."

WITH THIS RING . . .

Lydia became engaged to Charlton (Speedy) Heston—ten years late!

■ Lydia Heston stepped off the stage of The Seven Year Itch and walked into the arms of her tall and terrific husband. After a kiss longer than is allowed on the screen, he fumbled around in his tweed jacket and pulled out a tiny package.

"Tenth anniversary," he mumbled.

Lydia unwrapped the package. It contained a diamond engagement ring and a matching wedding band.

Speechlessly, she admired the fine stone. Then Charlton remarked, "Now you can put away that gold band you've worn for ten years."

"Nothing doing," she retorted. "My wedding ring stays on for every day. The finery is for state occasions."

Taciturn Charlton Heston is not really a forgetful husband, allowing his bride to wait ten long years for her engagement ring. When he does a thing he wants to do it right and it's only recently that he has had the money for such a spectacular gesture.

The Hestons just can't bring themselves to live like Hollywood stars. The days in which they honeymooned on a household budget of ten dollars a week are not forgotten. Yet in another ten years they'll be the same, for neither of them wants to settle into what they call the "glamour rut." Stardom to them simply means the opportunity to choose their roles.

Few are the Hollywood wives who would want to appear in a Chicago company of any play while married to a star of Heston's stature. Equally rare is a star like Charlton who would take third billing in a play just for the thrill of doing it. That happened when Heston opened for a short run on the stage in Bermuda, playing the bookish young man in Born Yesterday, with Jan Sterling and Paul Douglas in the starring roles. "Paul told me," he says proudly, "that during the New York run the highest price ever paid to scalpers for tickets was $50 a pair, but in Bermuda we had 'em going for $200.

Lydia and Charlton Heston photographed in one of their rare moments together.

"Of course we want to have a family before too long," he adds. "But in the meantime, Lydia is not the type to stay home while I bounce around the country. I'm proud of the way in which she puts her talent to work and I'll venture to say that this fact brings us closer than most couples in our profession." It is also bringing them greater success.

So put it down in your book. He's a man who may take ten years to buy an engagement ring, but he'll be around ten years after most of the male stars of today are forgotten.

These were the prophecies of gloom and disaster that accompanied Judy last October when, clad in sweater, slacks, and ballet shoes, she reported to Warner Brothers for her first screen work in four hectic years.

It would be nice to report that everything on Star was sweetness and light. But that isn't the way it happened.

Bad luck dogged Judy at every turn, and the fact that she could face this trouble and conquer it is what counts. At the outset, Judy offered the old Fredric March role to Cary Grant. Grant turned it down. Disappointment number one.

Then the film was begun in a photographic process called WarnerScope. After a few weeks, the photography was changed to ordinary widescreen. Disappointment number two for Judy. Then someone made another decision. "Widescreen is no good for such an important picture. Let's switch to CinemaScope." So all the old film was scrapped—disappointment number three—and the film was begun all over again.

With each change in photographic process, there was a change in cameramen. Add three more disappointments for Judy.

The next trouble was with a musical arranger. So he was replaced. Then a sketch artist was sent on his way.

George Cukor, the director, began to experience a bit of difficulty. This was Cukor's first CinemaScope picture, and he was trying to shoot it in long, sustained scenes rather than short takes. Only Judy Garland doesn't happen to be a "long scene" actress. Never has been. She throws herself into her acting so completely that she uses up her reservoir of emotional energy very quickly.

There was one hassle after another and Judy, via the unknowing gossips, was blamed for everything.

The $5,000,000 budget, the eight months of production time and the changes in personnel were all attributed to Judy or her glands or her eating habits or her husband or her temperament or her past.

Overheard: "My beauty parlor makes me LOOK younger but they still haven't come up with anything that'll fool a flight of stairs."

Mike Connolly in The Hollywood Reporter

The delay and the mounting costs were attributed to every reason but the right one—that at thirty-one, after twenty-eight years of show business experience Judy Garland has developed into a mature, intelligent perfectionist who knows that in today's market the movie-going public must be given top-flight entertainment, or the picture will flop.

"When you have your own money in an independent company," Judy explains, "there's a tendency to cut corners. You know, speed up everything, hire five extras instead of twenty, print the first take.

"I just refused to do that. This was my first picture since Summer Stock and I was scared stiff when I started in. I'm always scared when I begin. But I was determined to do this picture as well as possible. And I honestly feel Sid and I have."

Asked about the reported trouble with Cary Grant and her musical arranger and George Cukor, Judy said, "There was no trouble. Just an honest difference of opinion.

"Originally we tried to get Cary for the Freddie March part. He said no, so we got Mason.

"As for my musical arranger, he kept saying during the picture that I was singing too loud. Well, I don't have that small movie voice any more. I'm a big girl now. I've been used to singing on the stage in London and New York and San Francisco. So he just quit. Otherwise, everything's been fine.

"Go around," she suggested. "Ask anyone on the picture. You'll find out."

George Cukor, a knowing and sensitive man who has directed some of Hollywood's foremost pictures—All Quiet On The Western Front, Royal Family, Camille, The Philadelphia Story—was kind enough to explain his position just before leaving for Europe on a vacation.

"It's amazing," he exclaimed, "absolutely amazing how these stories get started.

"Judy was perfect in this picture. Cooperative, tireless, energetic—and I say this objectively—absolutely magnificent.

"Before the film started my friends would call me up—I guess they meant well. 'George,' they warned me. 'Don't make Star with Judy. She's not well. She'll hold you up. Her husband will interfere. You'll never finish it. She's an unhappy girl. She can't find herself. Don't do it.'

"Not a word they said is true. Judy is in wonderful condition both physically and mentally. And the performance she gave—well, you'll have to see it for yourself.

"This girl has always been one of the rare, one of the truly great talents in this town. And now that talent has matured."

A studio executive agreed heartily.

"I've heard so many stories about Judy Garland and Star," he said, "that I'm sick. The plain truth is that we're overjoyed with this picture and that Judy was marvelous all during the production.

"Sure, it took a long time and cost a lot of money, but it's one of the finest pictures ever made. It runs more than three hours and we're going to road-show it and Judy will probably win an Academy Award. In all my years at this studio I have never witnessed a finer performance."

A doctor from Iowa, wandering around the Warner lot one day, had somehow stumbled onto Judy's set.

"She was sweet and down-to-earth," the doctor recalled. "I asked her to pose for a snapshot with me and she said, 'Gosh! I look like death warmed over today.' But she did pose and very graciously."

During the production of A Star Is Born Judy might very easily have ordered a "closed set" with "no visitors" signs plastered on each door. But she wouldn't.

"I've spent my whole life entertaining people," she said. "Entertaining people makes me very happy."

Despite this outlook and philosophy, a segment of the movie colony continues to discount Judy's present happiness, probably because up to now Judy has had so much unhappiness in her young life.

Over the years she has suffered from poor health, unsuccessful marriages, unrequited love, basic insecurity, maternal estrangement and a fatherless adolescence. One of her old friends has said, "If I'd been put through the wringer as many times as Judy has, I'd be emotionally bankrupt and a candidate for the booby hatch."

It is a great credit to Judy that she has survived with her courage intact.

Judy says that she "loves to work and work hard. I've always felt that way ever since I can remember."

She was born in 1923 to Ethel and Frank Gumm, a pair of vaudevillians who owned a small theatre in Grand Rapids, Minnesota, at that time a town of 2,500 people.

The third of three girls, Judy was christened Frances Gumm.

She made her debut in the family theatre at the age of three. The family moved to Lancaster, California, a small desert community eight miles north of Los Angeles where her father took over management of the local theatre. Judy was enrolled in a children's dramatics school where she learned to project her precocious voice.

Last year, a few months before Judy's mother died—she was working in an aircraft plant at the time—she spoke of her daughter's childhood.

"People blame me," she said, "for all of Judy's unhappiness. They say I deprived her of a normal youth, that I drove her into show business, that I tried to make her the big star I never was.

"That's not true. Not a word of that is true. Even as a little girl Judy was obsessed with entertaining. She never could get enough of it.

"She always loved to sing. It wasn't true of my other girls. But it was with Judy. She made her own youth. I let her do what would make her happy."

When Judy was twelve an agent named Al Rosen caught her act at Lake Tahoe and took her around to MGM. The buxom child sang one song in her full-throated, uninhibited style and within a week she had a movie contract.

A month later her father died of meningitis. This was the first in Judy's long list of heartbreaks.

Her second came at fifteen when she fell in love with a married man. Sometimes these puppy love affairs are trivial developments in a girl's growing-up. But Judy's first love affair was intense and important, and long after it ended, she carried a torch. Somehow her great open faith in people was irremediably damaged.

Her first marriage, to Dave Rose, was a bust, perhaps because they were both more interested in their individual careers than in their life together. The divorce left Judy with an emotional scar.

To compensate she worked harder. She starred in three great pictures, Meet Me In St. Louis, The Clock, Ziegfeld Follies.

Vincente Minnelli, aesthetic, thin-faced and artistic, offered to fill her emotional void. A year after their marriage their daughter Liza was born.

After that Judy's great trouble started. One day she would be ecstatically happy, the next day tragically sad. One day she took pills to gain weight, the next day to reduce. One day she imbibed stimulants, the next depressants.

One doctor blamed it all on the aftermath of childbirth. MGM, the studio where she'd worked for fifteen years, suspended Judy. It looked like the end. Judy thought so, too. At twenty-seven, hopelessly mixed up, she half-heartedly attempted suicide. After that she was under a doctor's supervision.

But all of that is part of the past. The present begins with Sid Luft.

No matter what you hear about Sid and his troubles with his ex-wife Lynn Bari, he is Judy's perfect complement.

It was he and he alone who infused her with the desire to sing and entertain again. It was he who, with the help of the William Morris Agency, booked her into London's Palladium, New York's Palace, Los Angeles' Philharmonic and San Francisco's Curran. It was he who talked David Selznick into selling the musical rights to A Star Is Born, and it was he who helped raise the capital to form their independent company, Transcona, Inc.

It is Sid who, knowing of Judy's old friendship with Frank Sinatra, is so understanding about having the singer visit them. Other husbands might be jealous. But not Sid. His faith in his Judy is limitless. And it should be, for these days with three children at home much of the time—Lorna, Liza and her stepson John—Judy no longer permits herself the luxury of moodiness.

"I hope to keep working," she asserts, "because I've worked since childhood and the whole pattern of my behavior would be changed too much if I were to stop.

"I do realize, however," she adds, "that there are some things much more important than a career."

"What, for example?"

"Children," Judy answered. "I want more children."

It has taken a long time, but at thirty-one Judy Garland has grown into a happy and fulfilled young woman. END

dahl—that's all

Arlene had been considered cold and aloof, so this frank confession of love and passion was a surprise to everybody but Lamas. He kept saying, "I don't understand how Arlene gets this reputation. She's very warm-hearted and responsive to the right man."

Fernando was not boasting, although many girls thought he was. He was merely being Fernando, outspoken and charming.

One time when the tide of rumor was mounting against him, Fernando was asked if his intentions toward Arlene were honorable.

"Deep in your heart, do you have any intention of marrying this girl? Did you ever have any intention of marrying Lana—or any girl, for that matter?"

Lamas smiled. "About Lana," he said, "that's finished so we will not discuss it. About Arlene—she has done very much for me, and I would love to make her mine. But what is the sense of rushing into marriage? I am not a little boy who cannot control his emotions.

"I am not going with Arlene to pass the time of day. She is everything a man wants in a woman. I realize that. But I will not rush into marriage. I did that when I was very young and I lived to regret it. And I will not do it again. Probably we will get married, but in due time."

Two weeks later, Fernando was in New York watching Arlene play Roxanna in Cyrano de Bergerac at the City Center. But he refused to make his intentions public.

Arlene, of course, won't admit it now, but she was hurt, deeply hurt. She'd gone overboard for Lamas, she had committed herself, she'd told the world that he was everything she had dreamed about, that despite her previous marriage to Lex Barker, Fernando was the only love in her life. She had bared her heart and mind, had given tongue to her innermost thoughts and saw them in the cold light of print. Now she began to wonder and doubt.

Suppose Fernando didn't want to marry her? Suppose she had made a bitter mistake? Suppose Fernando had been using her?

A proposal from Fernando would have destroyed these doubts at once. But the proposal didn't come.

Fernando was having trouble of his own. His second wife, Lydia, wanted the Nevada divorce decree and financial settlement validated in the California courts. His back was giving him trouble. There was the question of whether or not MGM would grant him the release he was requesting. Fernando was hardly in the mood for marriage.

If he doesn't want to marry me, Arlene thought, I don't want to marry him. They broke off their relationship without rancor or recrimination.

Fernando went down to Palm Springs. He began to date Mary Castle.

Arlene, admitting to no one that her heart was breaking, went about her many businesses: designing lingerie, writing her beauty column for the Chicago Tribune, discussing a new picture (A Woman's World) with Twentieth Century-Fox.

All this time the wise guys had Fernando written off as an "angle boy," a self-seeking, ruthless woman-user.

"He made a few pictures with Dahl," they said, "and then he kissed her off. Who will be the next victim?"

THEY SPOKE knowingly, but few people in this country know much about Lamas. This is his own story:

"I was born in Vincente Lopez, a suburb outside of Buenos Aires on January 9, 1916. My father died of double pneumonia when I was one. When I was four my mother died of peritonitis.

"I lived with my two grandmothers, one week with one, the next week with the other. They finally took the case to court to determine custody rights. The magistrate decided that I was to live with my grandmother Lamas from Monday to Friday so that I could attend the good city schools in Buenos Aires. On the weekends I was to live with my grandmother Fernandez in the country.

"I had no mother, no father, no sisters or brothers. Ever since I can remember I have had to work out my own problems, solve them by myself. As a boy I made my own decisions. I think this gave me some sort of self-reliance.

"Things have not been easy for me. I have had to fight for what little success I've had. No one has helped me much.

ARLENE'S GOOD-NIGHTIES

Arlene Dahl knows how to turn her spare time into a pretty penny. She has been designing lingerie for many years. Naturally for her own trousseau, Arlene created something special. It took more than a month to make the pink, sheer negligee.

"After all," Arlene explains, "I couldn't possibly wear something that Fernando had seen in department stores throughout the country. I had to whip up something just for the occasion."

If Arlene decides to release this model for public consumption she will call it "Wedding Night."

"I got into acting in the usual way, I guess. School plays—things like that. I finished high school when I was fifteen. I had an uncle who was a stage actor, José Lamas. I went to him and told him I wanted to become an actor. He warned me that I was being crazy but he got me a job in a play, Navidad des Pobres. I had five lines, a bit. When I was eighteen or nineteen I got jobs on the radio, Radio Mitri.

"I swam a lot. One year I won the South American free style championship.

"I never went to college although at one point I thought I'd study law. I was twenty-four when I got my first lead in a play, Evacion. . . . I've been lucky with women. They've always been kind to me, and I have tried to be kind to them, to give them all my attention.

"I think the first girl I ever felt romantic about was Estella Diaz, a fiery Spanish dancer from Asturias. I fell in love after seeing her perform at the Avenida. I think I was twenty-one at the time, just a kid. It probably wasn't love, just puppy love. I went backstage and told her she was great. I took her out to dinner and we went steadily for almost nine months.

"My first wife was Azuzena Mus, her nickname was Perla. She was a movie actress and singer. She was nineteen. I was twenty-three. We went together six months, not nearly enough time. We were in a hurry to be married.

"Times were hard. There is a Spanish saying, 'When poverty comes in the front door, love flies out the window.'

"It was terrible being poor. I don't ever want to be poor again. I will drive a taxi, work in an aircraft plant, do anything but be poor. When you have plenty of love and no money, somehow the love begins to disappear. Anyway, there is no divorce allowed in Argentina, so we went across the river to Montevideo and got a divorce there. That was the end of the marriage.

"Then I met Lydia at the Hindu Golf Club outside of Buenos Aires. I was having lunch with Eduardo Schlieffer, an importer. Lydia was working as a secretary. Schlieffer introduced us. She was very attractive. We went together for six months; then we were married in a civil ceremony attended by her family.

"At the time I was all alone in the world, my grandparents having died. Alexandra, my daughter, was born on April 14, 1947. And there is another old Spanish saying, 'Sometimes children are born with a loaf of bread under their arms.' It means they bring good luck.

"Alexandra brought good luck into our lives. A month after she was born, I got my first break in the movies. A friend introduced me to Manuel Romero, a director. He asked me to come out for a screen test. I was signed. Then when Republic Pictures came to Buenos Aires to shoot The Avenger, I was signed for the Spanish version and John Carroll for the English version. Then Republic brought me to the States."

JOHN CARROLL's wife at that time was Lucille Rymer, a talent executive at MGM. She recommended Fernando to her studio. Fernando sang for L. B. Mayer and was put under contract.

His American film debut was made in Rich, Young And Pretty, and after further experience in The Law And The Lady, he was assigned the plum role opposite Lana Turner in The Merry Widow.

There is no point in going over the Lamas-Turner love affair again. Everyone knows that Lex Barker wound up with Turner and Fernando wound up with Arlene Dahl.

Lex rushed Lana into a marriage which is apparently very successful. But Fernando approached marriage to Arlene with great caution. He made triply sure that life for him was inpossible without her.

DURING THEIR estrangement, Fernando tried not to think of Arlene. But she was too much in his heart and mind.

Finally, he arranged to meet her in the lobby of the Beverly Hills Hotel, and he asked her out for the next day. It seemed to both of them that they had never been separated. They had never fallen out of love with each other, of course.

And this time, Arlene received the marriage proposal she had been expecting for more than a year. Arlene said yes.

"I'll marry you," she said, "but it's got to be a double-ring ceremony."

Lamas laughed and took the beautiful redhead in his arms.

"Anything you say, darling. Anything you say." END

so, sue me!

(Continued from page 31) hormones unknown outside the realm of rabbits, which Bob Mitchum has never claimed. It is to his credit, however, that he doesn't hold a low opinion of the feminine gender because of this tendency to melt into absurd puddles in his presence. He probably thinks it happens to all the boys.

Nor is his impact limited to those age groups which should still be receiving such emotional charges. At a recent dinner party an exquisite dowager of seventy years sought to question a screen writer closely about the Real Robert Mitchum. When the writer admitted that he hadn't met Mitchum, he might just as well have gotten lost.

"Now, there," she stated unequivocally, "is the only actor in pictures I'd walk across the street to see. And the only man in the world I'd still like to meet."

The other guests were amused, since she was such an elegant little thing, and they began to tease her.

"Dulcie," said one, "I don't think Mitchum is your sort, really. His choice of words is rather Edwardian, you know."

She was unperturbed. "I never knew a real man who didn't use strong language when it was provoked."

"But Dulcie," protested another, "he's supposed to be a terrible roué! I've heard that his leading ladies fight over him."

Dulcie smiled. "If it's true, it certainly proves that he's a man, doesn't it?"

Dulcie's husband thought that the conversation should have exhausted itself by now. "Dulcie," he said irritably, "may I remind you that your charming Mr. Mitchum has been suspected of getting his kicks from something stronger than cornsilk?" It should have worked, but this was Mitchum they were discussing. In the loaded silence that followed, Dulcie leaned forward. "Tell me," she asked sweetly of her husband, "is it fattening?"

THE FIRST picture of Robert Mitchum drawn by the pens of Hollywood writers was that of a crude, rough-and-tumble character possessed of nothing more than pure animal magnetism. Having been variously a longshoreman, a carny, a bouncer, a truck driver and a hobo, he was a tough guy and it showed; he appealed to a lady's baser instincts. When that characterization palled, the present one was superimposed. Bob Mitchum isn't a tough guy any more. Instead, he's a brilliant, shy, sensitive introvert, hiding his feeling of personal inadequacy behind a façade of cynicism and blasphemy.

This is the stuff of which fables are made. Certainly Mitch is bright, talented and acutely sensitive to the vibrations of his fellow beings—but never be deluded into thinking he's a shrinking violet whose virility is confined to his press clippings. When the men were separated from the boys, Mitch was there to be counted among the men. He can take care of himself, as he proved a few years back when he had a donnybrook with a large gentleman in Colorado. The gentleman was a professional fighter whose record indicated that he had knocked out nineteen of twenty-eight opponents in the ring. The record of Robert Mitchum wasn't available. The cause of their altercation was never established, but when the dust settled there wasn't a mark on Mitchum and his antagonist was resting as comfortably as could be expected in the local dispensary. Said an apologetic Mitch to the press, "All my fault," which was certainly the truth; there was nothing to indicate that the pugilist had planned a rest cure at that particular time. Then Mitch added, "An actor is always a target for belligerent guys who think that they are tough and Hollywood he-men are softies. Sometimes you have to fight."

BOB MITCHUM believes he is a cynic about humanity. Once he said, "I've been places where men would kill you for the shoes on your feet. I don't have to think twice about what they'd do to you here in Hollywood for a million bucks." From what bitter experience he gained this profound knowledge he didn't say, but it did absolutely nothing to prevent him from hiring a business manager who absconded with $83,000 of his money. It wiped out the Mitchums after five long years of working and saving.

Even now he is no less susceptible to the blandishments of people who entertain similar intentions. A case in point is his recent venture into the field of popular music. Though he's no Cole Porter, Mitch has a good feeling for music, and when he can't think of a song to fit his mood, he makes one up. Now and then they're pretty good.

He showed one such improvisation to "a guy"—Mitch never identifies them beyond that—and after a little time the guy approached him enthusiastically. "I think I have a good chance of getting your song published. Will you sign this, so I can get a rating?"

Bob signed. A few months passed, and he heard his song played on a disc jockey's program, just as you probably did. That was absolutely all he heard, however—his song being played—until an agent from the Bureau of Internal Revenue asked him for an accounting of his royalties!

"I just told him the truth, that I hadn't made a dime. I didn't mind the guy making money off my song," he said wryly, "but I thought the least he could do was pay the taxes on what he made."

CYNIC OR NO, Mitch is oddly philosophical about getting rooked. Maybe it's easier to practice philosophy than to admit people aren't always good. But according to him, it's the breaks. The man who stole his $83,000 is in prison, and he doesn't write songs to make money, anyhow. The big shoulders shrug in ageless acceptance. "You get a bad break, you just fight a little harder."

It isn't the way most men would think. Mitch doesn't think like other people, and because he doesn't, because he is literally a free soul, he is terribly vulnerable. He hasn't done half the things with which he is identified—but he might if he felt like it. Therefore any story about him is credible. Accuse him of anything in the world, and at least a few of his best friends will believe it. Why not? It's possible.

Mitch can't shake the character traits that make him vulnerable, but he's getting used to being a sitting duck on the pond. There was quite a newspaper spread last year about his being arrested for driving his Jaguar seventy miles an hour down Wilshire Boulevard. At the preliminary hearing Mitchum sat slouched down, talking to "a guy" who might have been a reporter, a lawyer or even a policeman. The guy said, "You'll be cleared if you take it to court; you're innocent on the evidence against you. Heavy as the traffic is on Wilshire at eight o'clock at night, you couldn't go seventy unless you were in a helicopter."

"So I take it to court and I'm cleared," Mitchum said. "Then what happens?"

The guy was elaborately casual. "Oh, the officer who made the mistake will get suspended or dropped from the force. He probably has a family, and the rest of the men on the traffic detail aren't going to forget that you cost him his job. Natural enough, isn't it? You can afford a traffic citation a lot easier than he can afford to admit a mistake that may cost him his job."

Mitch pondered. "So?"

"So, if you're smart, you plead guilty to speeding, reckless driving, resisting arrest, or whatever you're charged with. Pay your fine and forget about it. Otherwise, you get a lot of unpleasant publicity and the assurance that every time you run an amber light from now on, you'll get another ticket. Cops aren't mean, but they're human."

Bob Mitchum, boy cynic, shook his head. "Look, I just don't get it. This other actor, the one they caught last week—he was doing ninety. The only way they stopped him was to pump five bullets into his car, and when they opened the door he was so drunk he fell out on his face. How come he gets off with a fine for drunk driving and three lines in the newspaper, and I get the book?"

"Ah," answered his adviser, pointing the finger of sardonic truth. "They don't want to read about him. They want to read about you."

Mitchum meekly pleaded guilty and paid. He's getting used to it.

NOT UNEXPECTEDLY, publicity-seekers take wide advantage of the fact that people want to read about Robert Mitchum. It was this and nothing more that precipitated the now-notorious breast-baring incident when Bob and his wife attended the Cannes Film Festival. Summing it up, a hitherto unnoteworthy actress cornered Mitch on a terrace at the very moment a swarm of photographers happened by, affording some rather staggering newsphotos of one Robert Mitchum leering down at an overlush, half-clad young female.

The leer was unquestionably Mitchum's, the one he was born with, but the circumstances were absolutely beyond his control. Asked to pose for a publicity picture, he had agreed amiably and without any inkling that the girl involved planned to shuck the upper portion of her costume. Later, pressed for an explanation, Mitchum gave reporters a statement which should go down in the annals of history with those of other doughty warriors—of one kind or another. "My back," he said laconically, "was to the sea."

Typically, he bore the girl no animosity, though he thanked his stars that Dorothy, his wife, was along on that sightseeing tour of the Iles de Lérins. Dottie saw some sights, all right. At least this time she knew that the mischief her husband was in was not of his own making. Of the misguided actress Mitch said indifferently, "She was all right. She said that she had been trying to get to Hollywood for three years and figured that this was the only way she'd ever make it. Afterward," he added with the fleeting, wry grin so typical of the man, "she said she hoped she hadn't caused me any trouble!"

It was too bad, someone said, that it had to happen to him, of all people. The big guy shrugged and spread his hands, palms up. "Who else?" he asked simply.

IN THOSE TWO WORDS he said a mouthful of wisdom learned the hard way. If the same thing had happened to George Murphy, who winced at Terry Moore's ermine suit, or Ronald Reagan or a dozen other staid Hollywood citizens, there would have been no international incident. With due local indignation and apologies to the distinguished gentleman so embarrassed, it would have died aborning. There were, in fact, a number of celluloid celebrities present at the Cannes Festival before Mitch arrived, but none had his exploitation value, as Miss What's-her-name well knew. She has since sunk back into the anonymity from which she briefly emerged, having gained nothing for herself that she could sensibly want. Unless for reasons of her own she cherishes the enmity of Louella Parsons, who is without a peer in her struggle to keep the name of Hollywood clean.

Any attempt to whitewash Bob Mitchum would be a farce. He is loaded with human failings, even some of the common garden variety. He's as lazy as a three-toed sloth. If he holds still for an interview, you can bet that otherwise Dottie would have had him painting the patio furniture, and he has simply chosen the lesser of two evils. Getting him to talk is like pulling teeth—and once he is started, the experience can be as painful as pulling teeth to the uninitiated listener, since the nature of his eloquence would raise hair on an egg.

He's painfully honest, which can also be defined as disastrously tactless. Once, when he was beset by about as much trouble as a man could find, Mitch declined to meet the press. Although he did so upon the request of his studio and the advice of sager heads, he was nevertheless awarded the Hollywood Women's Press Club "Sour Apple" for being the most uncooperative actor in Hollywood. In the true spirit of Lord Chesterfield Mr. Mitchum immediately sent the ladies a telegram, to wit: YOUR GRACIOUS AWARD BECOMES A TREASURED ADDITION TO A COLLECTION OF INVERSE CITATIONS . . . WHICH INCLUDE PROMINENT MENTION IN SEVERAL '10 WORST-DRESSED MEN' LISTS AND ONE SOCIETY COLUMN'S '10 MOST UNDESIRABLE MEN GUESTS' LIST, WHICH HAPPILY WAS PUBLISHED ON THE DATE I WAS MADE WELCOME AT THE COUNTY JAIL. Women scorned are traditionally to be reckoned with—but again, this was Mitchum, which puts an altogether different light on things. They not only forgave his irony; because of it, they recognized the fact that he needed this final slap on the wrist like a hole in the head. He has friends and fans among them to this day, stubborn, uninhibited and tactless as he is.

HE DOESN'T LIKE phonies and doesn't hide it, which means that he has made his share of enemies in Hollywood, and he never met an oddball who didn't strike a responsive chord in him. If you ever saw an actor holding a calm, rational three-way conversation with a two-headed monster, the actor would have to be Robert Mitchum. What he looks for in people is his own little secret, but he finds it in some pretty remarkable characters. As a matter of fact, this—Bob's choice of friends and the amount of time he spends with them—has been the only public issue of his marriage. Even his severest critics can't contrive anything more intimate. Let's face it: old Mitch, who makes the red corpuscles of grandmothers stir around like a hill of ants, is a one-woman man. He fell in love with one girl, Dorothy, and married her—and that's it. She and the kids, Jimmy, Chris and Petrine, hold the meaning of life for Bob Mitchum. On that score, at least, he isn't mistaken; he knows how it would be without them.

After years of yes, no and maybe, things are beginning to groove for Mitchum careerwise. He's busier than ever before, higher on the popularity polls. And now, he has to put up or shut up on the score of acting. Stanley Kramer has signed him to play the lead in Not As A Stranger, which is certainly the dramatic plum of the year. Moreover, with Paul Gregory, Mitch has invested money of his own in the screen rights to Night Of The Hunter, in which he will portray the most hackle-raising villain to appear on the American scene in many a year. In both pictures he'll either have to act up a storm or start thinking about one of his earlier professions, like selling shoes. While he's waiting, he's on loan-out to Wayne-Fellows Productions for Track Of The Cat and is also scheduled to be reunited with Susan Hayward in The Untamed at Twentieth Century-Fox.

On the face of things he ought to be happy as a clam—but you never saw a more miserable guy. He's behaving, he's working hard, and he ends up with an old, familiar companion: trouble. "I've gotta get sued," he said sadly. "If the picture I'm doing with Duke comes in on schedule, I'll have fifteen days left on my contract with RKO, and they're committed to lend me to Fox. If I don't finish the first picture, Wayne-Fellows sues me. If I refuse to go on loanout for the second, RKO sues me. If I do go on loanout for that one, Stanley Kramer sues me for a million dollars because Not As A Stranger doesn't start on schedule. And—isn't this a pistol? —if I don't meet the production date on Night Of The Hunter, I have to sue myself! That's right. Paul Gregory and I, as co-producers, have to sue me, as the star, for failing to meet my commitment. We have too much money tied up in it to do anything else."

What does a guy do in a case like this? Mitch's shoulders gave a familiar, characteristic roll. "Take them as they come," he said. "My first impulse was to say, 'I'm not making any pictures until all this blows over,' but I have to work. I have four families to support."

He brooded a moment or two, then the corners of his mouth curled in a wicked grin. "Of course, there is something I could do; I could be so insulting to one of my future leading ladies that she would go to her boss in tears and say, 'I refuse to make a picture with that uncouth boor!' Maybe I'll do that."

But you knew he wouldn't. Like all the rest of the problems, he'd take them as they came. END

ava and the bullfighter

"Señorita Gardner," he confessed, "is one of the most fascinating, one of the most beautiful women I have ever met. She is an aficionada (a bullfighting fan). So is your famous writer el señor Hemingway. He is also my old friend and when the Señorita said to me in the hospital that she had acted in some of his stories and would like to meet him, I asked Ernesto to come to the hospital with me to meet her.

"There was a lunch in the hospital and then before the Señorita Gardner returned to London we went to a breeding ranch. She and Ernesto are very fond of each other."

Would Dominguín marry Señorita Gardner if he had the chance?

"But she is already married to the singer Sinatra," he protested.

"But she is getting a divorce."

"She is my friend," Dominguín asserted, "and I like her very much but I do not discuss these personal matters."

But in Lhardy's, an antiquated saloon near Madrid's old Puerta del Sol where Dominguín meets his friends, the word is that, "The American actress has cast her spell over Luis."

One veteran bullfighting critic says, "Now that he is retired, Dominguín is ready to settle down. He has more than a million dollars. Much of it is deposited in the National City Bank of New York. He owns much real estate in Spain and coffee plantations in Brazil.

"That he is crazy about her, few of us in Madrid would deny. When she came to Spain last May she was very tired and weak. Dominguín instilled in her new life, new vitality.

"She even said that she would buy some property in Madrid and build a house here. Of course, she never has liked Hollywood. But I believe it is Luis who is the big attraction for her. She is not the kind of woman who can be without a man.

"Besides, she is very much loved in Spain. She tries to speak Spanish and learn the ways of the people.

"When she was ill, Dominguín visited her every day. She was afraid, the doctors said, to be operated on. She thought the kidney stones could be dissolved. Some days it was very painful. One she fainted from pain.

"She is a wonderful girl. But in my heart I do not think she is the girl for Dominguín. The Spanish people are devoutly Catholic. There is absolutely no divorce. Ava and Dominguín might make a successful marriage in Hollywood but not in Spain."

In a matter of days Ava will have her third divorce. One might imagine that she would be in no mood to consider marriage—for a little while. But for Ava, marriage is necessary to happiness.

"All I want," she has always said, "is a good husband and a flock of kids."

Her career has never meant too much to the thirty-one-year-old Carolina beauty. "But let's face it—it's much better than being a secretary," she has said.

Ava has been married to three Americans—Rooney, Shaw, and Sinatra. Each marriage failed.

Suppose for husband number four Ava should choose a Spanish bullfighter. For years she has loved bullfights. Whenever she can, she drives down to Tijuana in Mexico to watch the imported matadors. Some women find the spectacle too bloody, but not Ava.

If Ava were to marry Dominguín—and undoubtedly she will say she never has given the idea a thought—she would have to live in Madrid which is perfectly all right with her.

Spanish wives are not regarded as equals by their husbands. This is one avenue of nonsense down which Ava Lavinia would not be likely to tread.

Ava is a headstrong girl. She believes in fair play from the opening gong, which is why she dropped F. Sinatra. She didn't believe he was playing fair.

In Spain, Luis Miguel happens to be much more famous than Ava. His father was a second-rate bullfighter who taught his son how to toss the cape in front of young heifers when the lad was only five.

By the time Luis was twenty, he was receiving $15,000 a fight, and he was considered Spain's second greatest bullfighter. The first was the immortal Manolete who was fatally gored in 1946 while trying to equal Dominguín's incredible mastery with the cape. Dominguín had performed ahead of Manolete.

Three weeks later when Dominguín turned up in Barcelona, police advised him to leave town. "The feeling against you is so strong," they explained, "we cannot be responsible for your safety. We suggest you do not fight here." But Dominguín fought with such unforgettable bravery that the crowds cheered him as the new king of bullfighters.

Last January, Luis Miguel came to Mexico. Already a millionaire, he seemed to lack his previous enthusiasm for the sport. He went to Venezuela where a bull drove a horn into his right thigh. It was his eighth and worst wound. But he continued fighting, mostly for the money.

In Bogota he annnounced, "I once loved bullfighting like a madness. But now I've lost the joy of fighting. That's when accidents, fatal accidents, happen. Today I'll make ten or twelve thousand dollars. But now it doesn't matter."

After this fight in Colombia, Dominguín cabled his mother. "You can be calm now. I have fought my last bull."

Ava knows Dominguín's story. She is three years older than Luis. But he has more money, more fame, more education. Inequality in intellect has never disturbed Ava. She has always thought her husbands much smarter than she.

But she is disturbed by inequality of affection. She seems to love much more than she is loved. Certainly this was true of her first two husbands, Mickey Rooney and Artie Shaw. Whether it holds true for Frank Sinatra is open to dispute.

Deborah Kerr said recently that when she was in Hawaii making From Here To Eternity with Sinatra, "I never saw a man so much in love with his wife. Frank spent every spare minute trying to get phone calls through to Ava in Spain."

But it was too late by then.

What will develop between Ava and Luis Miguel Gonzalez y Lucas, we shall have to wait and see. Should the "close friends" have a rendezvous in Hollywood within the next few weeks the newspapers will be jammed with predictions.

If Dominguín cannot come to this country, he and Ava will meet again in Madrid. Ava has much more privacy there.

Dominguín is the best thing that's happened to Ava this year. In January she said that she was divorcing Sinatra. No one believed her. Then she flew off to Spain and Italy. She looked thin and wan when she showed up in Rome for The Barefoot Contessa. She was mentally torn when Sinatra kept up his barrage of long distance telephone calls but she decided that when she returned to the States she would file for divorce. Reconciliation, she told herself, was hopeless.

Frank sent her a chocolate coconut cake via Lauren Bacall who was flying to Italy to visit Humphrey Bogart. But although Ava appreciated the cake, and even ate it, she knew in her heart that the marriage was finished. She threw herself into The Barefoot Contessa.

In February when the company moved to San Remo she almost lost her life.

One Friday Ava went sightseeing off the coast with director Joe Mankiewicz, Italian stars Valentina Cortese and Rossano Brazzi. The sea was calm when they left in a tiny boat. But they lost control of the craft as the Riviera currents sucked it out to sea.

When Ava failed to show up for some scheduled shooting, the film crew became alarmed. A large yacht owned by the Rizzoli Film Company was ordered out. After a four-hour search, Ava and her friends were sighted and towed to safety.

Ava was taken to her room and put to bed. "I was scared stiff out there," she said.

When The Barefoot Contessa was finished in March, Ava, accompanied by her sister Beatrice, flew to Spain for a rest. Ava had met Dominguín the year before. In Madrid they became inseparable.

Then she had an attack of kidney stones. She was hospitalized in May.

Later that month, after kissing Luis goodbye, Ava took off for London and returned to Hollywood.

Reporters asked her about Sinatra and Dominguín. Of Sinatra, Ava said, "I told you six months ago that I was going to divorce Frank, and I'm anxious to get it over with. Unless MGM has an immediate assignment for me I would like to establish residence in Nevada and do it there.

"If not, I will get the divorce in California. I can't make any plans until I've talked to my studio."

Dominguín?

"He is just a very good friend," she asserted. "If he's coming here I don't know anything about it."

A week later, Ava, between hospital examinations, was suspended by MGM for refusing to star in Love Me Or Leave Me. She blithely drove down to Tijuana to see the bullfights.

Then she picked up her two sisters, their maid, and Ben Cole, business manager to the ex-wives of Artie Shaw. In two cars, they drove to Zephyr Cove, a resort on the Nevada side of Lake Tahoe.

Here, in a rented house named Twin Cedars, Ava said she would establish residence for a Nevada divorce from Frank Sinatra.

Because he owns a two per cent interest in the Sands Hotel on the Las Vegas Strip, Frank is registered in the State of Nevada as a licensed gambler. Reporters wondered why Ava wasn't securing the divorce in Las Vegas.

"I've had fun around Lake Tahoe before," she explained. (Three years ago she visited Sinatra at Lake Tahoe.) "And I like Reno very much. That's why I chose this spot."

Ava might have been avoiding Las Vegas because all of the men she had been married to—Mickey Rooney, Artie Shaw, and Frank Sinatra—happened to be entertaining there.

"Not at all," she said. "I simply prefer Tahoe and this whole district."

"What will be your grounds for divorce?"

She shrugged her shoulders. "The usual grounds." (Mental cruelty.)

A photographer asked for a picture.

"Honest, fellas!" Ava exclaimed. "Just look at me!" She was dressed in an old blue wool shirt and a grey tweed skirt belonging to her maid.

"These aren't even my clothes," she explained. "I look like the devil. We shipped a trunk up to Reno and we can't find it. I don't have a stitch to wear.

"Why don't you come back tomorrow? Say at two-thirty. And I'll be glad to pose for you then."

The photographer said, "Fair enough." Next day when he turned up, Ava was gone and her sister Beatrice said she was terribly sorry but Ava said she couldn't pose for any photos. Later, Ava changed her mind when she was accused of having double-crossed the press. She posed for a few shots. But the newspapermen were more interested in hearing about Dominguín.

And as Ava discussed her plans in Nevada, Luis Miguel was making plans of his own in Madrid some 6,000 miles away to visit his "amiga Americana," presumably at this very minute. END

Shrinks Hemorrhoids New Way Without Surgery

Science Finds Healing Substance That Relieves Pain—Shrinks Hemorrhoids

For the first time science has found a new healing substance with the astonishing ability to shrink hemorrhoids and to stop bleeding—without surgery.

In case after case, pain was relieved promptly. And, while gently relieving pain, actual reduction (shrinkage) took place.

Most amazing of all—results were so thorough that sufferers made astonishing statements like "Piles have ceased to be a problem!"

The secret is a new healing substance (Bio-Dyne®)—discovery of a world-famous research institute.

Now this new healing substance is offered in ointment form under the name of *Preparation H. Ask for it at all drug stores—money back guarantee.

AN M-G-M PICTURE

We want to talk about the 5 most trying years

of your life

Few women realize that "those days" every month actually add up to an average of 5 full years! Turn that figure over in your mind for a minute. Does it make any sense whatsoever for you to compromise on the type of sanitary protection you use for such a long time . . . to accept chafing and odor and bulk as "necessary evils?" Why don't you try Tampax?

Tampax is worn internally. Every single advantage it has stems from that one fact. It prevents odor from forming because it prevents exposure to the air. It can't chafe because chafing only occurs when there is friction. (Actually, wearer can't even feel the Tampax once it's in place.) It's only a fraction of the size of an external pad, therefore disposal is very easy. And of course Tampax can be worn in your shower or your tub.

Most reassuring of all, Tampax is a doctor-invented product, which today is used by millions of women in America. This very day, while all this is fresh in your mind, get Tampax at your favorite drug or notion counter. You'll see at once another Tampax advantage: the package is small enough to slip into your purse. Choice of 3 absorbencies: Regular, Super, Junior. Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Mass.

THE INSIDE STORY

Want the real truth? Write to INSIDE STORY, Modern Screen, 8701 W. Third St., Los Angeles 48, Cal. The most interesting letters will appear in this column. Sorry, no personal replies.

Q. Didn't Betsy Drake go to Europe with Cary Grant because she was afraid of Grace Kelly's winning ways?
—N.T., Chicago, Ill.

A. No. Betsy and Cary are married, like to spend all their time together.

Q. I understand that Donald O'Connor has to pay his wife $100,000 alimony every year. Is this on the level?
—B.Y., Kansas City, Cal.

A. Gwen O'Connor receives 20% of the first $100,000 of Donald's adjusted income, 10% of the second $100,000, $150 a month for the support of their child.

Q. Isn't Burt Lancaster shy about admitting to his real age? I'm told he's 46 years old. True?
—E.R., New York, N. Y.

A. Lancaster, according to official records, was born in New York City on November 2, 1913.

Q. Is it true that Rosemary Clooney and José Ferrer own and manage a string of prizefighters?
—F.J., Louisville, Ky.

A. They have a financial interest only in several pugilists.

Q. Isn't Bob Wagner going around with a divorcée who is really his secret love? —D.R., La Jolla, Cal.

A. Yes—for the time being.

Q. What is the relationship between Frank Sinatra and Jackie Loughery, Guy Mitchell's ex-wife?
—S.J., Marlin, Tex.

A. They are good friends.

Q. Why did Linda Darnell keep her marriage to Phil Liebmann secret for so many months?
—H.T., Trinidad, Col.

A. She didn't want to answer questions, so she waited until she was out of Hollywood to make the announcement.

Q. Is there any actor in Hollywood who has more money than Jimmy Stewart? —P.S., Kingsbury, Cal.

A. Bing Crosby, Bob Hope.

Q. Why did June Allyson turn down a percentage of the profits on The Glenn Miller Story in favor of straight salary?
—E.T., St. Louis, Mo.

A. Miss Allyson's reply: "I must have had rocks in my head."

Q. What is Esther Williams' real name? Can she see without glasses?
—V.Y., Oklahoma City, Okla.

A. Esther's real name is Esther Williams; she wears contact lenses or glasses when not working in pictures.

Q. I was in Hollywood last summer and wanted very much to visit a studio. Every studio I went to told me that no visitors were allowed. Why?
—F.T., Milwaukee, Wis.

A. Visitors' requests are so numerous that if complied with they would halt production.

Q. I've been told that the one reason Clark Gable signed a contract with 20th Century-Fox was that they agreed to give him a percentage of profits on his pictures and MGM would not. True or false? —H.H., San Francisco, Cal.

A. True.

Q. Wasn't Sheree North really signed by 20th to keep Marilyn Monroe in line? —G.R., New York, N. Y.

A. Possibly—but avowedly to star in Pink Tights.

Q. Will Vittorio Gassman ever make another film in Hollywood? I understand he's against the town.
—M.H., San Diego, Cal.

A. Gassman has nothing against Hollywood, something against ex-wife Shelley Winters.

Q. I have just seen Gone With The Wind. What ever happened to that marvelous actor, Leslie Howard?
—T.N., Del Rio, Tex.

A. Howard was killed during World War II when Nazi agents in Portugal ordered the Luftwaffe to shoot down a passenger plane which they mistakenly thought was carrying Churchill to England. Howard was aboard that plane.

Q. Is it true that Debra Paget's mother was once a famous burlesque queen?
—V.D., Little Rock, Ark.

A. Mrs. Paget was in burlesque.

Q. What's happened to the famous dog, Lassie? I understand she's dead.
—D.J., Edisto Island, S.C.

A. Lassie is 14 years old, begins a television series on CBS, September 12.

Q. Didn't Gilbert Roland's arrival in Spain delay the marriage of Olivia de Havilland to Pierre Galante?
—J.Y., Colorado Springs, Col.

A. Not at all.

Q. Isn't there domestic trouble in the Janet Leigh-Tony Curtis household?
—J.Y., Mountain Home, Idaho

A. No. Both have been overworked, both are tired, both want a baby, both are weary of moving from one house to another.

TV TALK

Eva Marie Saint stays home . . . Kim Stanley meets her kids . . . Arlene Francis realizes an ambition.

As a child, Arlene hated the way she looked!

Arlene Francis always seems happy and gay on television, and she's even more so in her private life. In fact, she's probably one of the happiest women around anywhere. The people who work with her claim they do not know how she does it. She can be tired, beat, and exhausted; have twenty people surrounding her, asking for something or calling her or plucking at her sleeve—and she never will complain. She just keeps on smiling, and never loses her patience. Yet she isn't one of those women who are saccharine sweet and get on your nerves. She is the one gal on TV whom everyone loves. She can travel all over town without finding one enemy or even one person who's lukewarm. There may not be another big star who can say that! Arlene is also one of the happiest wives and mothers in town. She's been married for eight years to Martin Gabel, a short, bespectacled actor-producer who looks a little bit like an older Rod Steiger. They have a little boy, Peter, who is not one of those children who are ignored by their famous parents. Arlene and Martin spend a lot of time with Peter. He does not go away to school (he goes right in the neighborhood), and he isn't sent off to camp in the summer. Arlene and Martin even eat dinner at six-thirty most nights so that they can be with Peter. Arlene likes to stay home. One of her lifelong ambitions was to own a New York town house, and she and Martin finally have one. It's a four-story one, on New York's upper east side, but it's not quite as toney as it sounds; you can hear the Third Avenue El very clearly. Arlene not only bought it, she also contracted for all the workmen who did it over, and supervised every bit of the work, even the new roof and plumbing! And she did a good job, too: everything works, and she hasn't had one repair job yet. So she really knows what she's talking about on Home, her NBC show for women. She had the outside of the house painted pale yellow with black trim, and in the summertime she has bright orange awnings at all the windows. The kitchen and the diningroom, on the ground floor, are yellow and beige. Up on the second floor, which contains the livingroom and study, all the walls are beige because Arlene thinks it's a becoming color for women, no matter what their complexion or hair color. And both rooms are chock full of pictures and flowers and books. The walls in the study are completely covered with either bookcases or pictures—from floor to ceiling. Up on the next floor, Martin's bedroom-study is beige, too. For her own room, though, Arlene went wild with purple and lavendar. On the top floor, are the two servants' rooms and Peter's. One whole wall in Peter's room is a huge map of the world. None of the countries are labeled because Arlene and Martin wanted Peter to recognize the shapes first and then look up the names in an atlas. Arlene is probably very happy that Peter has light brown hair. When she was little, she used to be very sensitive about how dark-skinned and dark-haired she was. She looked like her father, who is Armenian. Her mother is English and very fair, and Arlene always wanted to look like her and her mother did, too. (Arlene was born Arline Francis Kazanjiane; she dropped her last name when she went on the stage, and her first radio contract spelled her first name with an "e." She thought it was lucky and kept it. Arlene's mother is very proud of her daughter, as is Mr. K., who fought Arlene's acting career for years. They're a very close family, in fact: the Kazanjians live about three blocks away, and see the Gabels all the time . . . Everyone is wondering why, after all these years of living alone in two small hotel rooms during the week, Arthur Godfrey brought his wife Mary up from Leesburg, Virginia, and moved into a big, fancy apartment . . . Jinx Falkenburg is a little miffed. She has to share a bare dressing-room with Faye Emerson, while, right across the hall, Arlene Francis has one all to herself—with a star on the door and a carpet on the floor! . . . Kim Stanley got her stage name in a strange way. Most people think up their own, or find one in a phone book, or take a friend's suggestion. But Kim's mother gave her hers. Kim is the name of one of Mrs. Reid's grandsons, and Stanley is one of her family's names. Mrs. Reid lives in New York now, in a small Greenwich Village apartment, so that she can take care of Kim's two children when Kim is rehearsing or acting out of town. In fact, she had to leave the children for a month because Kim had been so busy that her youngest child thought his grandmother was his mother! So Kim stayed alone with the children out on Long Island and re-established herself with them. Kim is just beginning to be happy again after a miserable marriage that left her a nervous wreck. Now that she is divorced, she is devoting herself to her children and her career, which is really booming . . . Some of (Continued on page 36)

Bobbi's soft curls make a casual wave like this possible. Notice the soft, natural look of the "Missy" hair style. Bobbi is so simple to give, no help is needed.

NO TIGHT, FUSSY CURLS ON THIS PAGE!

These hairdos were made with Bobbi ... the special home permanent for casual hair styles

Yes, Bobbi Pin-Curl Permanent is designed to give you lovelier, softer curls . . . the kind you need for today's casual hairdos. Never the tight, fussy curls you get with ordinary home or beauty shop permanents. Immediately after you use Bobbi your hair has the beauty, the body, the soft, lovely look of naturally wavy hair. And your hair stays that way—your wave lasts week after week.

Bobbi's so easy to use, too. You just put your hair in pin curls. Then apply Bobbi Creme Oil Lotion. A little later rinse hair with water, let dry, brush out—and that's all. No clumsy curlers to use. No help needed.

Ask for Bobbi Pin-Curl Permanent. If you like to be in fashion—if you can make a simple pin curl—you'll love Bobbi.

Replacement or refund of money ★ Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping if not as advertised therein

Just simple pin-curls and Bobbi give this far easier home permanent. When hair is dry, brush out. Neutralizing is automatic. No curlers, no resetting.

Only Bobbi is designed to give the soft waves needed for the "Candy Cane" hairdo. With Bobbi you get curls and waves exactly where you want them.

Casual, carefree—that's the new "Bambi" hairdo. Bobbi Pin-Curl Permanents always give you soft, carefree curls and waves right from the start.

Bobbi is perfect for this "Sweetie Pie" hairdo. Bobbi is the permanent designed to give soft, casual looking curls. No nightly settings are necessary.

Jane Powell: Will she, won't she?

louella parsons' GOOD NEWS

Everyone on location for The Conqueror showed up at Susan Hayward's birthday party in the Utah desert. Director Dick Powell was there, Susan's co-star John Wayne and her two boys. Susan doesn't look too well, these days; the divorce has worn her out.

I chaperoned Debbie Reynolds in Las Vegas—with some help from Jimmy McHugh. Debbie spent all her time with Eddie Fisher. It looks like love to me!

It was exciting to learn that Linda Darnell had been secretly married to Philip Liebmann for four months before they told a soul—except Linda's daughter Lola.

I CALLED JANE POWELL about her marriage to Pat Nerney because I heard she had received a diamond ring and was wearing it on an "unofficial" finger.

This is exactly what she said: "No ring. No marriage plans. All this stuff about our marrying as soon as my divorce is final is very premature.

"I'll tell you honestly I haven't made up my mind, and I mean it!"

I said, "But honey, just about the time I quote you on this in Good News, you'll be eloping with Pat!"

She said, "Whether you believe it or not, Louella, Pat and I have not talked marriage. Don't forget that both of us have had marriage failures. We are very happy together and value deeply what we have found in each other's friendship. That's the way it is now and may be for a long time."

Terry Moore made her nightclub debut in the dress above. It cost $3,500, and weighed 22 pounds! Terry called it a "nude soufflé" and I don't know which was a bigger sensation—her terrific act or the gown!

Jeff Chandler was quite taken with Grace Kelly and her lovely roommate, Rita Gam. Grace's latest beau is Oleg Cassini, Gene Tierney's ex. Oleg says he and Grace will be married. This could be a big surprise.

I bumped into Judy Garland during one of her rare nights on the town and was so pleased to see that she's still looking well and gay. All the hard work she had making A Star Is Born didn't hurt her new happiness.

This is awfully hard to believe, baby.

When I saw these two in Las Vegas, they looked sooo much in love I thought they might be married by the time you read this.

BEFORE I LEFT FOR LONDON on my summer vacation, I had a whale of a fling in Las Vegas which was absolutely packed with stars doing their nightclub acts at the assorted hotels and casinos.

Frankie Sinatra (jamming them into the Ziegfeld Follies show at the Sands twice nightly) got the bright idea of holding a two A.M. preview of his new movie, Suddenly, and inviting all the stars and chorus girls on the Strip to attend.

(The Strip, kids, has nothing to do with taking off clothes. It's the name of the section of Las Vegas on which the swank places are located!)

Even in Hollywood, I've seldom seen as many Hollyites as turned up for Frankie's wingding. Ann Sothern, enjoying a big success herself with her nightclub act, looked absolutely stunning. If you ask me, Ann is one of the best dressed gals in Las Vegas—where they do a heap of dressing and undressing.

Speaking of undressing, Terry Moore, whose debut in the nightclubs was scheduled for the Flamingo the following night, looked very modest in a high-necked white piqué when she arrived for the Sinatra showing.

My constant pals in Las Vegas were Debbie Reynolds and Eddie Fisher—but I've written a whole story about them, which you'll read on page 42 of this month's MODERN SCREEN.

(I can add that since our return Eddie has gifted Debbie with a strand of perfectly matched pearls and also a ring!)

Tony Martin and beautiful Cyd Charisse with their pals, the Mack Millars, were almost everywhere we went. I continue to be amazed at the few fans who recognize Cyd, for my money, one of the true beauties of the movies.

Several places I was asked, "Who is the gorgeous doll with Tony Martin?" The only way I can figure it out is that Cyd is just even more beautiful off the screen than she is in her movies.

There was plenty of excitement around Las Vegas about Ann Blyth's nightclub debut which occurs in September. Everyone loves this girl and has such respect for her.

Designer Helen Rose who is doing Ann's entire wardrobe reports: "No nudity for Ann's nightclub act. Just sheer talent!"

Before getting off the subject of Frank Sinatra's showing Suddenly in unusual spots —when he returned from Las Vegas he took Gary should give Eddie Fisher some stiff (but friendly) competition.

I nominate for stardom: GARY CROSBY

■ I nominate for stardom Gary Crosby—provided he takes off about thirty-five pounds! This eldest heir of the Crosby clan is not only a hot hit on radio already but Paramount, where his old man toils, is searching diligently for a story for Gary—and without Bing!

He's one of the nicest kids I've ever met. None of the Crosby boys likes risqué jokes. Once during a rehearsal for his radio show replacing Bing for the summer, a line of dialogue got a bigger laugh than Gary thought it rated.

"Say," he whispered to his writer-producer Bill Morrow, "that doesn't carry a connotation I'm not hep to, does it?" It didn't!

His favorite "mature" friend is Nancy Sinatra, Frankie's ex. He likes to drop by the Sinatra home, take pot luck with the family and sing to the accompaniment of Frankie, Jr., or Nancy. He thinks "the children" have talent.

He is extremely easy to work with and has great respect for the men behind the scenes who make the show go. He addresses men with the slightest touch of grey as "Sir."

He worries about little things—but he is trying to cure himself of the habit. He worries about his father's health, is upset if Bing goes to the hospital for a mere check-up.

Don't let anyone tell you that he has a serious romance. "The older I get (he's just turned twenty-one) the more I realize I'm not old enough to think of marriage."

Nor does he think of himself as rich. "They give me some (never quite enough) and save the rest," says he.

the picture out to the home of his children and held a special preview for his ex-wife Nancy, the kids and his musician pals.

THE PARTY OF THE MONTH: Hate to say it, but it was the combination birthday party for Jimmy McHugh and an au revoir affair for me the night before I left for London—and if there ever was a more festive occasion I'd like to know about it. Let me give you an idea:

At midnight Vera-Ellen was staging a wonderful dance in the livingroom and wonderful Rosalind Russell was putting on one of her numbers from Wonderful Town for the group in the patio at the same time!

And Judy Garland, Dinah Shore and Margaret Whiting were harmonizing "Shine On

Ever since she recovered her health and good spirits, Dodo has wanted to try gardening.

Then she found out about all the transplanting and hoeing and weeding for rare flowers.

Harvest Moon" and "I Can't Give You Anything But Love!"

The girls in their summer dresses were lovely to look at against the backdrop of a moonlit night, candles a-glimmer on tables set with pink tablecloths and all the flowers in the garden in full bloom.

Jane Wyman's deep suntan shone like copper against the deep-cut white chiffon dress she wore.

Judy was in pink—even to the cloisonné cigarette case, compact and lipstick you could see through her plastic evening bag.

Dinah Shore looked like a big flower in her white dress with the full white-and-green whirling skirt.

Janie Powell was so completely surrounded by Pat Nerney most of the evening you could hardly see that she looked chic indeed in peppermint-stripe chiffon.

It was a sentimental night for me because I won't be seeing all these people I love so much for six weeks and you can bet I wiped away a tear or two when they all, including Eddie Fisher and Debbie Reynolds, lifted their voices to sing "Louella" to me as the party ended.

"I'M NO HATCHET WOMAN," I told the London reporters who came to interview me the day I arrived in England. I got a kick out of their expressions when they asked me if the movie stars are frightened out of their wits whenever I show up.

"No," I replied, "I'm much milder with age!"

I don't know whether they believed it or not. Probably not. But they were surprised by my answer and showed it.

The stars they are most curious about?

Marilyn Monroe, first and most often mentioned. They particularly wanted to know if all the lurid details of the "life story" of Marilyn, written by Ben Hecht and printed in British newspapers, are true. (All I know is that Marilyn is furious about the articles and says she never authorized them.)

There's also big interest in Jane Russell. Does she look like she does on the screen? Is she a religious fanatic? If so, why is she so sexy on the screen? (Jane does look like herself on the screen; she's no religious fanatic although she's active in the affairs of her church; she believes she's more sinned

Doris Day developed a green thumb!

Marty wanted roses but Doris wanted only exotic blooms and went to a nursery.

It was discouraging to Dodo, who hadn't planned to make it a full-time job.

So she phoned Marty, for some husbandly advice. "Roses!" said Marty. "Azaleas at least!" begged Doris, seeing all her pretty plans—and plants—disappear. So they compromised on African violets!

The rough-and-ready men really had themselves a ball!

Gene Autry and Roy Rogers attended the party thrown by the western stars in honor of Norman Nudie, the tailor who outfits them all.

Audie Murphy and Rex Allen showed up, too—in Nudie-created outfits, of course! Pretty Cathy Marlowe looked only semi-western.

The testimonial dinner was very lively, with the men swapping tall tales across the table. Note Rex's famous horseshoe ring, by the way.

POOR MARILYN! THREE ATTACKS OF THE FLU HIT HER WHILE REHEARSING HER SCENES WITH DON O'CONNOR FOR SHOW BUSINESS against [lurid camera angles] than sinning in her screen roles.)

The British reporters asked if Jane Powell has lost much of her teen age following because of her divorce. (I told them the initial hue and cry about Jane's leaving Geary Steffen and her romances with Gene Nelson and Pat Nerney seems to have died down lately. The reaction was violent in the beginning, much disillusion at first.)

Another question: Is Gregory Peck now very unpopular in Hollywood because of leaving his wife Greta and their three sons? (I wouldn't say so. Greta's dignity and the way she has conducted herself through their separation have won her great respect and admiration in movietown. But this doesn't mean people consider Greg a louse.)

Last, but not least, they wanted to know: Is Frank Sinatra going back to Nancy?

(They both say they have no such intention. But who knows? Since he got Ava out of his system, Frank spends more and more time with his children and at the home of his ex-wife. He's pretty likely to drop in any time. Frequently he has lunch or dinner with the children or takes them to a cafe for an outing. Sometimes Nancy, a very popular gal, is at home on these visits. Sometimes she isn't. Not long ago, everyone was agog when they showed up in the same party at a nightclub—but when reporters frantically started checking next morning about a reconciliation, both replied, "No reconciliation.")

These are the topics the British press seemed most interested in. You fans probably knew the answers already.

IF EVER A PICTURE WAS BLIGHTED by illnesses it's No Business Like Show Business with everyone in the cast and most of the crew being down with something or other most of the time.

Mitzi Gaynor had the worst breaks. After spraining her ankle and being on the sidelines for two weeks, the very day she reported back for dance rehearsals, she turned the same ankle and—boom! She's laid up for another seven days!

Poor Mitzi had just moved into her new apartment—incidentally, the first time she has lived alone minus mama's watchful eye—and she was so excited about getting things arranged.

On this same musical on the Twentieth lot, Marilyn Monroe came down with the flu on three separate occasions, was reported pregnant twice—and firmly denied the reports that she and Joe Di Maggio are expecting. "I feel too miserable to have a baby," Marilyn wailed—although I'm not exactly clear about her meaning.

Director Walter Lang, Dan Dailey and Johnny Ray were all bedded with severe colds at one time or another, causing songwriter Irving Berlin to remark, "There's no business like slow business—getting started and finished."

SHELLEY GETS HER WISH. She once demanded that her (then) husband, Vittorio Gassman marry his leading lady Anna Maria Ferrera ("because they were carrying on a torrid romance while he was still married to me"). She is going to get her way. If she cares any more, which I doubt.

From Rome I hear that Vittorio and Anna Maria will be married by late fall and that on my soapbox:

ABOUT AVA'S BULLFIGHTER

■ Miss Gardner's friend from Madrid is one of the least gallant gentlemen to visit our parts in some time. In fact, I'll go so far as to say that this whole episode of Ava's sitting out her divorce from Frank Sinatra in Reno while Luis Dominguín makes unflattering remarks about her in Hollywood and then planes up to be her house guest has been very short of dignity of any type.

Interviewed by reporters and asked about possible marriage plans with Ava when he first flew into California, el señor, the fighter of bulls, says in good enough English to be understood: "No Ava! She marries and divorces too much."

Yet he and la Gardner were all over Lake Tahoe for five days holding hands and gazing into each other's eyes. (Maybe Ava hasn't been reading the papers.)

Upon Dominguín's return to movietown he was again asked about matrimonial intentions toward the glamour girl (not unreasonable considering that about-to-be-divorcées seldom entertain gentleman house guests while being unhitched unless it means something), and he goes up with: "No marriage to Ava. I am too infirm." He's twenty-eight!

Whether or not they eventually marry when Ava leaves off being Mrs. Frank Sinatra, I cannot hold high hopes for the success of a union in which the husband is so ultra frank—to put it mildly.

the letter box

MRS. J. HURBAN, of Berea, Ohio, feels deeply for Gail Russell: "I am sure Guy Madison has done all he can. But can't some producer give this talented and charming actress the morale boost she really needs? I mean, give her a job!"

"B.P.," Detroit, doesn't believe that Rock Hudson is in love and planning marriage. "If he were—what's to keep him from taking out a license? This business of saying he's improving himself as an actor and becoming firmly established is a silly excuse. I feel he just hasn't found the right girl." Maybe you're right, B.P.

Nothing in the world can convince RUTH LIEBERMAN, of Mattapan, Massachusetts, that there is any serious difficulty between Jerry Lewis and Dean Martin. For one thing, Ruth is president of the Martin-Lewis fan club! She loves both boys and she's very upset about reports of trouble. Don't worry too much. After a few rough spots, Martin and Lewis are seemingly very happy these days.

BARBARA SIVGARD, Stockholm, Sweden, writing in perfect English, wants the world to know: "Elizabeth Taylor is far more popular in my country than Marilyn Monroe. And we still regard Farley Granger as Hollywood's top male star."

JAN SHEPARD, Riverside, California, writes: "I am not cynical about Hollywood marriages. I believe that if people will leave them alone, Lana Turner and Lex Barker will stay married and so will Janet Leigh and Tony Curtis."

MARCELLE HARRISON, Fairhaven, Massachusetts, didn't let just fair reviews on Demetrius And The Gladiators keep her from seeing the picture: "I think it is the greatest, just the greatest, and Vic Mature is a marvelous actor."

I can hardly believe JOYCE PHILLIPS, Cantan, Illinois, when she asks, "Does Joan Crawford answer her fan mail?" Doesn't everyone know that Joan is the fan-mail-answeringest gal in movies?

My apologies to MARGOT DANIEL, of Buenos Aires, for misspelling her name when I printed her very interesting account of our film stars attending the Argentina Film Festival. Margot Daniel is correct.

the Italian girl is now in Paris for her trousseau. You can bet she isn't in London. That's where Shell is making her movie, Million Dollar Baby. Shelley is still a bitter girl about her marriage. Even now she can go into a tirade about Gassman and how much he cost her in good old U.S.A. dollars.

PERSONAL OPINIONS: Did Elaine Stewart develop into the big glamour star MGM expected her to be? Anyway, she's No. 1 glamour girl in the life of Dr. Herman Platt, whom she is expected to marry.

Oleg Cassini keeps telling friends he and Grace Kelly will be married. The studio is worrying. Sometimes, but not often, such worries have some basis.

Susan Hayward is too thin and too tired looking. Her troubles with Jess Barker are taking their toll. No wonder she is looking for a ranch (near St. George, Utah) where she and the boys can be far, far away from Hollywood when she isn't working.

Lana Turner looks lovely now that she's almost blonde again. I'd stay that way, honey. You're a blonde personality.

Julia Adams and Vic Damone may be serious—or they may not.

Best recipe for being the wife of a comedian I've ever heard: A friend, describing Eden Hartford, the new Mrs. Groucho Marx, says: "She laughs at all his jokes. Never tries to crack one herself. . . ."

I have a hunch Mitzi Gaynor misses living with mama.

I have another hunch that Marilyn Monroe will enter a famous clinic for a complete physical check-up when she finishes No Business Like Show Business. Catches too many severe colds.

Vera-Ellen's teeth aren't straight but for some reason (good to her) it doesn't show when she smiles on the screen.

Must say Amanda Blake was honest about her reasons for calling off her marriage to Don Whitman, good-looking TV director.

"Just too much interference from his family," Amanda told me. "If you can't take it before marriage it's going to be worse after.

"I still think a lot of Don and I believe he feels the same toward me. We'll remain friends and maybe date now and then. But, marriage? That's out, thank you."

Lana Turner's gown as Goddess of Love in The Prodigal cost MGM $15,000—and with just a bead here and some semi-precious stones across the bodice—it's said to make the outfit worn by Marlene Dietrich in Las Vegas look like a Mother Hubbard.

The gown is so daring, it was tested for the censors on a closed stage with only the producer and the cameraman present.

Our girl friend has shed twenty pounds—but don't think for a minute she doesn't fill out that dress in the right spots!

IT SHOULD HAPPEN TO YOU DEPARTMENT: Bob Wagner consented to date one of his fans for a picture layout for a national magazine—and now he's dating her more than any of his other girls. She is twenty-one-year-old Aleen Warthen from Wilmington, California—and a real looker.

Well, Gregory Peck fell for the French girl who was sent out by a newspaper to interview him and now they say he's going to marry her.

Keep your fingers crossed, girls. Who says the amateurs are out of the running with Hollywood glamour boys?

Despite her denials, everyone around Warners believes that Pier Angeli is head over heels in love again—with James Dean, the New York actor who is out here for one of the top roles in East Of Eden.

The reason Pier is being so secretive (if you can call lunching with him daily a secret) is because Mama Pierangeli approves no more of young Dean for her daughter than she did of Kirk Douglas, which was not at all. Dean belongs to the Marlon Brando school—you know, no car (uses Pier's), wears blue denims and T-shirts, and grunts when he's spoken to.

THAT'S ALL FOR NOW. SEE YOU NEXT MONTH!

May Wynn and Bob Francis made an appearance when The Caine Mutiny opened in New York, gave out Lenthéric "Rocket Red" lipsticks.

A winner met a winner when Pat O'Brien, just named Catholic Man Of The Year, congratulated Johnny Rackin, junior swim champion.

GUY'S CATCH — AND EVA'S CATCH

It took Eva Gabor to bring Madison in from the fields and streams!

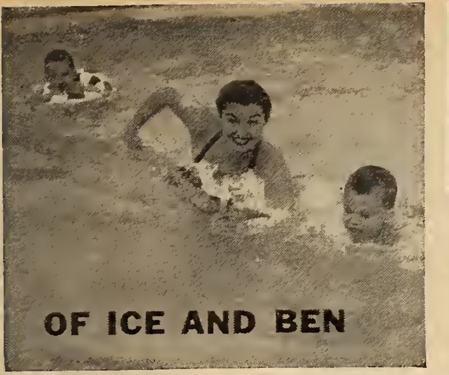
■ The outdoorsy bow and arrow man, Guy Madison, has been enjoying the company of delightful, cosmopolitan Eva Gabor since his divorce from Gail Russell was filed. But those who are taking bets on a marriage are likely to lose money. Guy fought hard for his first marriage and its failure has made him wary.

According to Guy's friends, Eva (the sensible Gabor) has wrought a miracle. She has brought him back into the social swirl—or at least to the edges. A year ago wild horses couldn't have dragged him to a black-tie party. But when Hedda Hopper invited him to her party for Mary Martin he came rolling down the mountains from Big Bear Lake where he was filming Wild Bill Hickok.

"Even bought me a new tux for the occasion," he said. "For the High And Mighty première I trotted out my old double-breasted outfit and I had a feeling that people were looking at me as a second cousin to Rip Van Winkle."

In spite of the social antics, hunting and fishing are still Guy's chief interests when he can get away from Hollywood. When he can't, his address is the Lakeside Golf course.

Guy is a home-loving type and will probably marry in a couple of years. But right now he is planning a small bachelor home in the hills of Hollywood's Outpost section. He will build part of it himself, and no doubt, half of Hollywood's marriageable girls will be trying to help him with the decoration.



OF ICE AND BEN

Also of Esther Williams and how she keeps her kids afloat!

■ November 25, Esther Williams will have been Mrs. Ben Gage for nine years. Of this long union she says, "I've never had it so good." She has also said to Ben: "Now look, don't buy me anything expensive for our anniversary this year." So far, except when he plunged for a diamond and star sapphire bracelet, Ben has been a good boy. He's keeping mum on this year's surprise, but he'll have to go some to top the practical gift of last year. Then Esther put the kids to bed, drank a toast in champagne and figured that was all, when she walked right by the present. Then she did a double-take at the biggest refrigerator she'd ever seen. Ben had bought a restaurant size!

Of swimming and children, Esther says: "I've never been an exponent of the 'throw them in and let them sink or swim' school. We have a fence around the pool and both Benjie and Kimmie know that they can never enter into the pool area without a rubber tire around their middles. The truth is that neither of them has ever been afraid of water. But they do respect the danger of it when their mom and dad aren't around. Just the other day, Benjie, without any urging, tossed away his rubber tube and swam two lengths of the pool without hesitation. Now Kimmie can't wait to do likewise."

Esther's concentration on her family still leaves time for strenuous rehearsals for the nightclub act she'll do with Ben at the Sahara Hotel in Las Vegas, now that Jupiter's Darling is finished. "This," she says, "will mark the first time I have faced the public all dry, and I hope they like it."

One more thing Esther hopes. Now that she has that huge refrigerator, maybe this year Ben will give her a truckload of groceries to fill it.

NEW MOVIES

by florence epstein

His cattle poisoned by waste from a copper mine, Matt (Spencer Tracy) summons his sons, Bob Wagner, Hugh O'Brian, Earl Holliman and Richard Widmark to force the mine owner to remedy the case.

His Indian blood (from his mother, Katy Jurado) may prevent his marrying Jean Peters, daughter of the governor, but Bob continues to court her. Meanwhile, a rift between the brothers widens, becomes real feud.

Matt dies while Bob is in prison on a frame-up. At his father's funeral he throws down a lance as a symbol of the warfare-to-the-death between his scheming brothers and himself. The ending is happy.

Picture of the Month: BROKEN LANCE

■ You needed a rugged, pioneer spirit to build yourself a life in the west. Spencer Tracy, owner of Devereaux Ranch, had this spirit in the extreme. He came out in the early Eighties with a wife and three sons, tamed the elements and became one of the richest, most powerful men in the state. He survived, all right, but his wife died a year after they settled and his three sons did the work of six men. When Tracy married again he picked an Indian maid (Katy Jurado) and the son they had (Robert Wagner) became his pet and worshiped him. Now all the boys are grown. Richard Widmark, the eldest, resents the fact that Tracy never acknowledges him as an adult and doesn't trust him with responsibility. His two brothers (Hugh O'Brian and Earl Holliman) weakly follow where Widmark leads. Wagner fights them all for his father's sake, but he has troubles of his own, having fallen in love with a girl whose social position is far higher than his own. When Tracy's wilful violence carries him too far, Wagner accepts a jail sentence to spare his father, but the results are almost disastrous. Tracy is broken by a bitterly vengeful Widmark, leaving Wagner with a longing for vengeance. Broken Lance is a gripping drama and Tracy gives a brilliant performance as a tough old tyrant whose many virtues were necessarily undeveloped because of the constant demands of ambition. Rich in action and psychological insight, Broken Lance is further helped by CinemaScope and the scenic beauty of the west. Among the cast are Jean Peters, Edward Franz, E. G. Marshall.—20th-Fox.

"THE GREATEST GIFT ANY MAN CAN BRING TO A WOMAN IS HIS INNOCENCE – WHICH HE CAN GIVE ONLY ONCE."—The Egyptian

"I, Sinuhe, the Egyptian, have forsaken eternity and everlasting life for the perfection of love...

"I committed every crime against man, woman and the gods. I gave my innocence to Merit, a tavern maid, who bore me a son. I surrendered my parents hope of immortality to Nefer, shameless temptress of Babylon. I committed the sin of sins, with Princess Baketamon, who coveted the throne of Egypt!"

Before your eyes, "The Egyptian" comes to life! The graven images become flesh-and-blood realities. The ancient hieroglyphics become transformed into living vistas. The Rivers of Babylon flow once again in the wrong direction. The Forbidden Land of the Hittites and the Pyramids of the Nile relive their golden age.

REAR WINDOW Rear Window is a new kind of Hitchcock thriller. It gets you excited little by little. You're not even sure anything happened until the end. James Stewart, a successful free lance photographer, is immobilized with a broken leg. He doesn't have much to do but wait around until nurse Thelma Ritter comes to tidy him up and his exquisite girl friend Grace Kelly glides in to plead unsuccessfully for his hand in marriage. So he sits in his wheelchair snooping on the neighbors. Interesting types—including a bedridden wife and a solicitous husband (Raymond Burr). One rainy night Stewart sees Burr going out with his wife, a valise and a suspicious air. Murder, says Stewart, a few clues later, and tries in vain to enlist detective Wendell Corey's aid. What happens? Take a look through Rear Window.—Paramount

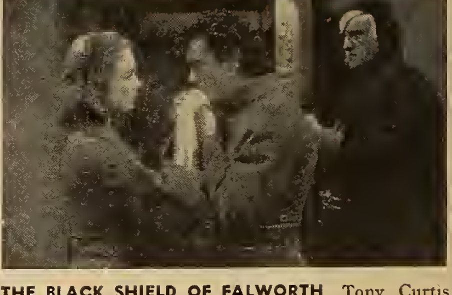
DUEL IN THE JUNGLE Unless polar bears turn up in Africa, this picture hasn't missed a trick. Everything from waterfalls to elephant stampedes is thrown at you with astounding abandon. Seems that adventurer David Farrar has just taken out a two-million-dollar insurance policy with Dana Andrews' company. Next day Farrar is reported drowned. His fiancée, Jeanne Crain, is led into the jungle on a mysterious safari by African Michael Matara. Farrar's ma wants to see her, he says. Happens that Ma isn't anywhere near that jungle. Andrews chases after Jeanne and they find Farrar at the end of the trail, wielding his whip and having his sadistic way with the natives. Jeanne's disappointed in Davey but it's too late. One false move and he'll have his sadistic way with her. Never saw so many evil leers, so much jumping. The grand finale looks just like the Sunday comics. Technicolor—Warners



THE BLACK SHIELD OF FALWORTH Tony Curtis and Barbara Rush are of noble birth but they live like peasants until the day a nobleman tries to assault Barbara. Then their guardian (Rhys Williams) takes them to Mackworth Castle where the Earl (Herbert Marshall) allows Tony to train as a squire and Barbara to become lady-in-waiting to Janet Leigh. Okay. Only Tony is dying to discover his heritage (turns out his noble dad was falsely accused of being a traitor) and a certain Earl of Alban (David Farrar) is planning to overthrow Mackworth and then King Henry IV. He'll stop at nothing. But Torin Thatcher's building Tony into a champ and, by a ruse, Mackworth gets the king to knight Tony so he can challenge Alban to combat. The story's fun—like a big picture book for children. And if you haven't had enough of knights in armor (they're almost as popular as cowboys) you'll enjoy it. Technicolor—U.I.

THE LITTLE KIDNAPPERS This is the story of a hard old Scot (Duncan Macrae) whose philosophy of thrift and Godliness is distorted to the point of cruel tyranny over those he loves. And it is the story of two little boys (Jon Whiteley, Vincent Winter), his grandchildren who come to stay in the harsh, poor country of Nova Scotia. The boys, orphaned and needing love, meet only rigid discipline and pallid emotion from their grandmother (Jean Anderson) and aunt (Adrienne Corri), who are afraid to displease the master. One day the older finds a baby, hides it in a little hut he's made and hovers over it like a mother. Only eight, he's unaware of crime but is nevertheless accused of kidnapping and brought to trial. Only then does the grandfather realize the extent of his arrogance and begin to make amends. A magnificent film classic, the children's acting is unbelievably expert and charming.—U.A.

BETRAYED In case you've forgotten, back in 1943 half the world was fighting the Nazis. MGM has concocted a spy story using this information and set it in Eastman Color against the pale green, misty background of Holland. The color is great. The movie itself might have been terrific if MGM hadn't gone and messed it up with a lot of necking. Involving Clark Gable, Dutch Intelligence Officer, and Lana Turner, his protegée. Otherwise the story's about a bloodthirsty Dutchman (Victor Mature) an underground hero whose daring accomplishments move British Intelligence to link up with him. Lana's the link. She leaves a shady, rather gay life to pose as a schoolteacher in Mature's home town. Funny thing. As soon as Lana's in on secret operations Mature starts losing most of his buddies. Question is: who's betraying whom around there? With Louis Calhern, Wilfrid Hyde White, O. E. Hasse.—MGM

RING OF FEAR The whole Clyde Beatty Circus is in this CinemaScopic production which means thrilling, authentic shots of big top activities, including black-maned lions being subdued by the master (Beatty) himself. Otherwise it's the tale of a homicidal maniac (Sean McClory) being stalked rather casually by that famous author of detective fiction Mickey Spillane. McClory has broken out of an asylum and recovered his old job of ringmaster at the circus. When his ex-girl Marian Carr spots him she cries with fright. Her aerialist husband, John Bromfield, shortly plummets to the ground from his flying trapeze; Beatty narrowly eludes death as a training harness falls free of its tiger, and a little alcoholic clown named Twitchy (Emmet Lynn) is found feet up in a water tank. There's foul play afoot, you can bet, and Spillane eventually gets on the scent. With Pat O'Brien—Warners

PUSHOVER One thing this fast-paced thriller teaches: you have to be a stronger man than detective Fred MacMurray to resist the lure of 200,000 bucks and siren Kim Novak. Kim's old boy friend has just robbed a bank and MacMurray and Phil Carey have been assigned to watch her every move from a vacant apartment opposite hers. They expect old boy friend to show with the loot. In the course of duty MacMurray has struck up a warm friendship with Kim, so warm she's talking about $200,000 being adequate for a honeymoon. All MacMurray has to do is bump off old boy friend and run. Meanwhile, detective Phil Carey, alone with a spy glass, spots nurse Dorothy Malone who lives across the courtyard. She's his type. They don't really get together until MacMurray, playing both sides of the cop and robber game, gets increasingly frantic and turns trigger-happy.—Col.

KING RICHARD AND THE CRUSADERS If not for the Crusades those knights of old would surely have died of boredom. Here they are again—English, French, Germans, Spaniards—encamped on the Plain of Jaffa in 1192 A.D. King Richard (George Sanders), attacked by an assassin, lies helpless in his tent while Sir Giles Amaury (Robert Douglas) plots against him. Loyal Sir Kenneth (Laurence Harvey) encounters a debonair Mohammedan (Rex Harrison) on the desert who saves Richard's life. Sir Kenneth is honored but then he's caught making love to Virginia Mayo, Richard's cousin, and is stripped of knighthood, given to Harrison as a gift. That's only the beginning of this intricately plotted tale. The cast is large, the setting elaborate and you'll get your money's worth of jousting, hot tempered knights. CinemaScope—Warners

THE EGYPTIAN (20th-Fox): A really big film, this epic of love and excitement in ancient Egypt stars Edmund Purdom, Victor Mature, Jean Simmons, Michael Wilding, Gene Tierney, Bella Darvi and has Technicolor and CinemaScope as well.

SABRINA (Para): Wonderful Audrey Hepburn and her co-stars, Humphrey Bogart and William Holden, make this charming comedy about the chauffeur's daughter who falls in love with the rich man's son an absolute delight. Light, and lots of fun.

HOBSON'S CHOICE (U.A.): A really funny British comedy, this one stars Charles Laughton as a father so stingy he'd rather have his daughters stay single than give them a dowry. But daughters have minds of their own—and husbands, too, eventually.

SEVEN BRIDES FOR SEVEN BROTHERS (MGM): One of the best musicals to come along in ages, this one even has a plot in the shenanigans of seven uncouth, woman-hungry he-men who kidnap their brides. Jane Powell and Howard Keel, Technicolor, CinemaScope, good tunes and top-notch dances.

ON THE WATERFRONT (Col.): One of the year's best films, this tense and exciting story of longshoremen vs. corrupt union bosses stars Marlon Brando, Karl Malden, lovely Eva Marie Saint. Directed by Elia Kazan.

But she wouldn't have been if she hadn't corrected that insidious trouble* that came between them.

Don't let *halitosis (bad breath) put you in a bad light, and don't trust to makeshifts to correct it. Trust it to Listerine Antiseptic, the extra-careful precaution against offending. Use it night and morning, and always before any date.

Listerine instantly stops bad breath, and keeps it stopped for hours, usually . . . 4 times better than any tooth paste.

No tooth paste, of course, is antiseptic. Chlorophyll does not kill germs—but Listerine kills bacteria by millions, gives you lasting antiseptic protection against bad breath.

Listerine Clinically Proved Four Times Better Than Tooth Paste

Is it any wonder Listerine Antiseptic in recent clinical tests averaged at least four times more effective in stopping bad breath odors than the chlorophyll products or tooth pastes it was tested against? With proof like this, it's easy to see why Listerine "belongs" in your home. Gargle Listerine Antiseptic every morning . . . every night . . . before every date.

No Tooth Paste Kills Odor Germs Like This . . . Instantly

Listerine Antiseptic does what no tooth paste does—instantly kills bacteria, by millions—stops bad breath instantly, and usually for hours on end. Bacterial fermentation of proteins which are always present in the mouth is by far the most common cause of bad breath. Research shows that breath stays sweeter longer, depending on the degree to which you reduce germs in the mouth.

COMPLIMENTARY ANGLES

by Doris Day

Here are wise hints on how to say "Thank you" prettily.

■ Giving a compliment is one of the easiest of the social graces—but accepting it can be one of the most difficult. People are beset by all sorts of complexes when they are told something pleasant about themselves. These complexes are unnecessary if we remember three simple things:

First, we must assume that the compliment is given in honesty. Second, we should accept it in honesty. And third, we should accept it with humility.

I learned the first of these rules the hard way. I used to be very negative. When people told me something nice about myself I thought they were really just trying to help me bear up under some basic flaw. When I was a child, many people told me they thought my freckles were "cute." I hated my freckles. And when people mentioned them in a complimentary way I was sure they were merely trying to alleviate a great affliction.

But today I receive thousands of letters from people I do not know, complimenting me on those freckles!

Some people are suspicious of what they consider "cheap flattery." In my book, there isn't any such thing. If telling a person she sings well, or dances nicely, or looks pretty is "cheap flattery" I'm in favor of it.

We should not assume that others have ulterior motives. We have to learn that people are basically sincere, and when we accept that we will have gone a long way toward mastering the art of accepting a compliment.

To accept a compliment honestly means to accept it without false modesty or blasé nonchalance and without deprecating ourselves. We are all pleased at being told something nice, so why not show it?

I used to respond to compliments

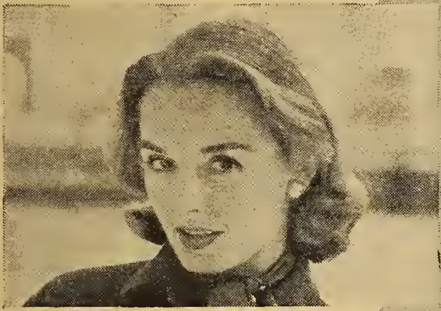
Helps Heal: "Eight years ago," says Louise Hepburn of Canaan, N. Y., "Noxzema quickly helped heal my teen-age blemishes*! Now Noxzema helps my dull complexion look so much fresher and more alive!"



Dry Skin: "Before I used Noxzema, I had a very dry skin," says Heidi Mullenger of Denison, Iowa. "Now it looks so much smoother, fresher. I like Noxzema best of any beauty cream I've used."

Look lovelier in 10 days with DOCTOR'S HOME FACIAL or your money back!

This new, different beauty care helps skin look fresher, prettier —helps keep it that way, too!

- If you aren't entirely satisfied with your complexion — here's wonderful beauty news for you!

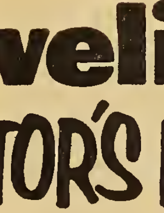
A famous skin doctor has worked out a home beauty routine that helps your skin look fresher, smoother, lovelier—and helps you keep it that way!

Why It's So Successful!

Noxzema is a combination of softening, soothing, and cleansing ingredients found in no other leading beauty cream. It's greaseless—and it's medicated . . . to aid healing, help keep skin looking fresh and clear.

The Tingle Tells You! The moment you smooth on Noxzema, you feel a wonderful, cool, refreshing tingle — the signal that Noxzema is going to work, helping your complexion look prettier.

Hundreds of letters praise Noxzema's quick help for rough, dry skin, externally-caused blemishes, and dull, lifeless complexions. Start your Noxzema care tonight. Here's all you do:



1. Cleanse your face with a Noxzema 'cream-wash.' Smooth on Noxzema, wash off with a wet face-cloth — just as if you were using soap. Unlike most cold creams, Noxzema washes off with water!

2. Night Cream: Use Noxzema before going to bed. Pat a bit extra on any externally-caused blemishes. No messy pillow — Noxzema is greaseless!

3. Powder Base: Before putting on make-up, apply Noxzema. It helps protect your skin all day!

It works or money back! In clinical tests, Noxzema helped 4 out of 5 women to have lovelier looking complexions. Use it for 10 days. If you don't look lovelier, return the jar to Noxzema, Baltimore — your money back.

externally-caused*

Doris exchanges pleasantries with Vic Damone.

by disparaging myself. If someone said, "I loved your recording of such-and-such a song," I'd say, "Oh really? I thought it was awful!" If they said, "How nice you look!" I'd reply, "Oh, my hair's a mess!"

This is a sadly mistaken attitude. We have to take people at face value, and stop measuring their opinions by our own. Just because you do not happen to like the dress you're wearing, doesn't mean it isn't pretty by someone else's standards.

Some people "talk down" their attributes when receiving a compliment out of a mistaken desire to be humble. This is false humility.

True humility, on the other hand, is perhaps the most important of all three of my rules for accepting a compliment. Our talents are not exclusively ours, and of our own making. We are merely instruments through which pleasures of various sorts are brought to others.

I receive many compliments from people who enjoy my singing. But I didn't create my voice. It was entrusted to me as a means of bringing happiness to other people—and I never get over being grateful to God for allowing me this privilege.

When people say to me, "I love your singing," I try to express in my reply both my pleasure at the compliment and my deep gratitude that the gift has been given to me.

One more word: don't hoard compliments! A compliment is one of the little pleasantries that brighten our daily living. Everybody likes them, even though they may pretend otherwise. But I like to think that compliments are not given, but lent. Whenever I receive one, I consider that I am temporary custodian of a pleasantry which I must pass along as soon as possible. I make a special effort to seek out someone whose talent I can admire, and I tell him so.

I try to deliver the compliment in honesty and friendliness, and assume that it will be accepted the same way.

MY FIRST LOVE

By Jane Russell

Herewith the tragic tale of a tender maiden's unrequited affection.

■ To tell the truth, I chased my first boy friend shamelessly for years without getting to first base. He couldn't see me for dust. His name was Don Ben Bolt, we were both about eleven years old and we entered the sixth grade together. Right away I could tell he was the type I go for—he was sort of an eleven-year-old Marlon Brando. Not shy, exactly; he just couldn't have cared less about things. Girls, especially.

That boy really sent me. I used to nudge and kick and scuffle with the other fellows to see if he'd notice me, but he never did.

When, wonder of wonders, his family moved right next door to mine in Burbank, I thought I had Don trapped for sure. He couldn't get away. That's what I thought. Oh, he was a rough one!

Winter afternoons he'd be out, barefoot, kicking a football till the sun went down. I could watch—he knew I was there, all right—but he wouldn't let me play. When we played tag and I was It, I always chased Don. He never chased me. He could eat like a horse, so I made pot after pot of candy and took it next door. He just ate it, that's all.

Once he told his mother, who told my mother, who told me, that Don liked me, and I was richer than if I had a pocketful of gold nuggets. I think about the kindest words he ever said to me personally were, "Get away, will ya? Leave me alone!"

Even when the Bolts moved down to San Diego, I never stopped badgering that boy. I used to go down and visit, and the family took me for granted; I was one of them. In fact, it was accepted—by everyone but him—that I was Don Ben Bolt's girl. I did have a date with him down there, if you can call it a date. I said, "We're going skating, and you're going to take me!"

"What for?" Don asked, but we went and we had a real fun time.

Then things changed, as they do when you start to grow up. We both got interested in other things, other people, which must have been quite a relief to Don. Time passed so quickly that before I knew it, five years had elapsed without my seeing him. One night, being in the town where he went to school, I called his fraternity house. The boy who answered the phone said Don was washing dishes or on duty or something—I don't remember exactly. What I do remember is how long it took him to come to the phone, and I lit right into him. "Donald Bolt," I said, "who do you think you are to keep me waiting like this?"

He didn't even ask who it was. After five years. "Oh," he said in his patient tone, "it's you."

Don is still around here somewhere, happily married to a girl who must have been able to run the 100-yard dash faster than I could. I hope he reads this and gets the devil razzed out of him. And I hope he knows that if his family hadn't moved to another town, he wouldn't have the distinction of being The One That Got Away From Jane Russell. Because there is one final little twist I like to remember about my first love. That night when I called Don at the fraternity house, we had our one and only real date. It was such a lovely evening that he would have had to be less than a gentleman not to kiss me good night when he took me home. I like to remember that kiss, because then and there I discovered that Don Ben Bolt wasn't nearly so indifferent to my charms as he had been pretending since he was eleven years old!

(Continued from page 6) Robert Montgomery's old friends, who knew him when he was just a movie star and not a White House adviser, are pretty miffed with him. One of them acted in one of Montgomery's TV shows, and says Bob ignored him completely and sent word, via an underling, on how he should say his lines . . . It seems odd now that their names are always spoken together, but Hume Cronyn and Jessica Tandy haven't been married for too long. She used to be married to Jack Hawkins, the British actor you see in so many movies . . . Eric Sevareid is unbelievably fussy about the way his office help type. He is crazy about them, and you couldn't find a father more fatherly than Pinky is with his three offspring . . . Charlie Ruggles used to be a championship handball player . . . Pat Barry, who plays the young wife on First Love, is the daughter-in-law of the late, great American playwright, Philip Barry. Her husband, Philip, Jr., works for ABC, and they used to run summer theatres together—a cuter couple couldn't be found anywhere. One time, when they were running a theatre out on Long Island, Phil almost died before the doctors found out what he had. It was Pat who told them! He'd been bitten by a tick, she said, and he had Rocky Mountain Spotted Fever. She was right, too—and a good thing. It could easily have been fatal. One of Pat's few Broadway parts—and her only big one—was in the only play Steve Allen has ever done—Pink Elephant. It wasn't a very good play, but Pat and Steve had a lot of fun. She rewrote some of her lines herself to make the character she was playing sound more like Vanessa Brown's role in The Seven Year Itch—which Pat was dying to play. (She never did get to.) Steve just rewrote his to have fun!

Being charged with neglecting her children while vacationing with Dick was only one of the calamities dogging Rita since her marriage.

Who is the mysterious mastermind making trouble for Rita and Dick?

■ In Hollywood's bizarre and colorful history many actresses have been condemned, pilloried and victimized. But no one has suffered more than Rita Hayworth.

She is a beautiful young woman who has never harmed anyone, who has gone out of her way to help countless people. Yet she now finds herself in the incredible position of fighting for the custody of her own children, fighting for her own husband, fighting for her own survival, fighting for one modicum of love and public understanding.

"What do they want from us?" Rita asks in desperation. "All Dick and I want is to be left alone, to be allowed to work out our own salvation. Still, we're attacked on every side. And all we want is a little peace."

The only peace Rita has known lately, she enjoyed at Lake Tahoe, Nevada, where she rented a house for herself and her two daughters, Rebecca, ten, and Yasmin, four.

Rita rented this house (only a few miles from the house where Ava Gardner was sitting out her divorce) while her fourth husband, Richard Benjamin Haymes, was fighting a battle in a Los Angeles court to prevent his deportation (Continued on page 74)

Everyone knows that Liz has not been well. But is it true that her recent illnesses stem from being sick at heart?

BY ELLEN JOHNSON

Time of trouble for Liz?

All Liz needs, Mike says, is a husband to love and protect her. Gossip, though, wonders if Mike is the man for the job.

Louella found Liz cheerful about her injured leg—but it's only the latest of her ailments—including hepatitis, nervousness.

■ Lazy as they like to be, Mr. and Mrs. Michael Wilding were lounging peacefully beside their pool. Mike went into the house for something or other, returned, sat down—and soared upward like the flying young man on the absent trapeze. He had sat on a bee, which took umbrage at the familiarity and expressed its displeasure with a direct hit. Maybe Mike sat a little gingerly for a few moments, but that's all there was to it. A bee had stung him.

Except that a short time later another bee stung his child bride, and the next day she was bedridden, unable to walk on a badly swollen leg. Same sort of bee, same sort of sting, but while Mike had forgotten his injury in half an hour's time, Liz could not have been more devastated by a machine gun bullet.

Which adds to the persistent and ubiquitous rumor that all is not well with Elizabeth Taylor. As the know-it-alls point out, she certainly has become fragile lately. In her childhood she was such a tomboy that admittedly she felt awkward and clumsy in feminine apparel. Romping about with her dogs, horses and chipmunks, she may not have been the most rugged kid on the block, but neither was she the most sickly. Her health didn't start to fail, in fact, until her present marriage.

She was on a holiday tour with Michael and the baby last year when she suffered what has been variously described as a heart attack, a heart cramp, a nervous heart, an undiagnosed nervous condition affecting her back, and complete nervous exhaustion. To the realistic, it didn't make sense. Something was wrong with Liz, but what? As the Wildings are not a fanatically athletic couple, it was hardly likely that she had overdone physically. And how could a vacation trip cause complete nervous exhaustion? It seemed odd—if she was happy.

Back home and at work in Rhapsody, Liz sustained a leg ailment which necessitated its being placed in a cast. There was no cause for real alarm, apparently, but production on the picture had to be held up because the injury inexplicably refused to mend. (Continued on page 104)

FRANTIC ROMANCE

By Louella Parsons

Here's the real story of the Debbi

■ In all the years I've been covering Hollywood, I've never been closer to th inception of a romance than the curren heat wave blowing up between Debbi Reynolds and Eddie Fisher.

We were all in Las Vegas together. In fact, Eddie was on the plane with m when reporters from rival papers wer frantically checking the story that he wa eloping with Debbie, who didn't actuall )ebbie, an unusually well-adjusted, wellalanced, intelligent girl for her years, in ny care. I suppose one word from me nd Debbie would have done as she leased. But she was very cute about eporting to me after her mother left.

One night—morning rather, it was about one A.M.—I found a note in my mailbox at the Sands Hotel.

Dear Ma: (it read) We're catching both Frank Sinatra's and Ann Sothern's shows tonight, so won't be in till late. Don't worry. And don't ring either of us until noon tomorrow. Will meet you at the pool for lunch. Debbie and Eddie.

Are they really in love?

Will they marry?

Let's take those questions one at a time.

If these two popular, phenomenally successful young people aren't completely out of this world, completely gone on each other as of now, then I don't know exciting young love when I see it!

One day when Eddie and I were alone, sunning (Continued on page 90)

Lonely on location trips, John always has his kids join him, finds work on the movie for Pat and Mike to make sure they're not excess baggage.

THE TWO YEARS OF EXILE ARE OVER. SURROUNDED NOW BY THOSE HE LOVES, THE DUKE'S IN HIS DUKEDOM

"From now on I'm going to do all my traveling on my own seven acres," John says. His redecorated home no longer holds sad memories.

THE BIG MAN COMES HOME

by Jim Henaghan

Pilar takes over soon, but until then Melinda is lady of the house—however odd her duties!

Indian wrestling with Pat, exploring the countryside, John seemed relaxed and happy again.

-ALL'S RIGHT WITH THE WORLD!

■ A large man in a white shirt and apron opened the door and stepped out on the porch.

"Good evening, Mr. Wayne," he said. And then he grinned. "Welcome home."

"Thanks, Scotty," John Wayne said. "It's good to be here."

And then he threw himself into a comfortable chair, dropped his hat on the ground beside him and lay back. Through narrowed eyes he gazed about the land that was his and the house that he hoped would be his final home.

It was no pasture land. Seven acres of neatly clipped green grass stretched out and curved in a broad sweep to the top of (Continued on page 96)

Gable, Milland, Crosby - what made them fall for Grace? And why do the top beauties envy her?

by STEVE CRONIN

The whole town's talking about KELLY!

■ If ever a girl was in the running in Hollywood, it's Grace Kelly. And what the whole town wants to know is, how did she get so far so fast?

Some say it's the luck of the Irish. But that's too easy. Some say it's talent or sex or what she knows or whom she knows. But one who knows her well says, "I've read dozens of articles about Grace—how beautiful she is, how well-scrubbed, soft-spoken, ladylike, how smart and subtle and sophisticated—how talented and genuine and hard-working. But nowhere have I seen a mention of the one quality that is most characteristic.

"That quality," the friend continued, "is ambition. Grace Kelly is one of the most ambitious girls I know.

"How do you think she gets all her marvelous roles? By sitting back and waiting for producers to beat a path to her door? Hardly.

"This girl really knows how to operate. She's got a highpowered agency, MCA. And she knows what she wants."

And in the last three years this quiet blonde from Philadelphia has got what she wanted. Although she is only twenty-six, no other young actress has touched her record, qualitatively speaking, of eight top-notch movies with eight top-notch leading men.

No other young actress has such a record of romance rumors, either, some with the aforementioned leading men.

According to the gossips, Grace Kelly is a femme fatale, an American combine of Greta Garbo and Ingrid Bergman, who has allegedly toyed with the affections of Gary Cooper, Clark Gable, Ray Milland and Bing Crosby, to name only a few of the more famous men in her life.

Grace has still a further distinction: she is the envy of practically every other motion picture actress in the world. A few of these were gathered in a Beverly Hills restaurant discusssing their sister actress.

"For my money," said one, "Grace Kelly is the most overrated actress to hit this town in years."

"I saw Clark Gable taking her to the Academy Awards," added another, "and all I can say is that the King's eyesight must be slipping."

"Compared to Lana Turner," a third volunteered, "she's got about as much sex appeal as a string bean."

When actresses start talking about one of their colleagues in this salty fashion, the conclusion is inescapable: Grace Kelly has arrived.

Now, what makes Grace so distinctive, so desirable, so (Continued on page 79)

LITTLE THINGS MEAN A LOT

Don't look for trouble in the Allyson-Powell ménage. Junie has learned a few small ways to keep a marriage happy!

BY ALICE HOFFMAN

On location in Utah with Dick, June surprised stepdaughter Ellen with a Sweet Sixteen party.

Among the guests was John Wayne's son Mike, who is making his movie debut under Dick's direction in The Conqueror—starring his father.

Ellen's brother Norman is appearing in the picture, too, brought his sister along for a vacation—and "just to be with Dad."

■ When June Allyson told some of her friends that she was going to St. George, Utah, "to be on location with Richard while he directs The Conqueror," they told her she was making a mistake.

"Look," one of them said, "you've just finished Strategic Air Command. You've been knocking yourself out in Ft. Worth and St. Petersburg and New Orleans. You're dead tired.

"St. George is a nice little town, but in the summer the mercury shoots up to about 130 degrees. It's no place to go for a rest, Junie."

Mrs. Richard Powell cocked her cute little head to one side.

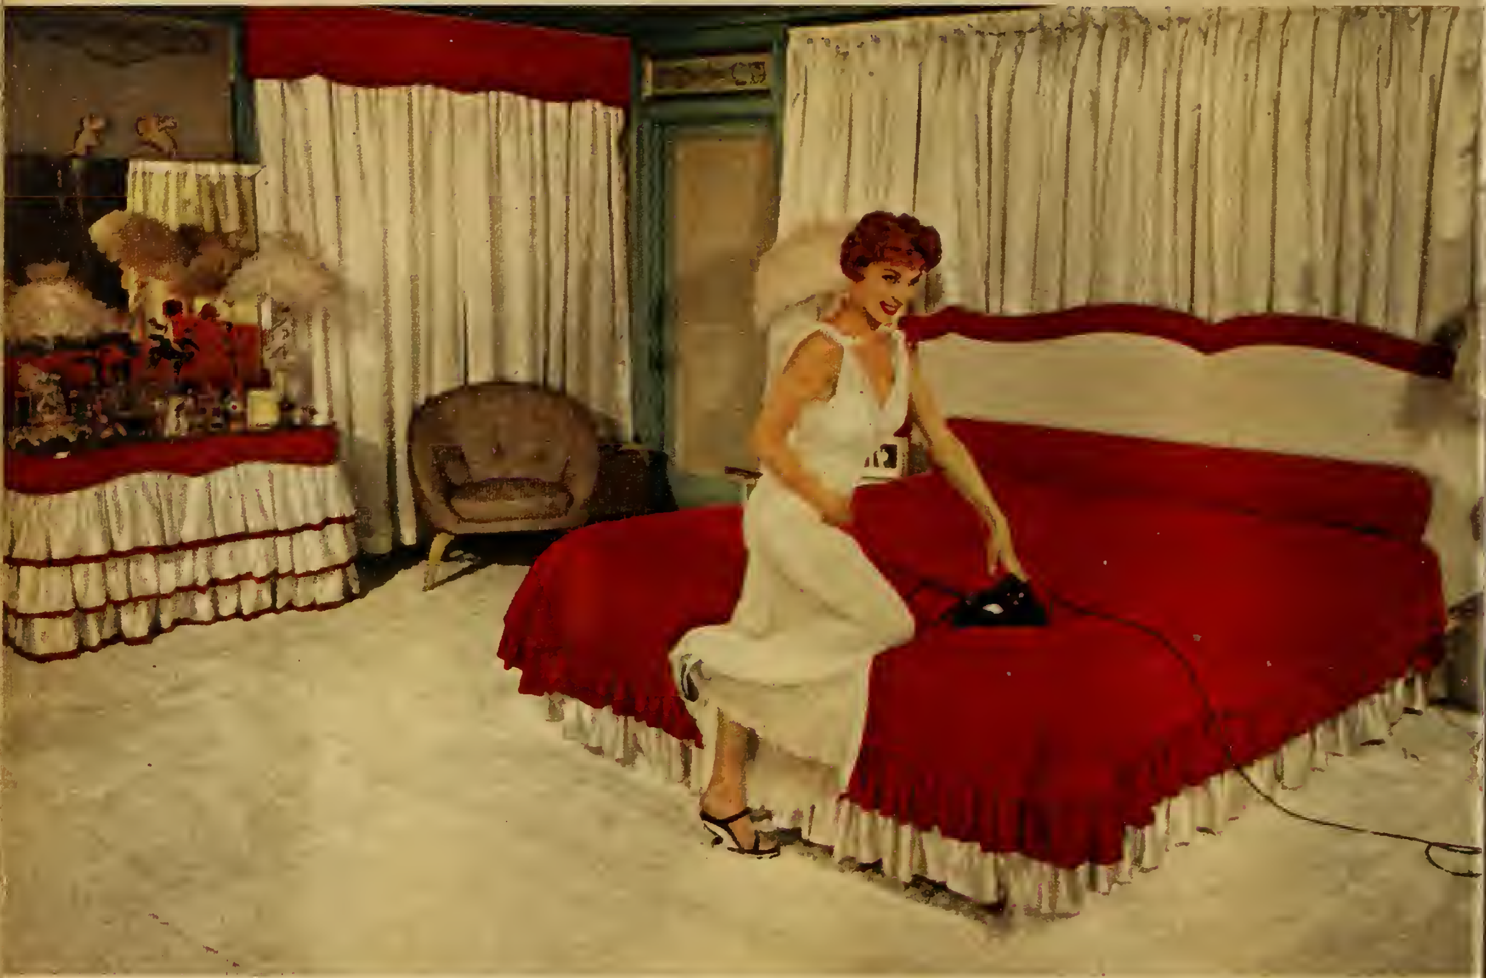
"I'm not going to St. George," she announced in that perennially husky voice, "to rest. I'm going there to be with Richard."

So June climbed into her Ford station wagon and with the Edgar Bergens beside her, headed for the miserable Utah desert. When she got to St. George she was assigned a room with her husband Dick in the Twin Oaks Motel.

Susan Hayward and John Wayne, who play the leads in The Conqueror (the story of Genghis Khan, the great Asiatic warrior), (Continued on page 103)

Despite the heat, June spent much of her time on the desert location with Dick, was furious at rumors that their nine-year-old marriage was in trouble.

abra-ca-Debra



Most of the rose velvet and white satin furnishings in Debra's huge corner suite came from her room in the Griffins' former home.

The Chinese room was the only spot in the twenty-five-room mansion not redecorated. Mama loved its vibrant tones, decided to mingle Chinese and modern motifs throughout house.

Over 300 yards of white carpet were laid down to lighten the large, dark rooms. The old-fashioned fireplace was re-done as a planting area for tropical greens. Note artificial flamingoes, toy dog—the Griffins have a live menagerie, too.

A dream-come-true is Debra's new home—but it took Paget magic to keep it from being a nightmare!

BY MARVA PETERSON

■ The house looked like something out of an old Boris Karloff movie.

Vacant and slowly decaying, it stood surrounded by its own jungle of weeds and overgrown shrubbery. Here and there a window was broken and a part of the stone masonry had fallen away. Compared to the usual immaculate houses in this part of Beverly Hills, it seemed dilapidated and antiquated.

Debra Paget was so disappointed she could have cried.

For as long as she could remember, her indomitable mother, Maggie, had promised the five children that if they were good, watched their weight and worked hard, some day they'd live in a big house with a swimming pool. And now on this cool star-bright evening, her parents were seriously considering moving into a "white elephant."

It was all Debra could do to stifle her tears. This deserted relic was hardly her dream of the ideal family homestead, particularly for a rising young movie star.

She looked around to see if anyone else shared her disappointment. In addition to her parents, there was Teala, her married sister, and William Barry, the friend who had (Continued on page 84)

Three-dimensional mermaid mural was painted in the hall by family friend, artist Arne Nybak, as a housewarming gift. "It sets the tone of the whole story-book house," Debra says.

EDMUND PURDOM:

From pauper to prince

BEFORE: Without a cent for passage home to England, unable to find work at a studio, not permitted by his visa to work anywhere else, Ed and wife Tita lived in this garage without hot water or refrigeration, ate when friends fed them. Three days after baby Lilan was born Tita was back to scrubbing diapers, washing Ed's one shirt and her only dress.

AFTER: Now living in this charming home, Ed and Tita regard the past as a nightmare, are grateful for big break which came when Mario Lanza refused to complete The Student Prince. Ed took over the role—with Lanza singing—and won raves. With four big productions coming up his future seems secure though some say he has a temperament problem.

BY HEDDA HOPPER

Ever hear of Horatio Alger? He created the American rags-to-riches idea. Ever hear of Edmund Purdom? He brought it to life!

■ Edmund Purdom is the man I was prepared to hate. When this English actor was given Mario Lanza's part in The Student Prince and Mario's God-given voice along with it, I rebelled. I had heard those Lanza recordings for the picture and thought they were the finest he'd ever done. To me it was unthinkable that Metro would hand the part over to an unknown Britisher. I said so in my column and, among other things, predicted the picture would be laughed off the screen.

Words don't taste bad. I know. I've just finished eating some of my own. I went to the preview of The Student Prince as a Lanza rooter —I still am. But when I left the theatre I was predicting that Edmund Purdom would be one of the biggest stars in Hollywood. He was terrific in the part—he really was a prince.

It's an uncomfortable experience watching such a replacement as this, but I can't blame MGM. They had lots of money tied up in the picture and when Lanza refused to work, they had to finish it somehow. The same thing happened after Marlon Brando walked out on The Egyptian. Purdom inherited that part also and after I watched him do some scenes on the set I came to the conclusion he was better in the part than Brando would have been.

Purdom didn't want to meet me until I'd seen The Student Prince. He has a (Continued on page 72)

WHAT'S SHE GOT?

It takes much more than beauty to give a girl a glamorous life. Here's how it's done by eight of Hollywood's most exciting stars.

←ESTHER WILLIAMS

She's got size. Esther is the tall girl's inspiration; she's proud of her height and capitalizes on it without making the fellows feel she's bigger than they are mentally or physically. How? By being healthy and vital instead of languishing; by being able to do anything the men can do—but not quite so well!

More pictures on following pages

ELAINE STEWART

She's got a surprise for everyone. She has face of a dreamer—and the mind of a business woman. That fragile, famous form you'll see in Brigadoon conceals the muscles of a wrestler (no kidding—prowlers beware!) and behind her reserved, seemingly conceited manner lurks a girl who hates compliments on her looks!

KIM NOVAK

She's got everything. What Monroe developed, Kim was born with. A sultry voice, a taste for luxury, a frank enjoyme of being voluptuous . . . plus an air that tells a man she doesn't care if he's five feet tall and homely—just as long as she knows he'd love her if she didn't look so good either. But she'll frank about it if he doesn't interest her at all.

ANNE BAXTER

She's got that rare combination: sex appeal an tact! She may be a femme fatale, but men know she'll conduct her romances on a kiss-an never-tell basis. She may win a top role in Ten Commandments—but her dates won't have to listen to her crow about beating Jane Russell Ava Gardner, Susan Hayward and twelve other beauties for it.

MARLA ENGLISH

She's got the knack of talking with her eyes and keeping her mouth shut! You'll see her do it in Living It Up. Men relax with Marla; she's a good listener. Other talents: she paints, and can chin herself twelve times in a row!

PAT CROWLEY

She's got enthusiasm. Morning, noon and night, pretty Pat effervesces, never holds still long enough for a man to get bored. Dates find her more fun than a barrel full of monkeys—or raving beauties!

TERRY MOORE

She's got energy. Terry can do anything—fly a plane, do a nitery act, make headlines daily. She's apt to tell a man what she thinks he'd like to hear; it may have a faint flavor of double-talk—but it's sure to be both kind and clever!

JULIA ADAMS

She's got a grown-up, happy way of life. Her favorite word: Upbeat. Her philosophy: Never dislike anyone or anything. The result: Stardom in Five Bridges To Cross.

← HOWARD KEEL There's a guy! Keel wants to be told—told what he's having for dinner, who's coming, what time it is. Demanding, though. You are a perfect wife and mother, or else! He'll let you have cooks, maids and nurses, but woe to you if you can't take over on servants' day off. This is the cover-up expert. Strangers say he's unsentimental, and true, he'll give a present like he's handing you a wet fish, but he'll shop frantically for your Christmas jewelry in July. The handiest man known to man, he can paper the house, fix the plumbing, paint the furniture. Don't call him up; he hates telephones, and has two in the house so he can detest them double. (Most actors can't live without four.) He barely holds still for photographs in public but surely he's a dream boat in one respect: he'd rather sleep late than make another million. When his kids rush in at six A.M., he groans, but he gets up and fixes breakfast, before reporting for work on Jupiter's Darling.

IF HE WERE YOUR HUSBAND...

here's what you'd have to know . . . and put up with . . . and laugh at . . . be proud of . . . and love!

← RICHARD WIDMARK You'd never be happy unless you appreciate a high I.Q. and have one yourself. But intellectual snobs need not apply. A small town boy (Sunrise, Minnesota) Dick was an instructor at Lake Forest U., and it's never quite brushed off. His modesty approaches timidity, yet he finds equal satisfaction in conversations with truck drivers and sophisticated authors. Adults find him hard to understand, but kids know instinctively that he's a kindred soul. If you were married to Dick you'd never attend boring dinner parties with business friends—he refuses to "cultivate" people. Mr. Widmark stays close to home and has brushed off numerous little Hollywood blondes. Yet he has two girls he loves, his wife and eight-year-old daughter, Ann. When he vacations, the family lives the champagne life because he doesn't propose to take it with him. All he asks in return is companionship, and some day, he'd like a son to carry on his name. His latest film is Prize Of Gold.

VICTOR MATURE He might hand you a $3.98 doll for your birthday to see if you loved him enough to keep quiet. Then two days later he'd pick you up and show you a new Caddy in the garage. He'd demand chili for breakfast, cut your allowance to lend money to a pal, then send your mom and dad to Honolulu for their anniversary. He'd disappear for days, and when you were about to consult a lawyer, he'd return, having been on a hunting trip in some remote spot where the only "other woman" was a 107-year-old Indian. He hates routine so much you'd get to bed at six A.M. or four P.M. You'd be expected not to complain if he played golf from sunup to sundown and your only defense would be to take up the game yourself. Any girl who weds Mature needs the balance of a lady juggler to stay happy in the perpetual emotional blizzard, but he's a spectacular provider, a wonderful father, loads of fun and a top-flight actor as he proves again in Betrayed. →

IF HE WERE YOUR HUSBAND... continued

BURT LANCASTER The only genuine Hollywood non-conformist (and proves it by staying out of headlines) 41-year-old Burt can lick his weight in men half his age. Other men speak softly in his presence, and you'll find him generous. But he'll expect you to prepare dinner for fourteen on an hour's notice and get sore if you protest. He'll expect you to stay calm amid the bedlam of five kids and a couple of pals because noise doesn't bother him. He'll make you stand in line at a restaurant rather than use his name to get a table. He can drop a week's salary in a poker game (until he grows older and more mellow) and not go sour or raid the sugar bowl for your household money. You'll wish his conscience wouldn't hurt because he has five dollars more than the next fellow, but he's a great guy to grow up with. He'll always frighten you a little when you watch him in pictures like Vera Cruz—you'll be afraid that when he holds you he'll crush your ribs. But he won't. He has a heart like a wild animal but he's gentle as a lamb.

STEWART GRANGER The lazier the gal the better he likes her. Marry Granger and you don't have to worry about boiling water. But there are drawbacks. He prefers his female beautiful, but she'll spend most of her life in blue jeans. He likes to stay home and really does prefer a good book to people. His girl must love to swim, own a good pair of lungs and a sense of humor. She'll have to learn to take being ducked in the pool and give as good as she gets. He has an atom bomb temper, but when a row is over it's over for good. He hates intellectual snobs, but you'll have to argue intelligently—and loud. He takes pride in being a terrific host, will tell the servants to get lost while he serves the buffet. Know your shortcomings, because he will be the first to admit his. He'll also admit he's got a magic wallop for the opposite sex. But though he'll battle the world in his profession, and rise to new heights in a film like Beau Brummell he'll wind up just like a kid at night, with his head on your shoulder. Wow!

AUDIE MURPHY Warn your friends never to cross him. He has a memory to shame elephants. When he's moody he may not talk for hours; then he snaps out of it, but won't say what he was thinking. No matter how famous he becomes his friends remain the same, and he likes his wife to entertain old pals. He's not a heavy-handed father, and your son will be his shadow-companion. He likes horses and dogs but is not overly sentimental about them; his deep affection, not freely expressed, is strictly for his wife and family. Even when you're in the money he'll be content (and you'll have to be, too) to live slightly on the wrong side of the tracks because he has an abiding suspicion of too much luxury. In a movie like To Hell And Back he'll concentrate completely, but you'll find his understanding of the deepest variety and know that he'd give his life for you at a moment's notice. Disapproval he voices with a bleak look that delivers the message but doesn't linger. Trouble comes only if you dote on horror TV shows. He'll shut off the set in front of your nose.

This is Fred and June's honeymoon bungalow.

FOR LOVERS ONLY

by William Barbour

If you've ever been in love you'll rejoice for June and Fred—and for their happy honeymoon. And you'll forget their troubles—recent and past—as they already have.

■ For June Haver and Fred MacMurray there was no honeymoon hideaway. Their bridal suite was a glamourless bungalow overlooking a forest of cameras and floodlights. Privacy? Not much, but June and Fred thought it was heavenly.

They drove to Moran, Wyoming, a picturesque village in the beautiful Grand Teton National Forest. Fred was on location working in Blue Horizons, a film about the Lewis & Clark Expedition, "trying to earn some money to pay for the house we just bought." (A month before they were married, June and Fred bought Nelson Eddy's Hollywood estate for $130,000.)

While Fred was emoting with Charlton Heston and Donna Reed in front of the VistaVision cameras, June remained in their one-room bungalow, fighting the Wyoming mosquitoes and ironing her husband's shirts on an ironing board borrowed from the prop department.

One morning Fred returned from the location with a little grin playing across his face. June was busy rinsing out a few of her own clothes.

Fred took her in his arms and kissed her lightly on the lips. "Listen, Shorty," he said, "how about a little fishing up in Yellowstone this afternoon? I finished early today."

"Just great!" June agreed. "I'll pack a picnic lunch and we'll have a ball."

Thirty minutes later the newlyweds were sitting in their grey Cadillac convertible, and Fred was driving to one of his favorite trout streams.

Arriving at the picnic site, June began to unpack the hamper while Fred with his fishing rod made a bee-line for the trout.

Once she had her picnic lunch set out neatly and properly, June flopped down on the grass, clasped her hands behind her neck, and closed her eyes. This was joy and love and peace and contentment—resting here on a river bank, waiting for the sound of a (Continued on page 64)

Fishing on Fred's afternoons off allowed them to be really alone—though tactful co-workers always respected their privacy.

Fred took photos of June wherever they went. Both behaved, according to the crew, "like people who knew what marriage was all about. Not mawkish, but loving!"

The photo above, Fred's favorite honeymoon snapshot of June, was mailed home to the MacMurrays' adopted children, Sue and Bobby. The kids were the first to know about the marriage; they approved of it wholeheartedly.

Talking shop with cast members, June admitted that she wants to return to pictures. "The kids are in school," she said, "and I've always liked to stay busy."

The mosquitoes were awful, the heat bad and the dust even worse—but the honeymoon? That was perfect!

(Continued from page 63) loved one's voice or the soft touch of his hand. And then it came, the moist pressure upon her forehead.

"Ah, Fred," June murmured, her eyes still closed in ecstatic bliss.

Another kiss, this one extremely wet. And then June MacMurray opened her big blue eyes and found herself looking up at a full-sized grizzly bear, one of the hundreds that are allowed to roam at will around Yellowstone National Park.

"Fred!" June shouted, scampering to her feet. "Fred!" And with that she broke all existing speed records sprinting down to the trout stream.

"A bear," she called out. "A bear, Fred. He's eating our picnic lunch. I thought he was you."

MacMurray edged his way out of the stream. He grabbed a small log. "You stay behind me," he cautioned. Then he advanced toward the grizzly, slowly and carefully.

He succeeded in frightening the bear away from the picnic lunch but not for long. The bear sniffed more food in Fred's car and shuffled toward the Cadillac. Fred was afraid the animal might dig its claws into the convertible top and rip it, so he took a sandwich and using it as bait, drew the bear from the car. Then he and June slid in and drove back to Moran, laughing most of the way.

That night when Fred and June told producer Bill Pine what had happened to them, Pine grinned.

"That," he said, "is exactly the kind of story the publicity department is accused of making up."

But to June the bear incident "will always remain one of the highlights of our honeymoon."

This honeymoon began on (Continued on page 94)

My Everyday God

■ There is a stained glass window in the roof of St. Paul's in Los Angeles which is a replacement. About eleven years ago I smashed a baseball through the original pane. I was a student at St. Paul's parochial school and my class was playing ball in the yard during recess. When I saw what I had done the bat slipped from my fingers and I stood there trembling. At the age of twelve, having made my first Holy Communion only a few months before, I had brought the wrath of God upon myself—or so it seemed to me.

You know how boys are. Some of the other kids laughed nervously, and enough of them were so shocked—and looked it—that the enormity of my offense was something I had to believe. I watched dully as my older brother, Walt, ran into the church to find the ball and came out yelling to show that he had it. And then I went slowly to tell the priest what I had done.

Never again, since that day, has the church ever been a heaviness in my soul. I don't remember what words the priest used to make me realize that love, not fear, is the keynote of worship, but in time, the effect of his words was complete. I am not on formal relations with faith and I never shall be. The business of coming to Mass late, and leaving early, and for that short duration being a religious man, has no (Continued on page 92)

24 hours

■ MODERN SCREEN photographer Bert Parry spent a day with Tony Curtis—trying to find out where he's going in such a hurry.

Knowing that the average man should go into training for at least six weeks before such a rash undertaking—and being an intelligent type—Bert did the next best thing. He bolted a mouthful of super-charged vitamin capsules and conned an overnight invitation from Janet and Tony in order to start his day the night before.

Arriving shortly after the dinner hour, Bert suggested that they get some art of a warmish nature while the opportunity presented itself, and the kids fell to with a goodly will. As the camera—which never lies—recorded every detail, Tony looked tenderly into the eyes of his beautiful wife and said, "Sweetie, I saw an ad in this morning's paper about a house in Coldwater Canyon that looks like just what we want."

"Kiss!" commanded Photographer Parry.

They obeyed with alacrity; then Tony lifted his lips from hers, and Janet asked, "How much?" When Tony told her the asking price on this paragon of houses, she winced. All that!"

"Just one more," said Bert Parry.

The Curtises rubbed noses and puckered up again until they heard the shutter click. "It has a tennis court, sweetie," Tony wheedled.

"Well," said Janet, "but all that money—"

"Just one more," interpolated the voice of Mr. Parry like a broken record.

Janet fell into Tony's embrace with renewed ardor while the camera made noises like a Gatling gun. When it stopped, Tony made his big pitch. "I—uh—talked to the real estate agent today. He said that if we sign a two-year lease, they'll put in a pool!" His expression of triumph was a thing of beauty.

"Don't go 'way," muttered their guest. "Just have to reload the camera."

They ignored him. "I don't know." Janet was still evasive, but her protests were growing feeble. "Two years is a long time. Maybe we'll be able to save enough to buy our own home before then." That's the agreement between Janet and Tony; they'll pay cash on the barrelhead for the house they buy. Partly to escape monthly notes at a high rate of interest, but mostly because it has to be theirs right from the beginning.

"All set," announced Bert. "Let's get back to work."

"This is work?" Tony murmured as Jan leaned invitingly close.

Fifty-five shots later they broke it up. Bert Parry reclined on the couch, doubtless dreaming of a dark darkroom and all those exclusive pictures. Janet, having made a tentative promise to look at the house tomorrow, was let off the hook and disappeared. Tony settled down with the (Continued on page 68)

(Continued from page 66) evening papers. Houdina went over and bit Bert on the ankle. All in all, it was a sweet domestic scene.

The peaceful silence was short-lived, however. Suddenly Tony shook his dark head disgustedly. "Jeez!" he said. "How do you like that!"

Bert looked up from the limb he was examining in the light of a possible damage suit. "Like what?"

"Listen," asked Tony. "How many pictures did you shoot this evening?"

"Sixty-seven, maybe?" offered our modest cameraman.

"At least that many. So I just get finished kissing my wife sixty-seven times, now I pick up the paper and read that we aren't getting along. The Curtises, it says in this column, are headed for a showdown!"

Their brooding over the injustice of it all was male, companionable—and of short duration. "Well," Bert said facetiously, "you know what they say about a kiss in time. Maybe you ought to try giving Janet a great big buss."

The smile Tony gave him was like sucking lemons. "For that witticism, pal, I'm going to let you walk the dog tonight. And it's past her usual time, so beat feet."

"That's supposed to be your job," Bert protested, trying to feel like a put-upon guest. "And she doesn't like me, anyhow. What are you going to do?"

"Read the box score on the game the Giants played yesterday," retorted his host.

Which just goes to prove that it's pretty tough to earn a living in Hollywood. The skills of an expert cameraman are many and varied, but they don't include walking the dogs of movie stars. At that, Bert was lucky; during his stroll with Houdina, she only nipped him twice.

When he returned to the house, bleeding ever so slightly from the ego, he found Tony doing exactly what he had said—reading the sports section—with a broad grin of satisfaction. Janet was practicing a dance routine for her forthcoming My Sister Eileen to a playback, and Mr. Parry's countenance brightened at the sight of lithe convolutions intended to incite a man's baser instincts. His admiration was constrained, however, by the fact that he had no wish to invite a jealous belt on the dewlaps from Miss Leigh's husband, who was reportedly not getting along with his wife.

Maybe they weren't getting along, but Mr. Curtis was keeping an interested eye on the gyrations of Mrs. Curtis. Once, when she collapsed to the floor and lay supine, breathing deeply, he lowered his paper, regarded her with a jaundiced eye, and deadpanned, "If you're ever going to learn this number, may I suggest that you elevate your exquisite derriere from the floor and get with it?" Or words to that effect.

Janet answered, "Yes, master," and didn't move a muscle until Tony rose, extended a hand and pulled her gently to her feet. It's too bad that Bert hadn't time to grab his camera again before she had thanked her husband with a feathery kiss, but then, that picture would have been no more spontaneous than those he had already shot. Shared by these two, a kiss is a kiss is a kiss.

A little later they all said good night, and Bert retired to the couch. It seemed to him that he had no sooner rested his head on the pillow next to Houdina's (she either loved him too much to endure a separation or hated him enough to assure him a miserable night) than he was shaken roughly by the shoulder. "Rise and shine!" sang Tony Curtis, happy as a clam by the dawn's early light. He looked so young and vital and handsome that a mere mortal cameraman shuddered to view his own unshaven image in the bathroom mirror.

Better that Bert hadn't taken time to shave, because as a result he had no breakfast. Janet, whose picture was still in the rehearsal stage, sat down to a reasonably leisurely (Continued on page 87)

■ For Mrs. Alexander Crichlow Barker, 2d, of Holmby Hills, California, it was one of those times when a lady doesn't know whether to laugh, cuss or cry.

Here she was on her dainty knees, scouring the bathroom tile with her newly restored blonde coiffure wadded up in a scarf and a feeling of desperation beneath it. The couple who took care of her big house had walked out that morning and the upstairs maid had given notice. Fourteen dinner guests were due in a few hours and out in front the newly widened driveway was a fresh mass of gooey tar. A cement mixer rasped dismally beside the new guest wing which gave no indication whatever that it would be ready for the arrival of her sister-in-law from the east. The carpenters had just built the steps in front of the place instead of behind it as designed and the warm grey paint she'd chosen had come out an asphyxiation blue and would have to be done over. There was silver to polish, the house to clean and a hundred urgent items hammering at her nerves.

A discordant crash of piano keys smote them next, along with a frustrated wail from her daughter Cherry, "I'll never learn to play this silly thing!" Mrs. B. had all she could take.

"Cheryl Christina!" she yelped, using the full, formal tag reserved for discipline, "you put your mind to your practicing and not another peep out of you! I'm in no condition." Then, unkinking her cramped legs, she dragged herself wearily into the den and collapsed on the sofa, with feet propped on the arm for relief. At this point of surrender a blandly handsome giant, irritatingly cool, calm and dripping pool water, strolled into the room and inquired pleasantly, "Hi, Mama—taking it easy?"

Mama leaped to her feet as if a bee had stung her. "Taking it easy!" she cried indignantly. "Why, (Continued on page 99)

(Continued from page 53) justifiable ego and he was angry at what I had written before seeing him on the screen. But my enthusiasm was so great when I did see him that the atmosphere was cleared, and we were buddies when he and his wife Tita sat down to tell me the story of their Hollywood struggles. I'm a sucker for a sob story.

They're a stunning couple. He has had $15,000,000 invested in him by two studios before the public has even had a chance to see him. Purdom is handsome in the romantic tradition—wavy black hair, dark eyes and classic features. Hollywood has tied the "glamour boy" tag on him but he's a lot more than that. He has a fiery temperament, a cultural education, musical knowledge, talent and a world of charm. And his bubbling blonde wife Tita is as frank and communicative as a child; gay, pretty, talented (she's a ballet dancer) with a rare zest for life.

When Purdom was thrown out of a Shakespearean acting bit at Stratford-on-Avon after what he describes as a "disagreement with the management," famous director Tyrone Guthrie commented: "It won't hurt him. He'll either starve or be a star in five years."

That was four years ago and both predictions were correct. It's hard to think of these two as hungry, cold and so broke they didn't even have bus fare. They were many times without a roof over their heads during a grisly year in which they fought for a foothold in movies. It's harder to understand how some of their compatriots gave them nothing but such advice as: "Go home. There are too many Britishers here already." Nor is it easy to conceive that agents told Edmund: "Your accent is hopeless. We can't get parts for any more British actors." But it's heartwarming to learn that helping hands with folding money were held out by sympathetic strangers the Purdoms had met casually in their search for work—new friends who fed them.

Purdom's salary jumped overnight from $350 a week to $2000 per. We met for dinner because he was working day and night and mealtime was his only chance to talk. The Purdoms arrived in a sleek Alvis.

"This is a celebration," he told me. "We got our things out of hock this afternoon. Tita's wedding and engagement rings and her father's watch—they've been in and out of pawnshops a dozen times this past year. We paid interest so they wouldn't be sold—two dollars a month—and sometimes we went without dinner to scrape the money together."

"But how," I asked, "did you ever get into such a jam?"

"I came here for a contract test at Warners," Purdom said. "We had been in New York. I had a small part in Caesar And Cleopatra with Laurence Olivier and Vivien Leigh. The arrangements for the test had been made in London when a scout saw me there. At the close of the play Warners advanced me $600 and a ticket to Hollywood. By that time practically every studio here had offered me a test, but I was committed to Warners. I felt if that didn't work out, I was pretty certain to land something else. Twentieth offered to test me for My Cousin Rachel, among other things. When I accepted the $600 advance I cut myself off from having my fare paid back to England by the Olivier company. So I made the Warners test with Mike Curtiz, but nothing came of it.

"It didn't happen so quickly, however. There was a month of encouragements and delays before my option was dropped. Tita had joined me here. My chance at Rachel was gone as Richard Burton had been signed. Other things were cropping up and Mr. Curtiz advised me to stay on and Tita and I talked it over and agreed this was the time to gamble as both Universal-International and Twentieth were offering tests for a contract. I decided on Twentieth. The test was made by Sammy Fuller. It was a sort of a Scotland Yard thing, a fast-talking detective. It was without meaning and when studio heads saw it they lost interest. Then our finances were almost gone but I wasn't afraid. I thought I'd take a job at anything, any sort of work, to keep going. But when I tried to get work at a market I learned that my visitor's permit allowed me to work in America only in a picture studio."

Tita took up the story: "We were in real trouble; we were entering on what we call our abject misery period. We were living in a garage on Berendo Street which cost thirty dollars a month, but that was an unreasonable amount considering our lack of cash. Sometimes we had ten dollars a week for food, but the time came when food became a matter of luck. We had a bed, two chairs, cold water only, no refrigerator. There was no insulation and in August the heat was indescribable. I was expecting a baby—our first. I lived in one dress and Edmund had one good shirt which I washed out every night."

"Americans we'd meet would ask us to dinner or slip a ten-dollar bill in my coat pocket along with words of encouragement," Purdom said. "There was always something in view but the timing was bad. Timing is so important, not only in acting but in being available for opportunities when they are offered. You feel sure you can make good if you get the chance, but in my case so many things were contingent on opportunity timings. Our visa was running out and we were terrified of being deported. If you're sent out of the country it's almost impossible to get back in. We were conscious, too, of how our parents were worrying. Either Tita's parents or mine would gladly have helped but they were not allowed to send money into a dollar country."

"We couldn't go to a clinic when it was time for the baby to be born," said Tita, "because we were here on temporary stay. I'll never forget Millie Gusse's face when I asked her where the charity hospital was located. Millie has been one of our most faithful friends from the day we met her. She was casting director at Universal-International. She was horrified at the idea of my having a baby under such circumstances, so she arranged to have her brother-in-law, Dr. James Winsberg, see me. He was wonderful and kept me supplied with pills and vitamins and things and told me he'd deliver the baby without fee since my father and brother both were doctors. Millie tried so hard to get Edmund into U-I and when that didn't work out she introduced him to Paul Gregory and to some TV people who were casting. She gave us all the clothes for the baby—blankets and everything. She has the greatest heart in the world."

"Then when Tita was due for the hospital I got a job in Julius Caesar," Edmund told me. "A small part—two days' work. I had to stab James Mason and say, 'I am sorry, my lord.' That's as close as I ever got to him. That day I hitch-hiked a ride to Twentieth to check on a part in Titanic. Nothing was decided, so I started walking to Culver City. I was so nervous I'd be late that I ran half the way. But I got the part and I immediately borrowed $150 advance from my agent Paul Small and went right over to the Culver City Hospital and arranged for Tita to enter. The night Lilan—we call her Mrs. Doody—was born, I walked over there to see her.

"Strange things happen when you're in trouble. I remember once we were evicted for non-payment of rent. Liz Fielding appeared out of nowhere and took us to live with her. She was like the hand of God.

"Another time when I was up for the part of Mr. Lightoller in Titanic, I had little hope since they turned me down on a contract. But I held onto that one-in-a-million chance. I waited and waited, but no word. It seems everyone knew I had the part but they thought I had been told and through some oversight neglected to tell me. We were going around in circles. We couldn't go home, we didn't have any money. Our parents were worried—they were slowly going out of their minds. Then we heard the good news.

"In another desperate moment I put an advertisement in a local paper to sell my gramophone equipment so we could eat. Then in the mail came a check for $100 from another American who insists on not being named. He merely told us to use it and pay it back when we could. Those were the wonderful things."

When Tita Purdom went into the hospital on that $150 advance, she could stay only three days.

"Then back to the garage," she said. "I was up washing diapers and dishes and everything else the day after they brought me home. There was an old two-burner stove but only one burner and the oven worked. Fortunately I breast-fed the baby because, having no refrigerator—not even an old ice chest—we had no way to keep milk in summer weather. But my brother, who is a doctor, used to work in the East End of London and made a discovery that's practically infallible. Children who have been breast-fed for at least three months seldom get infantile paralysis. It isn't proven, but statistics indicate it."

Right after Titanic, Edmund got his contract at Metro and they moved into a little apartment above the Sunset Strip. He was still getting $350 a week when he went to Twentieth as the star of The Egyptian.

Others who helped them were Sidonie Espero and John Steel. When the worst was over they ran into Linda Christian and Ty Power. "I went to school with Linda in Palestine," Tita told me. "When Edmund was set in Titanic, they took us on a trip to Mexico and when we returned we stayed in the guest room at their house until we got a larger place. We were expecting another baby in July, our apartment lease was up and we had to have more room. The day we moved our things were carried over in the bureau drawers from Linda's; we had no suitcases and no luggage left."

Purdom was secure by the time they moved into the comfortable three-bedroom house in Beverly Hills they now occupy. "Ty Power's business agent found the house for us," Tita said, "and we had to move in on Sunday since I was unable to help and it was the only day Edmund had free. He had to be at the studio early Monday morning for make-up tests. We couldn't get a moving van so Edmund and Alabam Davis, his stand-in, and John Bryant, another friend who had been splendid through it all, made the move themselves."

THIS NEW STAR with the strange up-and-down history is a genius at electronics; he has assembled his own high fidelity equipment and built one for the Tyrone Powers. He is probably the one person who could pick up Mario Lanza's sound track and complete a polished and inspired performance. His father is an authority on Shakespeare, and a well-known drama critic and author in England. Charles B. Purdom is now working on books about Bernard Shaw and Harley Granville Barker. His father objected to Edmund's acting ambitions because he believed his talent for electronics could give him a more substantial life. Edmund was born Edmund Anthony Cutlar Purdom and hung onto the first and last names in spite of our best efforts to call him Edmund York. He was born at Welwyn Garden City near London and raised in a Benedictine monastery where the rugged routine included ice cold showers even on winter mornings. He attributes much of his freedom from colds to this Spartan beginning. He earned his first money by delivering newspapers. At nineteen he went into the theatre. He was in England's Bedfordshire and Hartfordshire Regiments in World War II but was later transferred to the entertainment division. He is not yet thirty and has a long movie future before him. Metro has a long list of big productions lined up for him including The Prodigal and Ben Hur after Athena.

His wife Tita was born Anita Mary Esther Phillips. She's half English and half Swedish but was born in France. Her father, who died last year, was once a physician to the Sultan of Johore. She traveled extensively when he was in the English Colonial Service. She is a ballerina, having joined the Sadler's Wells Ballet during the war. She has done both legitimate stage work and cinema in England and has played one part in Hollywood, a Cockney maid.

BEING BITTERLY poor is no fun anywhere. But in Hollywood where life is glossy and luxurious, where there are more long cars and swimming pools than people, where even the dogs have their own beauty parlors, it's cruel indeed. Edmund Purdom walked from one casting office to another until the soles were out of his shoes and often had a full meal only when some thoughtful person invited him and his wife home for dinner.

"When I think back on how we literally clawed our way into a desperate survival," he told me, "how we had to beg and borrow and go without—I wonder how we came through it. At the time we accepted it and made the best of it from day to day. Looking back, it seems as unreal as a nightmare and I hope it will fade from our minds as quickly as dreams do."

But the sour side of stardom has already reared its ugly head. Among the fan letters have been many roundly abusing him for daring to take over the Mario Lanza role.

After news of his increase in salary was printed, he had to have the gearshift of his English car repaired. He located the salesman, who told him the cost should come around $100 or $125 at the most and told him where to go. But the car came back with a $530 bill. "Worst of all," he fumed in telling the story, "the thing worked only in one gear."

I TALKED WITH Millie Gusse, their good angel. She had been to an auction with Tita Purdom the night before and tells me she sees a great deal of them. She tried hard to sell Purdom to U-I. It's amazing how many studios missed the boat.

"You know the boy now, Hedda, and you know he would attract anybody who looked at him," she said. But when I told her that the Purdoms had enumerated all the things she had done for them, she tossed it off with: "All I want in exchange is the baby, Mrs. Doody, but they won't give her to me. When you meet her, you'll want her, too."

Tita fascinates everyone who meets her. "She was five months pregnant when I met her," Millie told me, "and she still hadn't been to a doctor. She has amazing courage and she asked me quite casually where the charity hospital was. I nearly fell down. You don't permit this. So I sent her to my brother-in-law who is an obstetrician and she was in good hands. He delivered the second daughter on July 9—nice, isn't it?" Millie Gusse thinks Tita is terrific as an actress. "She's a young Gracie Fields," was her summing up of Tita's performance in Man In The Attic, which she did between babies.

Tita Purdom has a professional career of her own if she wants it after the little family is all straightened out. While she was living with Liz Fielding she had her nose bobbed. Liz drove her back and forth to Long Beach during the ordeal. It was her husband's first present to Tita after he got his MGM contract.

Some of Edmund's friends think his temperament may get in the way of his progress. He's a nervous fellow; quick, highly intelligent, with strong likes and dislikes. He admits he is thoughtless. "I never remember birthdays or anniversaries, my own included. And I don't like imposing my birthdays on other people." Others hint at a tremendous ego. From what I have seen of his work I feel it's justified. Those who know them both say they have never seen so much courage in any two people. They faced the facts with no gripes, and that's what attracted so many people to them.

THOMPSON'S HIDEAWAY

Let others go to parties—
Carlos would rather stay home and write a good book!

■ Shades of the day when Peter the Hermit was more famous than the stars—Hollywood now has another man who is forsaking its glamorous streets. Carlos Thompson, MGM's famous import from Argentina, has moved out of Beverly Hills to a retreat in Topango Canyon, two thirds of the way up a mountain. There, surrounded by his books in a rustic house, safe from prowlers because of the rattlesnakes outside, Carlos intends to live.

The blond, six-foot-two star of Valley Of The Kings, who first attracted attention in this country in Flame And The Flesh, simply became weary of having people continually dropping in on him in his Beverly Hills home. Carlos, despite his extreme popularity as an escort for eligible glamour girls, is not simply long on profile and short on brains. He writes books—cracking good ones. His first, a collection of short stories under the title All Is God has had a fabulous sale in South America. His second, a highly controversial novel under the title The Other Cheek, will shortly be published. So far none of his writings has been translated from the Spanish, but he's working on that in his hideaway.

In South America Carlos played heavy, sadistic roles and he's a little frightened at suddenly popping out in movies as a singer. "I'm afraid that when they see me in my home country the audiences will rise up and shout, 'Oh no, not that, Carlos!' "

He needn't worry. Even among hostesses, Carlos is second in popularity only to Gable. South of the border, it's no doubt the same.

who is the mysterious master mind?

Rita's peace at Tahoe was purely physical. She and her two little girls swam in the lake and sunned themselves on the shore and stayed very much to themselves. But Rita was wracked by thoughts of persecution.

In her own mind, she is convinced that a powerful Hollywood motion picture executive is determined to ruin her life unless she gets rid of Dick Haymes. And this is one move she will not make, one threat she refuses to bow down to.

She is deeply in love with the Argentine-born crooner, may even be carrying his child at this very moment, and no matter how tough things are made for her, she is determined to sacrifice everything for love and family.

RITA HAS HAD rough sledding ever since she married Haymes in Las Vegas last summer. After the wedding, which was staged at the Sands Hotel under the supervision of press agent Al Freeman, Rita and Dick and her two little girls flew to Greenwich, Connecticut, where Rita had rented a fourteen-room house from a Mr. Joseph Kraeler.

Last summer when she was asked why she was leaving Hollywood, she said, "I think we'll be happier in the east. Things are less frantic there."

It didn't work out that way. For example, when Rita and Dick decided to leave Connecticut early this year and move into the Plaza Hotel in New York City, a deputy sheriff held most of their personal belongings, charging that they owed $675 back rent and had inflicted $4000 worth of damage on Kraeler's house. In order to obtain their belongings, the Haymeses had to post a $5000 bond.

Once in New York, Rita and Dick were exhausted and decided that they could do with a little Florida vacation. So they put Rebecca and Yasmin under the care of Mrs. Dorothy Chambers, an old friend of the Haymes family. She is a wonderful woman who owns an antique shop in Westchester County.

While Rita and Dick were in Florida, a mysterious "someone" filed charges with the Westchester County Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children that Rita's two daughters were being shamefully neglected.

Rita has a pretty good idea who instigated the charges but she's keeping the identity of the culprit to herself.

You can imagine how Rita felt, however, when she picked up a newspaper one morning last spring and read that a Children's Court Judge had issued an order placing her two little girls in the protective custody of the Westchester sheriff.

If the person who had made the charges were really concerned about the welfare of the girls, he could have picked up the phone and made a collect call to Rita in Florida to say, "The woman in charge of your children is neglecting them shamefully."

Why didn't he do that instead of filing charges with the Children's Society? As Mrs. Chambers herself said at the time, "I wish to God I knew who started this. I'd slap him with a suit for defamation of character. It's beautiful and it's pathetic. Nobody who is really thinking of these children would do a thing like this."

Rita, of course, raced home from Florida while newspapers everywhere carried sensational charges: RITA HAYWORTH ACCUSED OF CHILD NEGLECT. RITA FACES NEGLECT CHARGES.

It was ironic. Rita has looked after those two children from the days of their births while their two fathers, Orson Welles and Aly Khan, have been cavorting all over Europe with beautiful women. They contribute practically nothing to the support of their children, although every now and then one reads that Aly is about to settle a million on Yasmin. One is prompted to ask, "A million what?" Thus far, he has only promised to pay $8,000 a year for her support, and Rita has yet to see the $8,000.

When Rita turned up at the Children's Court in White Plains, New York, on April 26, Judge George W. Smyth absolved her of neglecting her daughters. She was told she could keep custody of Rebecca and Yasmin, but at the same time she was cautioned to keep Rebecca in school.

There was a closed hearing for two hours after which the judge disclosed that he had been in contact with Prince Aly Khan and actor Orson Welles and that they both had characterized Rita as "a loving mother."

The judge intimated that the neglect charges had been filed because Rebecca was out of school while her mother was away. Just who was keeping such close track of Rita and her children no one is saying. Certainly, Rebecca's education hasn't been neglected. She is a bright child.

BEFORE RITA had got over the heartache connected with the rearing of her daughters she was faced with the prospect of losing her husband.

As practically everyone knows, the U.S. Immigration Department began proceedings last year to deport Dick Haymes. By claiming to be a citizen of a neutral nation, Argentina, Haymes had managed to remain draft-free during World War II. Because of this he was not allowed to leave the United States. Last winter, however, he flew to Hawaii to visit Rita while she was making a picture there.

Upon returning to California he was told that he was liable for deportation to Argentina because he had left the country. Haymes swears that before he left the country he asked the Immigration officials if there was any law against his taking the trip.

Richard Cody, a former Immigration employee, has sworn in a closed hearing that he was ordered not to tell Haymes anything, that, in fact, "an entrapment" was set for the singer.

Haymes' lawyer, David Marcus, is convinced that, "someone has been trying to make Haymes the scapegoat. Just who wants him out of the country, I don't know. I've heard it said that if Haymes gets shipped, Hayworth will be more tractable. I don't think so. If Haymes is deported, I'm sure Mrs. Haymes will follow.

"But at this point it doesn't look as if Dick will be deported so easily. His warrant of deportation has been canceled and the Immigration Department's Board of Appeals has been scrupulously fair."

IT IS SIGNIFICANT that while Haymes' hearing was in progress, Rita's studio gave out the assertion that in no way was it interested in the outcome. This is meaningful because it has been suggested in many quarters that it is Rita's studio that lies behind all her heartache and trouble.

Rita has her own film producing company, Beckworth Productions. Only recently her company filed suit against Columbia Pictures asking for an accounting of $13,000,000 worth of film product.

One well-known Hollywood observer says, "It's really very simple. Some of the big shots think that Dick inspired the suit against Columbia. They think that if they can get rid of Dick, Hayworth will be very easy to handle. They think Haymes is 'the heavy' in the case."

Columbia Pictures describes this and similar allegations as "ridiculous." Rita is under suspension for refusing to make pictures at Columbia, and as soon as she returns, expressing her willingness to work, she goes back on the payroll at approximately $5,000 a week.

It is no secret that Rita wants to get out of her Columbia contract. She will do anything to sever her association with that particular studio. She will give up her lawsuit, her claims to any money due her, her residual interests in films, everything. She just does not want to make another picture for Columbia.

As a result of this adamant attitude, she is dead broke and living on borrowed money.

Haymes, of course, has no money, and is being sued for non-support by two of his former wives, Joanne Dru and Nora Eddington.

So, all things considered, it's really pitiful. These two people have devoted the best, most fruitful years of their lives to show business.

The woman, Rita Hayworth, is broke, harried, condemned, subjected to the most unfair attacks, private and public, ever directed at any famous figure.

The man, Dick Haymes, is broke, too, threatened with jail and deportation.

IN THE WHOLE WORLD these two have only each other to count on for support and encouragement. They are both convinced that eventually they will fight their way through the darkness that threatens now to engulf them. And the beacon of light that will see them through is their potent and continuing love.

"It is very easy to love and be happy," Rita once said, "when you have your health, when your career is going well and things are good at home. When the bottom drops out, it's much more difficult."

The bottom of pretty nearly everything has dropped out for Rita and Dick. But they still have their love. And with that for a foundation, there are no heights to which they cannot ascend.

Certainly after all these months of persecution, anguish, and heartache, they deserve one good break. It is hard to see what could be served by deporting Haymes and thereby driving Rita and her children from their country. END talking about kelly

When she came out to Hollywood four years ago to test for a role in Taxi, she was turned down for the lead. One cameraman says, "Because on film she just didn't come across. She generated absolutely nothing—no sex, no vitality, just a kind of subdued prettiness."

A few months later when Grace was signed for a small part in Fourteen Hours, she again made little or no impression. Of the millions of people who saw the film, hardly anyone can remember Grace in it.

FROM THIS standing start, how did Grace Kelly suddenly burgeon into "the hottest young actress in the business?" How, for instance, did she outdistance all the acting ladies in Hollywood who were plotting for the role opposite Bing Crosby in The Country Girl?

The old acquaintance who believes that it's Grace's ambition that moves her along tells how it was done.

"Grace told her agent that she wanted the role very badly. Then she called the producer, Bill Perlberg. She told him the same thing. Perlberg hedged. Grace had done a wonderful job for him in The Bridges At Toko-Ri, but Bill knew that MGM wanted Grace back for Green Fire with Stewart Granger. And he knew something else. He knew that Bing Crosby wasn't particularly anxious to have Grace as his leading lady. So Bill stalled for a while, diplomatically, of course. He was convinced Metro wouldn't let Grace remain at Paramount for a second picture.

"But Bill didn't reckon with Kelly's ambition. She pressed for the part, day after day. When Metro finally told her a loanout was impossible, Grace led with her trump.

"'If I can't play the roles I want,' she said, 'there is no point in my being in this business. I'll pack up and go home.'

"Grace has a big advantage. She doesn't need money. Her father is rich. Metro knew that of course, and in Hollywood as in Wall Street, people who have money are not kicked around—not very much, anyway. So Metro gave in and Grace was cleared for The Country Girl."

Bing says now that he never did object to Grace's joining the cast of the picture. And apparently he didn't. Of course Bing was aware of Grace's alleged affinity for leading men—as in the case of Ray Milland.

No sooner had Dial M For Murder started when stories that Milland was leaving his wife and hoped to marry Grace began to circulate.

At that time Bing was being mentioned in connection with both Mona Freeman and Margot James and he didn't want any more publicity like that. When The Country Girl began, Bing and Grace were polite to each other.

Bing has never been a man to offer his friendship freely, and Grace sensed that. She has an unerring facility for judging men. At the start of the production the Kelly-Crosby relationship was purely professional. Gradually it thawed and grew into a personal relationship. Bing and Grace have a great deal in common. They are both of Irish descent, both Catholic, both hard-working and both emotionally restrained.

Before the picture was finished, Bing was dating Grace quite frequently. Once, Bing took her dancing at the Mocambo, where the photographers gathered around and shot him without his hairpiece, an indelicacy which always arouses the Crosby ire.

WOHL SHOE COMPANY • SAINT LOUIS, MISSOURI
A Division of Brown Shoe Company

SOME OF Grace's rivals would have you believe that she appeals to men like Crosby, Gable, Milland and Cooper "because they are well on in years and are always searching for a leading lady who won't make them look too old." They say that Grace's outstanding professional virtue is the maturity of her appearance.

Last year when Clark Gable was in London, he was, as usual, reluctant to say anything. Asked about Grace, he answered, "She is a very sweet and refined young lady with lots of inner warmth and talent."

Was it true that while they were making Mogambo in Africa, they fell in love?

"Ridiculous," Gable said. "We went hunting together a couple of times. That's about all."

A British newspaperman who had accompanied the Mogambo troupe all through Kenya, was a bit more expansive.

"Very quickly," he reported, "Grace Kelly became the darling of the outfit. John Ford, the director, took a liking to her right away. He gave her one of his favorite caps and began calling her Kelly.

"The general feeling among members of the cast was that Kelly was one regular girl, normal and easy to get on with.

"I don't knew whether she fell for Gable first or vice versa but they certainly struck up a close friendship. When they returned to London, they took up where they left off in Nairobi.

"I saw them dining together several times and I later ran into them at the New Theatre and Her Majesty's Theatre. In fact, I believe they were sort of mobbed when they tried to see Paint Your Wagon.

"Once when I rang up Kelly, I asked her if she were engaged to Gable.

"'Don't be foolish,' she said. 'Mr. Gable is a very dear friend and a very kind man who was very considerate on location. Yes, I've gone out with him a few times. But it's nothing serious.'"

The friendship may not have been serious then. But somehow Grace's mother, Mrs. Margaret Majer Kelly, got wind of it in Philadelphia. The next thing anyone knew, Mrs. Kelly was in London living with Grace in the Savoy Hotel and Gable was staying over at the Connaught. Al Menasco, his old pal from California was on his way to join Clark for a tour of the continent.

When Mrs. Kelly took her beautiful young daughter back to the States, Gable and Mr. and Mrs. Menasco went on to Paris. It was there that Gable met Schiaparelli model Suzanne Dadolle d'Abadie.

Suzanne joined the wanderers and soon rumors began to drift back to Hollywood that in this statuesque French beauty, Gable had found his fifth wife.

How these rumors affected Grace Kelly nobody knows. Nobody but Grace, that is, and she is not one to talk about her personal life. She's a sensible girl, and perhaps she realized that there was no point in pining for a man who was thousands of miles across the Atlantic, apparently having a great time with a French model on the sands of Capri.

GRACE THREW HERSELF into her television work in New York, starring in one playlet after another until the day Jay Kanter, her agent at MCA, called her to ask, "How would you like to go to Hollywood and play opposite Ray Milland in Dial M For Murder?"

Grace had seen the play on Broadway and she was enthusiastic—in her own quiet way. Little did she know that she was destined to be attracted to Reginald Truscott-Jones, formerly of His Majesty's Household Guard. Mr. Truscott-Jones acts under the name of Ray Milland.

Grace's friends say, "She never would have fallen for Milland if she hadn't been under the impression that he was separated from his wife. She has far too much self-control for that. She is an idealistic girl, and she would sooner cut off her arm than break up any going marriage."

Anyway, Milland was extremely taken with Grace during the filming of Dial M For Murder, and it was no secret on the Warner lot that he planned to divorce his beautiful wife Mal and marry Grace Kelly.

Naturally enough, Milland, now reconciled with his wife, refuses to discuss the affair. For her part, Grace airily acts as if it never even happened. The approximate truth is that once she learned that Ray had not been separated from his wife when they met—that is, that their friendship had begun under false pretenses—Grace called the whole thing off.

As in the Gable problem, Grace's mother came to her daughter's side in the problem of Ray Milland. It was said that henceforth Mrs. Margaret Kelly would act as Grace's chaperone in Hollywood.

Of course Grace Kelly needs no chaperone. She is self-reliant, blessed with integrity and righteousness, and would never do anything embarrassing to herself or to her family. Her best chaperone will always be her own conscience and her parents know that.

Once the Milland rumors blew clear, Mrs. Kelly went back to Philadelphia, and Grace took off for South America to star in Green Fire.

When she returned she began to see Clark Gable again, but the time she had for social life was limited. She had to leave for Cannes and Catch A Thief.

GRACE KELLY is near-sighted and wears glasses, is blessed with natural beauty and unerring understanding of men.

From whom she got this understanding it is difficult to say. Some believe it came from her father, a rugged athlete who started a bricklaying business in Philadelphia with $7,000 borrowed from two wealthy brothers. That bricklaying business is now an eighteen-million-dollar contracting outfit.

Others say Grace learned how to handle men by handling her brother John, a world champion oarsman. But a girl who attended the Stevens School with Grace and knows her background well, says, "She learned about men from a boy in Philadelphia named Harper Davis. She was very much in love with him and eventually they might have been married. But he died last year."

Someone else insists that Kelly, before movie fame, used to go fairly steady with Gene Lyons, an excellent stage and TV actor. Supposedly Lyons was smitten by her born-to-the-purple manner.

Grace's technique apparently consists of being natural, quiet, and attentive.

Bill Holden said, "I've never known her to take advantage of being a woman. In Toko-Ri she was always on time, always knew her lines, always contributed a good deal to the scene." And Grace has a wonderful way of contributing without being pushing. She talks in modulated tones and makes it a point never to hurt anyone.

GRACE HAS MADE her own living, more or less, since she was seventeen or eighteen. Her family wanted her to go to Bennington College in Vermont but scholastically she couldn't make the grade. Then she decided to study acting.

In 1947 she went to New York, enrolled in the American Academy of Dramatic Arts, and found work as a model. Since she is extremely photogenic, she soon became a very popular photographers' model. She appeared on magazine covers and gradually she worked her way into TV where casting directors said she looked like "the typical young British bride."

One night a talent scout from 20th Century-Fox saw Grace on his TV set and suggested that the studio test her for a bit in 14 Hours since much of it was being shot on location in New York.

Grace got the part, but Fox didn't find her sufficiently promising for a term contract. Her appetite for fame had been whetted, though.

She worked hard. She played Bucks County in Pennsylvania, then Ellitch Gardens in Denver, then back to TV in New York, always learning, always listening, always studying and waiting for that one all-important wedge in the door of fortune.

It wasn't long in coming.

In 1951 Stanley Kramer had signed Gary Cooper for High Noon and needed "a young leading lady at not too much dough." MCA sent over some film on Kelly and Kramer ran it off. He liked what he saw. So did Cooper.

Grace was signed for the role of Cooper's wife. High Noon turned out to be the best western of the year, winning an Oscar for Coop and critical acclaim for Kelly.

MGM then offered Grace a contract, the salary starting at $750 a week, an opportunity to play opposite Gable in Mogambo and plenty of time for stage work. Grace affixed her signature to the contract. And she was off to the races.

So much of Hollywood beauty is beltline processed that Grace's natural good looks immediately registered with the critics—and with her leading men. They began to describe her as "one of the few ladies in the picture business—reserved, refined and restrained."

She is smart enough not to compete with her escort. When she's with Gable she gives him the impression that she is honored to share his company. With Crosby she makes Bing feel like a gay, young, dancing blade. She dresses simply and conservatively and makes her escort feel that she will be very much at home no matter where he takes her.

Gable says he was afraid to take her hunting with him in Africa but that she acquitted herself nobly. "Never griped a single time."

BECAUSE GRACE KELLY is genuinely reserved, she does not make a particularly rewarding interview. She answers questions briefly, competently and respectfully, but she rarely offers an elaborating anecdote.

One newsman said, "She gave me the feeling that I was being presented at Buckingham Palace."

Grace has adopted a quasi-British accent or as Cary Grant explained, "She speaks English in a very special way as if she belonged to both America and Great Britain."

Despite her sensational success, Grace never has gone Hollywood. On the west coast she sublets reasonable apartments and in New York has kept her small apartment on East 66th Street.

Ask her how she feels about things and her blue eyes light up and she says modestly, "I've been very lucky and I know it. Once in a while that happens to someone in Hollywood and it's happened to me. I'm hot at the moment. But how long it will last I don't know."

Grace, incidentally, had good luck at the gaming tables in Monte Carlo before Catch A Thief got started.

"I went with Betsy Drake and Jessie Royce Landis," she told a friend, "and they had the most complicated gambling systems. All I did was put my money on number six. And I won."

Grace insists upon describing herself as "just lucky." Certainly she's been lucky in birth, background, beauty, career, and lately, in gambling. One wonders if she will be as lucky in love. END

abra-ca-debra

(Continued from page 51) found this house. Obviously, they were all too overcome by the sheer size of the three-story mansion to notice that it was terribly run down. Wisely, Debra kept her thoughts to herself. She climbed out of her Cadillac convertible and followed the rest of them as they filed up the flight of stone steps leading to the main entrance. Bill Barry turned the key in the lock and ushered them into the vast emptiness.

There was no electricity in the house so Bill and Debra's dad had to carry flashlights. As they moved from the livingroom to the solarium, from the diningroom to the Chinese room, the two men played their beams of light into the farthest dark corners. Their footsteps echoed loudly on the bare floors and there was dust everywhere. Debby shivered.

It took Bill Barry over an hour to show the Griffins (Debby's real family name is Griffin) the complete house from the basement to the top floor. He didn't omit one of the twenty-five rooms or seven baths. He pointed out how the various bedroom suites included their own small kitchenettes so that they could function as separate apartments in case anyone wanted to live independently of the family and yet under the same roof.

He showed them three different playrooms with outside entrances so that a gang in one room needn't disturb a party in another. He demonstrated the hotel-size stove and refrigerator which are permanent equipment in the kitchen. He flashed his light along the walls of built-in closets and the marble-lined bath with the steam cabinet. He even included a side trip to the small guest cottage beside the three-car garage. Then he led his visitors around the outskirts of the property so they might see how completely private the pool and gardens were.

When the inspection trip was completed, a kind of contagious excitement spread through the Griffin group. "Can we afford such a big place? What did you think of that rustic gameroom? Where will we ever get enough furniture to fill twenty-five rooms? Won't the pool be heavenly?"

Only Debra and her mother were completely quiet. Debra was trying to fathom Bill Barry's reason for bringing them to this creepy place. And Mother Maggie was silently figuring and weighing the alternatives before making up her mind.

Finally, Mrs. Griffin declared herself. "We can either go forward or slide back," she said, voicing one of her pet beliefs, "but we can't stand still. I think we should take it. What do you say, Frank? Teala? Debby?"

"I think we should talk to the others," Debby's father suggested.

And so, like every other big decision that faces this unusual show-business family, the question of moving to Beverly Hills was debated around the diningroom table late that night. It's the custom among the Griffin clan to give everyone a voice in family affairs. And there are nine strong voices in Debra Paget's family.

First, of course, come her parents. Next come Teala and her husband, Gene Bennett, who live at this same address along with their two little girls, Kim and Jeneene. Between Teala and Debra comes Frank, Jr. Frank is an actor under contract to RKO. Debra follows Teala in age. Eighteen months younger than Debby is Leslie, or Lisa Gaye, as she is called professionally. And last of all is their precocious little sister, six-year-old Marcia.

With so many different theatrical personalities under one roof, you'd expect nothing but jealousy and continual friction, but there is none. With an admirable spirit of cooperation, the Griffin family manages to live together in harmony. Mother Maggie explains this by saying that "my kids are all too busy to fight."

But there is more to this remarkable family spirit than just keeping busy. The Griffins happen to like each other. The girls are good friends. All the grown-ups pamper and love the children. And everyone admires and adores Mama.

In addition, the family has evolved a workable system of living. Each capable member contributes to the family fund, and everyone has a say in how the money gets spent. All share in the housework. Over the years, they've found that by pooling their incomes and energy they can live better together than apart.

The move into the big house in Beverly Hills is a wonderful example of the "Griffin System" in operation.

"The night after we saw the house on Crescent Drive," Debra recalls, "we sat up until two in the morning arguing. At first, I was completely against our taking such an old house. It seemed to be a hopeless wreck, but Mama soon set me straight. She said that all it needed was a thorough cleaning indoors and out. Dad agreed.

"Then she outlined some of her ideas about how we'd furnish the place. She said she'd like to put white cotton carpets all over the house to lighten the rooms and to mix a lot of big comfortable modern chairs with some Chinese chests. It sounded pretty wonderful.

"In the end we all decided that the house had everything we'd always wanted—a home with plenty of rooms and a pool. We were willing to work to pay for it."

Two nights later, Mr. and Mrs. Griffin signed the lease for their new Beverly Hills home, a three-year rental with option to buy. With that the work began.

IT HAPPENED TO US

While we were in high school a friend and I attended the opening of a new theatre in New Orleans. After the performance we went backstage for the autograph of the guest star, Dan Duryea. He signed the white cards we presented and then drew mine back to see what it was—and laughed. Because he had signed the only papers we had available: our report cards!

Mrs. Cleo Crawley
Gulfport, Miss.

According to Maggie, "We really should have taken before-and-after pictures. Without photographs people can't begin to appreciate what a wonderful transformation the decorating firm of Mann & Field wrought on that out-of-date house."

The first stage was the clean-up. Mr. Griffin and Gene Bennett worked on the yard, while Debra and her mother tackled the house. "To give you a small idea how wild the grounds were," Debra's dad explains, "Gene and I worked around outside for a week and we didn't know we had a huge outdoor barbecue and grill hidden under some ivy."

The changes were almost as surprising inside. Right from the beginning Maggie worked with Bob Gilbert, Mann & Field's head decorator. She ordered over 300 yards of white carpeting through them. She chose her big comfortable couches and chairs in their showrooms. Bob Gilbert helped plan the seating arrangement in the livingroom. He also suggested that she move the old diningroom furniture into the breakfast room for everyday use. Then he sold her a very striking new diningroom set for parties and company dinners.

As soon as the utilities were turned on and the house was reasonably clean the Griffins moved in with their entire menagerie. They own two parrots and a macaw who were quickly installed in a sunny room on the third floor. The dogs, Gypsy and Honey, were let free in the big back yard. Cuddles, the baby monkey, got a stylish new black wrought iron cage and now he's allowed to stay in the front hall. The five cats were allowed to roam at will. And all the pet goldfish were unceremoniously dumped into the lily pond.

The human members of the family had a much tougher time deciding which set of rooms they'd occupy. After much indecision, Debra finally chose a big corner room with a fireplace and a lovely little balcony. "It's heavenly," she claims, "especially early in the morning and at dusk. I can lie on my bed and listen to the birds and watch the squirrels. You'd think we were living in the country instead of on a busy block in Beverly Hills."

ANNOUNCING THE ARRIVAL

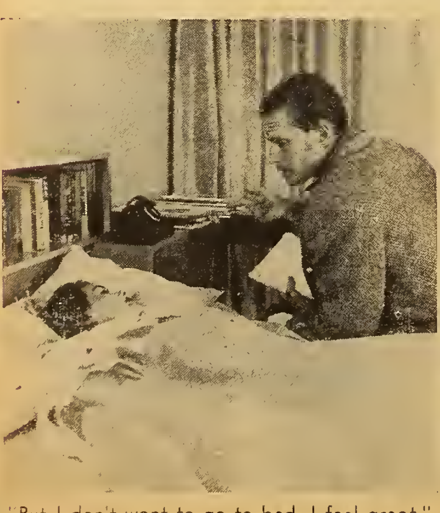
This is how Lydia told Charlton she is going to have a baby. As you can see for yourself, there was simply nothing to it!

"Hon," I said, "I have something to tell you."

"I'm pregnant! . . . Charlton . . . don't choke!"

"I saw the doctor today. He says I'm fine."

"I won't need a hospital bag for months!"



"But I don't want to go to bed. I feel great."

"And don't baby me . . . well, if you insist . . ."

Most of Debby's white satin and rose velvet furnishings came from the Griffins' old Hollywood Boulevard house, but Mrs. Griffin did have some adorable cupid lamps made especially for the new room.

Leslie chose the sleeping porch overlooking the pool for her private world. The furniture in this room has a Cordovan finish and is as tailored as Debby's is feminine. Leslie has twin beds because she loves to have girl friends like Lori Nelson and Julia Adams spend the night.

Teala and her husband have a separate apartment with rooms for their tow-headed little daughters. And for the first time in his married life, Frank Griffin has a den of his own where he can go off by himself, read the paper, and take a midday snooze. He also has a new desk for which he can thank little Marcia.

On about the 428th trip to the Mann & Field headquarters, Marcia and Debby were waiting while their mother looked at curtain material for the solarium. Debby was engrossed in her favorite pastime of clipping recipes from magazines. Suddenly little Marcia suggested, "Let's buy Daddy a desk. He needs one terribly. He has to keep all his papers in boxes."

Debra threw her arms around her baby sister. "Angel, what a divine idea!" she agreed. And so Debra bought one.

THE WHOLE FAMILY received a wonderful surprise from an old friend and artist, Arne Nybak. Arne's specialty is commercial murals and stage sets. His commissions keep him busy all over the country. When he dropped by the Griffins' place one Sunday to see the new house, he was so struck by its dramatic quality that he promised to give the family a special housewarming gift.

"Why not a sample of your work?" Debby asked. She never dreamed he'd take her seriously.

A few days later Arne arrived at the door with his paints and brushes. He tied an apron around his business suit and went to work. For three days he painted a wonderful three-dimensional mermaid mural in the front hall.

"It's the first thing people see when they come to visit us," Debby says, "and it really takes their breath away. Honestly, the jeweled mermaids kind of set the tone for this whole story-book house."

Debra and her family have been living in their new home a little more than three months. By now, they're used to the luxury of private rooms and adjoining sun decks and five telephones. They've got the housework down to a science. This is one movie star's family that doesn't have a servant problem. It has no servants.

Each girl looks after her own clothes and cleans her own room. Maggie and Teala share the cooking but Debby likes to do some of the baking. All the children help with the dishes and bed-making. Then race outside and sit by the pool.

"If people used to criticize me for not dating and always sticking close to home," Debby says, "they're really going to blast me now. I plan my whole day just so that I can spend the best sun hours swimming. I even had my hair cut to make it easier to manage when it gets wet. I really love this beautiful place. Honestly, it takes a pretty sensational date to lure me away."

To be sure, a lot of the younger movie crowd gather at the Griffins' place. And you never can tell when one of them may prove to be the man in Debra Paget's life. But this much is certain. If a man does win Debby's heart, he'll have to marry her fabulous family, too. This is one clan that believes in sticking together. END

24 hours with tony

(Continued from page 68) repast, but Bert accepted the fruit juice and coffee Tony handed him on the wing, along with the explanation, "We'll grab something at the commissary." Then Tony gave Janet a quick, hard kiss and said, "'Bye, sweetie. Don't work too hard. I love you," and was gone. Tony had begun to run.

Bert opened his mouth to utter a few nice words of his own, but outside a car horn blared, warning him that if he didn't want to get lost before his day with Tony Curtis started, he'd better make tracks. "Goodbye, Janet. Thanks," he said hastily—and sleepily.

Tony pointed the nose of his Cadillac convertible toward the Cahuenga Freeway and the studio like a racer on the last lap at Indianapolis. He was humming a cheerful little scrap of song. "Didja know I'm gonna be a crooner? No kidding, I signed a contract with Decca. Will Cowan, the producer, is helping me out with the arrangements and stuff, because I don't know from nuttin'. Remind me, I've gotta find some time to talk to him today. What a sweetheart of a guy!" New projects—those make Tony run.

"Yes sir, the next voice you hear will be that of Anthony Curtis, boy balladeer. Cochise did it—and what has he got that I haven't, except a great talent?" Tony was speaking of his buddy, Jeff Chandler, who recently commenced to bend the public ear with gratifying results.

He swung in at the gates of U-I and beamed broadly at the guard. "So, what's new this morning?"

"Seen the papers yet?"

"No. Why?"

"Brooklyn beat us last night."

Tony's grin vanished. "Them bums!" he said bitterly. "They ought to be flattered to carry the Giants' gloves."

"I like the Dodgers," Bert Parry said mildly.

Tony wheeled and stared at him. "Who's this layout for? Modern Screen? Remind me, never, never to do another layout for Modern Screen. Nowhere in my contract does it say I've got to consort with Brooklyn rooters. Let 'em suspend me—I'll sue." He parked the car, hopped out and departed in a cloud of dust, yelling over his shoulder, "Meet me in the commissary in ten minutes, Bert. We'll have breakfast!"

Off on some errand of his own, Tony ran all the way. On his way back he met a close friend, Nicky Blair, and invited him to breakfast. "How'd Willy Mays do last night?" he asked.

"He got another homer," Nick answered, and Tony was happy again.

In the commissary he chucked his favorite waitress under the chin. "Good morning, El-ee-nor! How's my sweetheart today?" She likes it, she likes it, and she wishes he didn't always have to eat in such a hurry. It's bad for his stomach.

He does have to hurry, though, because he has only a few minutes to get over to wardrobe and into his costume before he's due on the Five Bridges To Cross set. Tony always has only a few minutes' grace.

On this particular set he was met by make-up man Frank Westmore, who refused to be baited into a discussion of baseball. "We're running late," he squelched. "Hold your head still."

By nine o'clock the cameras were rolling. Sporadically they rolled, but the set constantly seethed with activity in preparation for them. The stage was finally set, Director Joseph Pevney had rehearsed the scene to his satisfaction, an assistant director shouted out the warning, "Quiet, please, everyone," a bell clamored, and they were in business. With luck, the second or third take was good; if not, they would do the scene another dozen or so times before they heard the welcome words, "Print it!"

Tony retired to his dressingroom to go over his next lines. His door is never closed, so he had little time to relax alone, listening to the new Frank Sinatra album. "Absolutely the greatest thing he's ever done!" he said to Jeff Chandler, who had ambled over to the set.

"Yeah, and you're not going to give him much competition," needled the big guy.

"I know it," Tony admitted.

Co-star Julia Adams appeared to ask about his mother, who was in the hospital after surgery. Tony hadn't had time to call yet, so he did it that minute. "She had a good night," he reported cheerfully to Julia, then said into the phone, "Give Momma all my love, and tell her I'll see her later."

George Nader, getting his first big break in the picture, loomed in the doorway to report that Sherman Clark, still photographer on the picture, wanted them on the set for some candids. Tony rose immediately and went out with him. "C'mon, you bum, smile pretty for the man," he ribbed the more serious young actor.

"Can't," George answered with marked gravity. "You get wrinkles that way. I never smile unless the script calls for it."

Another scene and another before the company broke for lunch. Tony walked over to the studio with Julia Adams, holding hands; en route he was heard to say, "Jeez, you're cute enough to be mascot to the Giants. I'm gonna speak to Leo about you."

At lunch he sat with Joe Pevney and his producer, Aaron Rosenberg. There was very little horsing around; the three men conversed quietly as they ate, and their faces were uniformly sober. Trouble with the picture? Not at all. They were discussing the won-and-lost record of a Giant pitcher named Antonelli and wondering if he could keep up the pace. Big business.

TONY WAS BACK on the set in an hour. He is anything but flippant about his career, and he's a bear for punishment. For instance, he's always two weeks ahead of the shooting schedule in memorizing his lines. It's the intense way young Mr. Curtis is built. This character he's playing—he has to have time to pull it apart, examine all the facets of its personality and put it back together as an understood integer. What makes Tony run? His career, maybe.

He was dead serious, talking on the set. "There are times," he said, "in every guy's life when he has a choice of two roads to take, and if he knows what kind of person he is, he always knows which is the right road for him. Me, I spread myself in six directions at once, and you know what that is? Wasting energy, throwing it away.

"Like I said, I just want to understand one guy—me. I don't want to overreach myself, which is easy to do in a business where there are always people around to tell you how good you are. But I don't want to waste anything I've got, either, I want to know." What makes Tony run? Tony?

Then he dropped the subject to demonstrate a purely personal talent for entertaining. Children, that is. There are three little ones in Five Bridges To Cross; they're great favorites of Tony's and they know it. Between scenes that afternoon he performed simple feats of magic until the two boys, Ronnie Anton and Larry Turner, were bug-eyed. Then he captured one of them.

"Tell me, young man," he asked, "what are you going to be when you grow up?"

Ask a silly question and get a silly answer. "An actor, of course," replied the Tony Curtis of 1974.

This year's idol frowned fiercely at his young colleague. "That is merely secondary, my friend," he corrected. "What you grow up to be first is a Giant rooter. Shall we live it up a little and have a coke?"

Nearby stood tiny Kathleen Hooper, at whose diminutive feet Tony's heart lay. When his wooing of her brought no response, he turned his attention to her rag doll; he crooned to it tenderly, rocked it, performed ridiculous aerial antics with it until Kathleen's solemn little face broke up in delighted chortles. She was won, and until Tony was called for the final scene of the day, she nestled contentedly in his arms.

SHOOTING OVER, Tony and Nicky Blair loped over to the projection room to look at the day's rushes. At a more sedate pace followed a photographer named Bert Parry, who was beginning to feel the effects of Tony's day. Tony was still in a hurry, though, because one of the things that makes him run fastest is his wife. He has caught up with her careerwise, and that evening he had to catch up with her and a date to look at a house.

The rushes looked fine, they emerged from the projection room, blinking in the afternoon sun, and were trapped by Bob Palmer of the casting department. "Tony," he said, "you've got to come in Wednesday."

Tony looked outraged. "You promised I could have next week off!"

"Can't help it," Bob insisted. "We've got to have you next Wednesday."

"All I ask," murmured the martyred Mr. Curtis, rolling his baby blues heavenward, "is one week off. One week—seven beautiful days—and you have to break it up in the middle! Publicity gave me the week off; Betty Mitchell said I didn't have to do anything next week. Do you realize I haven't had any time off in a year?"

Nobody's in the least impressed by his histrionics. Tony loves being needed. He also loves to horse around about how abused he is.

"See you next Wednesday," said Palmer.

"Sure thing, you bum," Tony waved an amiable hand at his departing back. "See you tomorrow, Nick. Let's go home, Bert." He had just played his biggest scene of the day, since he's known to be about as cooperative with studio and press as an actor can get.

HE ALREADY HAD the Cadillac's engine running when Bert Parry dropped into the seat beside him with a tired sigh—but he didn't get away. Somebody called his name frantically, Tony slapped on the brakes, and Jay Thompson of the Publicity Department raced up with a huge package.

"Been trying to catch up with you all day!" he panted. "I guess you got another present from a fan. Will you sign here, Tony?"

Finally they were out the gates and in the heavy late afternoon traffic. Bert thought he might as well have a catnap on the way and afterward he said, "Maybe it's a good thing I didn't look. We got back to the house so fast that my nerves probably would have given way if my eyes had been open."

Tony parked before the house and took the stairs two at a time, fresh as he had been at six that morning. "Hi, doll!" he greeted Janet, who opened the door. Then his mouth stayed open, because she definitely wasn't dressed for a house inspection. "Hey, what gives?"

NURSERY RHYME

Last summer I sat at the table next to Dinah Shore and her little girl in a large hotel diningroom. Everything was quiet until I heard the familiar Shore voice softly singing,

"Mabel, Mabel, big and able,
Take your elbows off the table!"

With that her little daughter Melissa removed her elbows and smiled an adorable smile.

"Thank heaven you got here, sweetie," Jan said, lifting her lips for a kiss. "I've been trying to call you, and I just wrote you a note. I've got to meet Dean and Jerry in Cleveland; we're doing a PA for Living It Up tomorrow for the matinee."

"Oh," Tony said. Then, uncertainly, "Can I drive you to the airport?"

"No, honey. The studio car is on its way to pick me up now. There wouldn't be time."

In less time than it takes to tell, she was gone. Tony sat down and started shucking clothes. Every two minutes the telephone rang. "Hello?" Tony would say. "Gee, sweetie, I'm sorry but I can't. You know me and my mind—I never write anything down. Well, it turns out that I have to do an interview and they're due in about five minutes. No, it would be too late afterward—but thanks for calling."

After a while he said to Bert Parry, who was studiously avoiding the attentions of Houdina, "I don't really have an interview to do tonight."

"But you must be tired," said Bert, who certainly was.

"No, I'm not tired. I'm lonely. You know what I think I'll do? I'll go look at the house anyway—and then I'll stop at a drive-in and have a hamburger for dinner. You want to come along?"

"Not without Janet," Bert admitted truthfully.

"I don't blame you," Tony agreed dolefully. "Neither do I." END

frantic romance

(Continued from page 43) ourselves by the pool, I asked him, "Do you love Debbie?" And before he had a chance to catch his breath, I hurled another one at him, "Do you want to marry her?"

He literally gasped. "Gee, Ma," he said when he was able to get anything out, "that's a large order to fill on a second's notice."

I was amused by my young singing friend's fluster. "I repeat the questions," I stated.

Eddie, who had been stretched out beside the pool, sat up, moved his towel closer and sat down beside me, suddenly very serious.

He didn't answer right away. When he did, he said: "I've got it bad for Debbie. If you want to say that you think a girl is the most wonderful girl you've ever met and that you want to go only with her—I suppose it could be called an engagement.

"But, look, Ma," he went on, "don't say we're engaged because maybe Debbie doesn't love me that much. Maybe she doesn't want me."

NONSENSE, I thought. I had been spending a lot of time with these two and if Debbie isn't equally, maybe more, in love with Eddie than he with her, I miss my guess. But being loyal to my sex, I didn't speak my thoughts.

I was thinking back over the five or six evenings Eddie and Debbie and I had spent together in Las Vegas.

I had watched Debbie when the autograph fans had swarmed around them as we went on our rounds in this playground of America.

Every place the kids went they were mobbed. But much to my surprise, whenever a pencil was shoved into Debbie's hand and an autograph book pushed at her, she immediately handed over the pencil and the book to Eddie first—as if to say, "Here, it's your autograph they want."

And I claim a Hollywood girl as cute and popular as Debbie is doesn't make this gesture toward a man unless she means it!

Another thing. If we were sitting in a cafe and some of the chorus girls in the assorted revues dropped by to meet us, I could just feel Debbie watching Eddie to see if he was attracted to any one of them—which he wasn't.

She was happiest, I think, when we were driving from place to place, the kids sitting on the back seat with their arms around one another. Sometimes Eddie sang to her—his beautiful voice sending chills down even my back.

He is such a sweet, thoroughly unspoiled kid I don't see how anyone can resist him.

Only once during the whole week did they faintly approach a tiff.

This was the day Debbie had promised her mother she would return home and Eddie didn't want her to go. He even asked me to call Mrs. Reynolds asking permission for Debbie to stay over.

But before I could move, Debbie said to Eddie, "Please, darling. There's nothing I want to do more than stay with you. But I promised Mother. Some of her relatives whom I haven't seen in a long time are visiting us for this one day, and I promised I would be home to meet them. I have to keep my word."

Eddie, thoroughly piqued, turned and started to walk out of my suite. Debbie just stood her ground and watched him disappear.

Then, before either of us could say, "Scoot," he dashed back, took Debbie in his arms and kissed her neck and pretty face.

"I understand, baby," he whispered, "I'm just disappointed."

I thought this was about time for me to do a disappearing act into my bedroom. And I did.

IF THEY ARE sooo much in love, and everything is going so brightly in both their careers, what then is to keep these two from immediate marriage?

Now, we did not discuss this point but I am sure it is important with both of them. Are they as yet mature enough to take on marriage at this moment when girls are making fools of themselves over Eddie in the same way they once did over Frank Sinatra; and when a lot of young men, whether they know her or not, look on Debbie as a favorite dream date?

You think this is a small matter? Don't fool yourself.

Both of these kids know the game they're in. They know the temptations and pitfalls. And, they've worked too long and too hard not to be wise beyond their years.

They also have responsibilities to their public and to their families.

Eddie was brought up in Philadelphia and his singing records, his nightclub appearances, his TV show and public appearances have made him in a few short years one of the most popular singers our country has ever known.

It is so characteristic of this boy that when he opened at the Cocoanut Grove in Los Angeles he had an entourage of about ten people who had been good to him when he was a child!

Groucho Marx went shopping along Beverly Hills with his daughter, Melinda, eight. She lingered in front of the shop windows, and he called her to, "Hurry up!" She snapped back, "Don't yell at me! I'm not your wife!" —Paul Denis

There was the woman who owned the candy store and used to give him candy when he minded the store for her. There was his father, to whom he sings his favorite, "Oh My Papa." There were the two successful young song writers, Dick Adler and Jerry Roth, boyhood friends of Eddie's—and he is as delighted as they are over their Broadway hit, The Pajama Game.

At Eddie's table also was Jenny Grossinger, of Grossinger's Hotel where Eddie once sang and where he was discovered by Eddie Cantor.

And last, but far from least, Debbie was there—her eyes shining over his success on the West Coast. It would take the rest of this article to list all the celebrities and socialites who turned out to welcome young Fisher—in fact, the Cocoanut Grove lists his opening as the biggest in the history of this famous room. This, definitely, was Eddie's night.

A FEW NIGHTS later, it was Debbie's. Along with Eddie's close friend, Jimmy McHugh, Eddie, Debbie and I attended the Hollywood première of my daughter Harriet's picture, Susan Slept Here, which stars Debbie and Dick Powell. Not because it's my child's picture—and I'm deeply proud of her work—but Debbie has never been as cute in her career as she is as Susan.

When we came out of the theatre, everyone flocked around Debbie,, congratulating her, telling her how wonderful she is, doing raves, really.

Her eyes were dancing with happiness. Her cute, pert little face shone as though there were an electric light behind it. Yet, always she reached for Eddie's hand and kept him close beside her.

We went to the Brown Derby for a bite to eat, and for the first time I realized how very serious Debbie is about her career.

"I look like a kid. I'm really twenty-two," she said as though that age is beyond youth. "I have seven years of bucking this game behind me. And I'm just now hitting the headline spots.

"I've watched the careers of other girls," she went on, "and I've noticed the ingénues don't last long. Not after the dew of youth is off 'em. I honestly want to do something serious. I hate sappy kid parts."

Eddie, surprised at his baby's vehemence, said, "But, honey, most of your fans think of you as a teen ager."

Debbie batted those big, beautiful eyes at him. She winked. "But I'm not, my boy," she giggled.

The more I see of her the more I am convinced that there is a strong cross streak of real maturity in Debbie's youthful appeal. I think she knows what she's doing all the time.

Once, when I was interviewing her on the set of Susan Slept Here toward the finish of the comedy, she said:

"I'm good in this picture. Ask Harriet. I know that doesn't sound particularly modest—but I'm not particularly modest. I know what I can do—and what I can't."

Despite her cuteness and her ability to sing, dance and imitate almost from her cradle in El Paso, Texas, her birthplace, making headway in her career has not been too easy for Debbie.

WHEN SHE WAS eight, she moved to Los Angeles with her parents (her father was an employee of the Southern Pacific Railroad) and her older brother Bill. They bought a modest home in Burbank. It is indicative of Debbie's character that she still lives with her family in the same house.

She was no smash getting started in films. Even in high school plays, the leading parts went to other girls and Debbie took what was left—usually a bit.

But in 1948 she put on such a hilarious imitation of Betty Hutton in a talent contest, she was chosen "Miss Burbank of 1948" and her luck started to turn.

Her first screen role in Daughter Of Rosie O'Grady led to a job at MGM playing Helen Kane, the boop-boop-a-doop gal in Three Little Words, and from there on she was on her way.

She first came to my attention in a publicity way when she and Robert Wagner were touted as being "madly in love." Perhaps they were. What happened to this youthful romance, I don't know. But its ending is supposed to have left Debbie a little disillusioned.

Since that time, she's dated many boys. But I don't believe she's been in love before Eddie came into her life.

One big, bright factor the kids have in favor of an early and successful marriage is that they both come of happy homes. Eddie is devotion itself to his family of four sisters and two brothers—and Debbie's home life is ideal.

THE LAST TIME I saw the kids, before leaving for my vacation in Europe, was at the birthday party I gave for Jimmy McHugh. Jimmy had asked that they be seated at his table and knowing how fond of him they are, I was surprised when they were not at the house at eight o'clock.

About nine they called. "Ma," they chorused, "we're lost."

And, I guess they were—lost in a fog. They didn't arrive until dinner was over.

"Who can eat?" Eddie said, gazing into Debbie's eyes.

And, until two o'clock in the morning there they sat, Eddie never more than two inches away from Debbie, holding her hand, kissing her and reaching for her, and she putting her head on his shoulder and looking up at him—lost in a little world of their own while Judy Garland, Jane Wyman, Margaret Whiting and Roz Russell sang love songs in their direction.

You can take it from there. END

my everyday God

(Continued from page 65) attraction for me. Instead I live generally conscious at all times, no matter what I may be doing, that I have a spiritual affiliation. I don't mean that I walk with pious manner or expression. My faith doesn't get in my way. I just try to live so it is my way.

Maybe I should explain about my Catholicism. When some of my friends have said that I am an "amazing kind of Catholic," they don't mean my devoutness. They mean the way I came to enter my church. I like to tell the story because it illustrates so graphically the wonderful and tolerant philosophy of a lady whose outlook on life has always inspired me—my mother. My mother is not a Catholic. She is a follower of Unity. In a sense I was taken from her arms and conveyed to Catholicism while her attention was engaged in earning a living for my brother and myself. When she learned what had happened she uttered no protest, insisted on no change, permitted both my brother and me (it happened to both of us) to consider ourselves Catholics and continue as such. She gave us no reasons, but in the years to come we felt we knew what they were.

My parents separated early after my birth so that I don't even remember my father. Mother got work as a ship's nurse with the Matson Lines and had to leave Walt and me (neither of us yet five) with a Catholic family. With Mother away for long periods, these good people felt more than an ordinary responsibility for us; they felt we should have a religious identification and since our lives were so closely entwined with theirs they took us with them to their church.

Later, at a time when Mother was seriously ill, she consented to having us baptized in their faith which was already so familiar to us. To Mother, as I came to realize in time, there is a divine plan to life. The baptism of her children in another church might well be a part of it. She would not interfere.

And so, in what was probably a unique family relationship, we continued to live together thereafter, Mother in Unity, and her two sons in Catholicism. There was no clash. Instead, the fact that she granted us, just two small boys, such autonomy and independence, not only gave us a feeling of freedom we'll never forget, but more than this, the rich sense of individuality so important as a source of self-respect and well-being.

In Unity the teaching is that thought is omnipotent. Mother would put it to us this way, sometimes: "Thoughts are things. If you think right thoughts, the right things will happen." I fell into believing her and I have never fallen out. This, added to my Catholicism, worked out into a basis for what I have mentioned before—the feeling that my God is an everyday one, not just a Sunday divinity.

At any time I am apt to pray. If this sounds a little stuffy I should make it plain, perhaps, that to me prayer is not the formal thing others too often take it to be. To me prayer is just being "in touch." When I drive, for instance, I talk to St. Christopher a lot. If a near-accident occurs I am apt, quite naturally, to speak to him. I guess friends have heard me burst out, "Oh, thanks, St. Chris!" No matter how tired I am at night, I pray—no matter if I am so tired I know I'll never finish. What better way of falling asleep than in the middle of your prayers? If I see a little raggedy child in the street I don't go by without a thought, a prayer-thought for her. When I pass a church I don't keep looking straight ahead as if I haven't seen it, or as if this isn't the time for such matters. I turn and look and I say a sort of prayer-hello.

I don't want to sound naive about this, or childish. What I am again trying to make clear is that I am not one for formal piety—I don't even like such a picture of myself!—but that I consider that my church is my friend as well as my source of salvation. For instance, I love to go to Lake Arrowhead on a Sunday and attend Mass outdoors at the Shrine of Our Lady of Fatima. But if on a Sunday morning I also want to waterski, and the water is best for this at just about the time of the two Masses, eight o'clock and ten o'clock, wouldn't it be all right to miss the Mass?

Maybe you are a little ahead of me and figure that the answer is yes and that is why I call the church friendly. But it doesn't work out that way. When I was faced by the problem I decided I should not miss Mass. Having made this decision, I was given a helping hand by my friend, the church. I found a small Catholic hospital at Lake Arrowhead where a six A.M. Mass is held every morning for the patients and nuns. The next Sunday there was in attendance at that Mass, held in a small chapel in the hospital, ten patients in wheelchairs, six nurses and one water skier. This was a matter between "friends," and my friend the church was naturally serving me a good turn.

I don't want to sound forgiving about myself. I would like to sound forgiving about everyone. I have told lies, I have hurt people and I have stolen. But I have never done it easily and my hope is to make it so much harder that I won't be able to do it at all. And maybe because I know how much understanding I need, I always want to have understanding in stock for anyone else.

Robert Q. Lewis was being interviewed by a group of high school editors. One editor asked, "Who is responsible for getting you where you are now?" Bob answered: "The elevator man."
—Paul Denis

The kindest face I can think of belonged to an old workman in the West Indies who used to shuffle down every day to open the gate of an estate in Jamaica where we were shooting scenes for Isle Of Desire about four years ago. I noticed two things about him quickly—his benevolent look and the fact that his feet were bare and unprotected from the hard rocks and gravel of the path. One day I gave him one of the two pairs of new sneakers I had bought. But next day he was still walking barefoot.

I wondered about it and some of the others in the company kidded me. They said they had heard that my noble looking gate man was one of the biggest drunks in the district, and that he had undoubtedly pawned the sneakers for rum.

"The fact is," said one of the fellows, "you probably contributed to his downfall, rather than helped him."

They all laughed and I felt foolish and rather annoyed about it. One of the other men noticed this and talked to me later about it. "You know, you have no right to resent the old gate man in any way," he said. "You had reasons for giving him the sneakers and nothing he did with them can in any way lessen what the giving meant to you. Now what was it those sneakers had to do—which they haven't done—that has bothered you? If he is an old man who has had the curse of heavy drinking on him all his life were you going to cure it with your small gift? Did you wish to commit a miracle? And are you angry because you didn't?"

I saw what he meant, of course. I'll never in my life again ever give anything to anyone without also giving the understanding that it does not commit them in any way.

Since I need such understanding for myself, how can I deny it to others? I pray that I'll stop telling lies, for instance. Yet this, as I know, doesn't guarantee that I will stop. When an occasion turns up in which I get the idea that a lie can help me, out comes the lie, as likely as not. And of course it comes out even though I know that more often than not it won't help me at all, that, in fact, it will jam me up!

Back in Jamaica, when we were making that same picture, the director asked me two questions in succession and my answer to each was a lie. He asked me if I could throw a javelin and I said yes. He also asked me if I could shinny up a coconut tree and I said yes. I had, of course, never thrown a javelin and had never climbed a coconut tree. About the javelin—I learned one night that on the next day I would not only have to throw it, but hit a bunch of papayas with it. I started practicing and kept at it so furiously that the next day my arm was so sore I couldn't flip a toothpick, let alone hurl a javelin. About the tree—that was a mess, too. Talking over some forthcoming scenes with an assistant director, I learned that one was coming up which required me to climb a coconut tree. Again I practiced and again too late. When it was time for the scene I was a very good climber of an eight-foot tree. But the one they showed me shot straight up for forty feet. I hadn't a chance and they had to fall back on some makeshift handling of the problem which embarrassed me plenty. They filmed me doing my eight-foot climb from the bottom of the tree. Then they chopped off the top of the tree, stood it up on the ground and had me climb that small section, filming me so it looked as if I had climbed all the way.

So I don't need to get hit over the head to realize I must have a spirit of understanding and forgiveness for others. I need only to review how much understanding I have taken from others all my life. I can even go back to a time in San Francisco when, as a four-year-old, I was a sore trial to my usually understanding brother who was all of five. Wherever his adventurous soul drew him he had to take me, not only because he was supposed to look after me, but because I was such a cry baby in those days I'd get him in a jam if he didn't. (I continually jammed him up anyway, I guess, because I have a tiny piece of scar tissue just northeast of my left eye where he caught me with a BB pellet one day for "telling on him.")

My mother had to show a lot of understanding, too. One day Walt and I, still pre-kindergarten age, wandered away from home and found ourselves down at the Fisherman's Wharf at nightfall. We had lost our shoes and stockings (or had thrown them away most likely) and of course we hadn't had a bite to eat. Then Walt got a wonderful idea. Seeing fishermen around he figured they needed bait, so we started digging for worms we could sell to them. It worked indirectly. A man asked us what we were doing and, giving us carfare, put us on the trolley for home.

When I got into my early teens I went horse-crazy. I just had to go riding every day. Naturally I didn't have the money to ride as much as I wanted to and I got a little sticky-fingered to take care of the emergency. The victim was my mother. I would take loose money from her coat pocket, I would keep the change when she sent me to market and I'd snatch anything that was lying around loose. For a long time this went on without a word from her. Then one day I stole from her pocketbook. That was the end of it.

These days Johnny feels at home in Hollywood.

NO MORE CRYING

for a new star—
happy Johnny Ray!

■ "Last year I came to Hollywood to make a movie test for 20th Century-Fox and I was so nervous I had to excuse myself in the middle of the filming so I could steal away and be sick to my tummy." So said Johnny Ray on the set of Show Business where he's "having a ball." What relaxed him?

He was waiting for his first scene, jittery as a hangover. A young fellow walked up to him, shook his hand, and said, "Johnny, you're the greatest. The best of luck to you!" That was Bob Wagner, and Johnny has felt at home in Hollywood ever since.

The famed cry singer is on the spot and he knows it, for he sings only one song in the picture and in the later scenes he plays a young priest. The tension is eased by an amusing situation. Johnny, with Mitzi Gaynor and Donald O'Connor, plays one of the children of Ethel Merman and Dan Dailey.

After hours, Johnny and Dan have been dating the same girl, Charlotte Austin. The morning after Dan takes Charlotte out, Johnny buttonholes him. "Pop," he bellows for everyone on the set to hear, "you stay away from my girl. You're too darned old to be running around with such a sweet young thing!" Next day it's Dan's turn to grouse. "Look here, infant," he'll bellow. "I don't want a son of mine hitting the nightclubs. Charlotte is a lovely kid and I'm warning you to stay away from her." When they reach the stage of a mock fight, Mother Merman breaks it up.

Mitzi Gaynor tried to settle the feud by offering to chaperone them while the two dated Charlotte together.

The studio workers are more than impressed with Johnny. Most of them expected another conceited singer, and are amazed to find a down-to-earth guy, long gone from the headlines.

She sat me down and let me know she had known about my stealing all the time. She named the amounts so there could be no mistake. She said that each time she knew I had stolen she had wanted to mention it, but hadn't because she hoped I would stop by myself. And she had kept on hoping.

"Today you went into my pocketbook," she said. "What happens now?"

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"Do you do something about this or must I? I will leave it up to you. What's the answer?"

I didn't have an answer for a while. And then one came to me. I told her I was going to find some kind of job to make the extra money I wanted. (And I did.) Her eyes became gentle for a moment. I knew she was smiling inside and the moment had a certain wonder in it for me—how quickly we had gone from desperation to hope again, and how quickly her love for me had wiped out the memory of my ugly thefts!

A nice girl, my mom, and a nice viewpoint she has helped give me. She had a right to be bitter about many things in her life and she never was. How could I ever be? She used to see right through our poverty and hard times toward something I could tell must be wonderful to make her eyes light up as they did. And now I know what she saw. Another day and another place—where we would belong forever! I wouldn't want to be here now if I couldn't have been there then! END

"It was really very exciting," June recalls, "because Fred worked until two o'clock in the afternoon on the day we were married.

"We tried to keep the wedding a secret because we didn't want to get married in front of a hundred reporters and cameramen. I have lots of friends in the press and I love them all, but there's a time and place for everything.

"Anyway, I was sure that when Fred left the studio on Monday one or two press cars would follow him. Hedda Hopper had called me a day before and said, 'I'm sure you're getting married on Monday. Where's the wedding to be held?'

"I said we weren't sure, and that was really the truth because Fred and I didn't even have a marriage license. As a matter of fact, the license bureau in Ventura stayed open after five o'clock on Monday so that we could get a license.

"Then we drove back to the inn at Ojai, and it was there in Don Burger's apartment—he's a friend of ours—that we were married."

The rites were performed by Superior Court Judge Charles F. Blackstock with Mr. and Mrs. Bo Roos of Beverly Hills as witnesses. Bo is Fred's business manager. Fred's mother, Mrs. Melita MacMurray, and June's mother and stepfather, Mr. and Mrs. Andy Ottestad, were present.

The ceremony was short and neither June nor Fred was nervous. June never looked lovelier. She wore a champagne-colored silk dress with a full skirt, pearl buttons, a Peter Pan collar and a tiny silk hat. Fred wore a dark blue business suit.

The actor slipped a wedding band of five diamonds in a platinum setting, on June's finger. His ring was a plain band of solid gold.

After the ceremony, Fred and June phoned his two adopted children, Susan, fourteen, and Robert, ten, who were staying at the MacMurray cattle ranch in Healdsburg.

"We just got married," Fred announced.

"That's great!" Bobby shouted. "Let me talk to Mom."

June took the phone and her luminous blue eyes were filled with tears of happiness. In her heart she knew that her days of sorrow and loneliness were over. This, for her, was the beginning of a new life, a life in which the most important thing was to keep Fred happy.

That night the newlyweds drove to Fresno. They spent the first night in a small motel at the edge of the city. The following morning they read in the newspapers that they were on their way to St. George, Utah, to visit actor John Wayne at whose Christmas party they had met, thus beginning their love affair.

The papers gave other erroneous information about their plans which they enjoyed reading. But the newspapers were correct about one thing. That was the effect of June's marriage upon her status in the Catholic church.

By marrying MacMurray, a Presbyterian, in a civil ceremony, June deprived herself of the sacraments of the Roman Catholic Church of which she has been a devout member since she was converted to Catholicism twelve years ago. This is because the Catholic Church does not recognize June's divorce from musician Jimmy Zito.

Before she married Fred, June consulted the marriage court of the Archdiocese of Los Angeles, hoping for a special Papal Dispensation, praying that the Church would annul her marriage to Zito. But when she was told that such a procedure might take years and that even then, the decision might go against her, she decided to marry MacMurray anyway.

She knew she would be ineligible for such sacraments as Holy Communion and Penance, but in her own words, "I fell in love with Fred, and I had a great decision to make—one of the greatest in my life, and now I'm glad I made it."

From Fresno the honeymooners went to Yosemite National Park. There they ran into Red and Georgia Skelton and all the little Skeltons, vacationing.

Red has known Fred and June for years, and when he saw them he threw his arms around their necks and kissed them both.

"Just got married!" he shouted. "These two just got married. A wedding present, Georgia. Gotta give 'em a wedding present."

Red always carries three or four cameras. This time he had a new Polaroid, a camera that gives a finished photograph in one minute. Red not only snapped the honeymooners but gave them his Polaroid as well.

"Where you heading?" he asked.

"I'm doing a picture up in Wyoming," Fred explained. "Jackson Hole."

"I know Jackson very well," Red kidded. "Once got stuck in the same hole with him." Everyone laughed. "Kidding aside," Red continued, "got a radio with you?"

June shook her head.

"Who ever heard of going on a honey-

WEIGHTY PROBLEM

Presenting Roberta Linn—

and one of her favorite secrets!

■ While Shirley Temple stays home with the kiddies these days, and many another child star has long since been forgotten, the name of Roberta Linn is going down in Hollywood history as the movie moppet who proved it can be done.

Once upon a time, Roberta worked with little Miss Temple in Little Miss Marker. She worked in Our Gang comedies and in many other pictures. But when she graduated from high school, she ran smack into the wall marked, "No Hope for Kid Stars." She turned to singing, filling the solo spot with such bands as Joe Reichman, Jan Garber and Lawrence Welk. Then, before she could worry about movies again, television took her to its heart and in two years she has captured seven statuettes, sixteen scrolls and twenty-one laudatory certificates, including the "Emmy," for being the "Most Outstanding Female Performer of 1953."

Roberta, just twenty-two years away from her birth in Gravity, Iowa, simply doesn't have time for sports to keep her figure superb. Like Laraine Day, Arlene Dahl and other glamour notables, her secret is a little machine, smaller than an overnight case, called a RelaxAcizor.

"Let's face it," Roberta says. "Every girl has some part of her proportions that can stand conditioning. While I don't have to lose weight in a hurry, I could if I wanted to with my RelaxAcizor, which can trim inches off your tummy in jig time. I use mine for the thighs. All I do is put the pads in the proper place, connect the cords to the little machine and lie back while the electronic impulses go to work."

If Roberta knows any other beauty secrets, she keeps them locked up in her clever little head—and the heart from which emerges that inner sparkle that is making her one of Hollywood's top personalities.

moon without a radio?" Red demanded. "How can you keep up with the baseball scores?" And he handed Fred a large portable Zenith.

Later that evening the MacMurrays headed for Reno. "And there," June recalls, "Fred won two dime jackpots playing the slot machines. He got a big kick out of it."

The MacMurrays spent the first week of their honeymoon on the road and while they were recognized everywhere there was no invasion of their privacy. Fred is a dignified, conservative man.

When he and June arrived in Wyoming on July 6 (when Blue Horizons got under way) it was Fred who suggested that they stay at a lodge that was thirty-five miles away from the location.

"I think this is better," he said, "than staying at the same place with the rest of the crew." Fred isn't snobbish. He was afraid of the usual honeymoon kidding.

June, as ever, was completely agreeable. "Anything you say, darling."

So Fred drove up to a dude ranch and asked the manager what the rates were.

"Forty to fifty dollars a day."

"Sorry," Fred said. "That's too much."

"But doesn't the studio pay while you're on location?" June asked later.

Fred nodded. "Sure the studio pays," he said. "But I don't throw my money around and I'm not going to throw Paramount's around either. Come on, Shorty. We'll stay up at Moran with the rest of the crew." That night Fred and June MacMurray checked into Jackson Lake Lodge.

They occupied a one-room bungalow with double bed and throughout the entire production not one member of the location crew made "honeymoon" remarks.

"I've never seen two finer people," one of the production assistants said, "than June and Fred. Never a gripe, never a complaint. The mosquitoes were something awful and when the wind blew, our rooms were full of dust. But Fred and June never blew their tops. They are calm, polite, friendly. They seemed to be very much in love but they didn't act like honeymooners.

"They acted like people who knew what love and marriage was all about. June used to come down for lunch and Fred would always kiss her hello and goodbye but there was never any mawkish or silly or embarrassed love-making.

Although Fred's welfare and the happiness of her two stepchildren come first for June, she says she has no intention of giving up her screen career.

"I've spoken to Fred about it," she asserts, "and he's said anything I want to do about it is okay with him.

"I was offered a part in Oklahoma but if I had taken it I would've had to give up my honeymoon with Fred. And there isn't a screen role big enough to make me do that. However, if any good parts come along, I'm certainly in the market for them.

"After all, Bobby is ten and Sue is fourteen, and they both go off to school, and we have help to take care of the house; and I've always liked to stay busy. And pictures is the one business I know a little about, so I might as well stick to it."

Despite rumors to the contrary, June has no intention of altering her religious affiliation. She is still a devout Catholic. On her honeymoon she said a rosary for Fred each time he went fishing.

"I wanted him to catch his full allowance of five trout a day," she explained.

MacMurray, who is seventeen years older than his twenty-eight-year-old bride, is happy. And for one reason: "Life isn't too much fun unless a man can share his living with someone he loves." END

the big man comes home

(Continued from page 45) a hill on which sat the house, almost obscured by pepper trees. He had parked the car and cut off across the lawn, past a caretaker's house, a riding ring and a series of horse stalls and a stable. Then he had climbed to a wide play area beside a large swimming pool. He had inspected the water before he trudged up a steep incline of fieldstone steps that hugged the contour of the hill.

Here at the top was the house. A large house of fourteen rooms, two stories high and built to complement the hill top and take advantage of the many trees.

Yes, it was a homecoming. This was the first evening in more than two years that John Wayne had come home to a house that was really his. During that time he had lived in rented houses and had spent many months of his time in far places, mainly because he had no base in Hollywood that offered the security, comfort and peace he craved. He had owned this property for a long time, but until he started remodeling a year ago it had been a deserted barn on a hill of burned grass—a place that held unhappy memories—and he had shunned it.

Now it was a home again, and the girl who had made it so, Pilar Pallette, the Peruvian beauty he was going to marry and who had supervised the remodeling and decorating, would soon come driving through the gate to share dinner with him. John Wayne grunted in anticipation and he spoke aloud to nobody in particular.

"From now on," he said, "I'm going to do all my traveling on this seven acres."

And like an old movie stringing through a familiar projector, the journeys he had made, the junkets to far places he'd staged ran through his mind. They were episodic fragments of the past that he'd think of once more and then banish to some small storehouse in his head. Of course many of them were necessary to his movie work.

LOCATION TRIPS are hardly considered journeys by movie stars, maybe because about fifty per cent of the movies made in Hollywood require them. But it is interesting that to John Wayne these enforced departures from his base are the most trying. And he suffers like a lost dog for his fireside and family. Consequently, on every location trip he makes he somehow manages to have his four children go along for a short time, at least. They went to Honolulu for Big Jim McLain and to Mexico for Hondo and to St. George, Utah, for his latest film, The Conqueror.

But true to a code he established long ago, the two boys must work to earn their pocket money. In Mexico they had to keep the huge water tanks filled for the hordes of thirsty horses on the location. In St. George, Pat worked (on a union waiver) in the wardrobe department, and Michael, the nineteen-year-old, was selected by director Dick Powell to play an outpost guard.

In Mike's scene, Duke, playing Genghis Khan, strides up to Mike, who, in the story, has been accused of laxity on his post. The father looks at the lad in great anger. He turns to an aide.

"Is this the man?" he asks.

"It is," says the aide.

"Hang him," says Wayne and walks away.

On the trip to Utah, the children, Mike, nineteen, Patrick John, fourteen, Toni, seventeen and Melinda, thirteen, came with their future stepmother, Pilar Pallette, who herded them in a private plane and delivered them to Dad's doorstep. The kids adore Pilar and she is crazy about them.

JOHN WAYNE was a local boy. That is, he was raised in Glendale, a suburb of Los Angeles like Hollywood. Like most normal boys he wanted to travel, but the farthest he had ever been by the time he was twenty-one was the half-way mark to Honolulu. The trip was not blessed by authority. He wound up in jail.

He had been working in pictures as a laborer when he could get the work and money for travel didn't come fast enough. So Duke hitch-hiked to San Francisco and smuggled himself aboard one of the Matson liners bound for Honolulu. With the surf at Waikiki almost audible in his ears, he secreted himself in a stuffy out-of-the-way locker. The ship set out to sea and as the hours passed the pleasant surf sounds were replaced by a more immediate noise, the growling of his own belly.

On the third day out, all of young Duke Wayne's dreams of Honolulu sunlight and moonlight exploded and were replaced by a vision of food, so he staggered out, tagged the first ship's officer he saw and suggested the fellow pinch him immediately as a stowaway and lead him to the dining room. This was done. Then Mr. Wayne was escorted to the captain, given a thorough tongue-lashing and the liner lay to while Duke was slipped to the deck of a freighter bound to San Francisco.

In the city by the Golden Gate, he was promptly locked up in the pokey and charged by the company that was later to enjoy his patronage many times—as the occupant of the best suite on the ship—with stealing a ride.

"I sure sweated out those three days in the can," says Wayne, "but I got a real break just before I was to come to trial. I knew George O'Brien in Hollywood. His father was the Chief of Police of San Francisco and he came to see me. He went to bat for me and had the charges dismissed. And I walked out a free man with an admonishment never to board a Matson liner again unless I had a ticket. I thought of how close my stomach got to my backbone and decided to take the advice. But I was still a frustrated traveler."

ALTHOUGH HE'D been born in Iowa, the eastern part of the United States was a really distant place to John Wayne and he always had wanted to go there. But they weren't passing out railroad tickets on street corners, so Wayne stayed west. He made his first trip shortly after he met John Ford. It held little significance at the time, but just this year he thought of it again. They had gone to Annapolis, Maryland, and Wayne had played a small part—as a midshipman—in a service picture. Director Ford stood behind the camera and eyed the young actor not too pleasantly. But after the shot was taken to his satisfaction, he drew Wayne aside.

"Young man," he said, "you're probably the worst actor in the world. But I have a feeling that someday we'll do something together that will make you a star."

That was really the beginning of a relationship between a star and director that has become a Hollywood legend.

In the summer of 1954, John Ford was to make a picture called The Long Gray Line. He is meticulous in his choice of actors, often spending weeks searching for just the right player for even a minor part. One day he called Wayne.

"Duke," he said, "I took you to Annapolis to play a midshipman more than twenty years ago because I thought you were the right guy for the part. Now I want to ask a favor. There's a small part in this thing I'm doing now that I haven't been able to find the right guy for, but I just saw the face of the lad I want. It's your boy, Pat. Let me take him along."

Pat, all six feet of him, and only fourteen, went. His dad was so pleased that he flew east and drove to West Point and stood behind the camera with Ford and watched his son step into his own footsteps.

SOME OF THE more amusing anecdotes in the life and travels of John Wayne have to do with the publicity jaunts he has been obliged to make.

Shortly after he was signed by Fox Films and starred in an epic western called The Big Trail, Wayne was informed they were going to change his name from Duke Morrisson to John Wayne. He didn't like the idea much, but he had little choice. And then he was told that he was leaving immediately for a tour of the east, in order to familiarize the country with Fox's new star. Duke and a publicity man boarded a train and had an uneventful ride to within fifty miles of Manhattan. Then the press agent opened a suitcase and took out an outlandish costume and told Wayne to put it on.

Wayne took a look at the get-up and said he wouldn't even wear it in a movie.

Marge and Gower Champion gave a "hodge-podge pot-luck" dinner party for six couples—everyone to bring his favorite dish. Each couple arrived with a cake! And Marge, knowing they were coming, baked a cake.

Sidney Skolsky in The New York Post

The suit was buckskin, with plenty of shredded fringe on it. The shirt was the loudest thing Wayne had seen that didn't explode and there was an improvement on a ten-gallon hat. Duke shuddered and refused to get into the clothes.

"Look, Bud," said the press agent, "you're supposed to be a gunfighter, a frontiersman. Now get into the suit."

"But I'll look like an idiot," said Duke.

"You just get into the suit," said the press agent, "and leave all the thinking to us. And remember your name is John Wayne."

Fresh from the days of dining in hamburger joints, Wayne got the message.

"Yes, sir," he said.

It was a sight to behold in New York and Philadelphia. Wayne was attempting to hide behind pillars and in doorways as he was led about for display by the press agent. But the payoff came in Chicago. Wayne was at a press conference and fed up to the neckline of his loud shirt.

"Do you always dress this way, Mr. Wayne?" a reporter asked.

Wayne turned his back on his keeper (who was nodding his head vigorously) and almost snarled an answer.

"What do you think I am? A monkey?" he roared. "I not only don't always wear this outfit, I'm never going to wear it again!"

And he stalked into the bathroom where he began to tear off the clothes and fling them into the other room in the center of the group of reporters. He has never worn Western clothes off screen again.

THERE WERE rough years after that, but John Wayne never would go on a publicity tour unless he was well briefed in what was expected of him. He wanted honesty in his contact with the public, and honesty from his producers.

A few years ago, though, he fell into a well-laid trap. Herbert Yates, the head of Republic Studio, called him on the phone and said he was going to London to chat with some of his representatives there. He casually suggested that Wayne come along. Duke wasn't working, so he agreed.

In London, after checking into their hotel, Wayne happened to look into a closet he hadn't used and saw a large Stetson hat perched on a shelf. He called in one of Yates' assistants and demanded to know what it was doing in there.

"Well," said the assistant, "the boss wants you to drop in on a few theatre managers with him and we thought it might be nice if you were in character."

"I am in character now," said Wayne, pointing to the plain snap-brim he had tossed on a chair.

But for once he was disuaded. He agreed to wear the hat. The next morning a small group of Republic people piled into a car and set out to see the theatre managers. As they pulled up to the first theatre, Wayne thought there was considerable activity around the place. They went inside to the manager's office and chatted a few minutes. Then came the shaft.

"Duke," said the man who had dug up the Stetson, "there are about three thousand kids sitting out there in the theatre waiting to see a morning show. It might be nice if you just stepped out on the stage and say hello."

"Now cut it out," said Wayne. "I came over here on a pleasure trip. Not to make personal appearances."

"I know," said the fellow, "but those kids know you're here and it would be a pity if they didn't get just a peek at you."

"Okay," said Wayne, "but this whole thing looks like a set-up to me."

"How can you say such things?" asked the man, pushing Wayne toward the wings. Then, just as Wayne was about to step on the stage, the chap waved his hand and the Stetson miraculously appeared on Duke's head.

Although he was inwardly fuming, Wayne spoke to the kids for about ten minutes and then started to take his leave. The manager stepped forward.

"Children," he said, "don't you think we ought to sing our song for Mr. Wayne?"

There was a roar of approval, and while Duke stood in complete embarrassment, every kid in the theatre stood up and they sang "She Wore A Yellow Ribbon."

When it was over Duke thanked them and then charged into the office. He poked his finger into the innocent face of the man with the Stetson.

"You might be able to tell me," he said, "that it was just a coincidence that those boys and girls were in this theatre when we came in. But nobody is going to tell me that three thousand English kids all know the words to 'She Wore A Yellow Ribbon' when the picture hasn't been opened here yet! I've been framed!"

He made the rest of the tour as planned, visiting some twenty London theatres that day—and in each one the kids stood up and sang "She Wore A Yellow Ribbon."

"I was sore," Wayne said. "But I couldn't get too mad at a guy who taught half the kids of London to sing a song just for me."

IF YOU SAW The Quiet Man you probably remember the scene in the small town pub in which the citizens, looking upon the stranger among them as something of an upstart, refused to have anything to do with him. Well, that scene came from real life. There was little to do in the village in which the picture was being shot, so the second evening the troupe was in town, Wayne wandered down to a local pub and set his foot on the bar rail. The place was well filled with Irishmen—and they quieted down in their conversation when Duke came in and eyed him suspiciously. Nobody recognized him.

Wayne had a drink, then offered to buy one for the barkeep. The man, with a nose as red as a tulip, avowed he never touched the stuff. After a while Wayne tried again. He asked the man standing next to him if he'd join him. The fellow muttered something about being a teetotaler. Wayne stood at the bar and fumed. Finally, he addressed the bartender in a loud voice.

FLIGHT OF THE HUMBLE BRANDO

Walking in New York City, we recognized Marlon Brando and Movita, strolling in the opposite direction. We turned to look and impulsively started to follow. Maybe they heard me gasp, "That's Marlon Brando!" and feared we would start an avalanche of autograph hunters. In any event, Movita dashed across the street and Brando ducked into a cafe. Really! That wasn't necessary. We were just admiring Streetcar fans who would have been too shy and considerate to invade their privacy.

Marian Rundell
Black River, New York

"Set up a drink," he said, "for everybody in the house."

The bartender did so and Wayne raised his glass. "Ireland forever!" he said, and downed his drink.

There was a long pause; nobody touched an alien glass. But here was a toast few men could ignore. And what Irishman will waste whisky? Finally, one chap picked up his shot and raised it high. One by one the others silently followed suit until all the glasses were empty. Still not a word had been spoken. Wayne was just about to give it up when a small fellow down at the end of the bar raised his voice.

"Bartender," he said, "I wish to buy everybody in the house a drink—so that we can toast our friend from America."

Wayne was no more a stranger.

These were pleasant journeys, even though there were minor annoyances and hard work involved in many of them. But there were unpleasant trips.

About the time his marriage to Chata Wayne was headed for a reef, John Wayne spent no more time in America than he had to. Duke used to take off and go anywhere an airplane would land. And they landed in some unlikely places. Small airfields in the Andes. Remote military establishments, for Duke never missed an opportunity to drop in at some outpost to say hello and chat with Marines in the field.

He toured every South American country and, as usual, played fair with the press. Some of the journalistic methods of our South American friends were quite shocking to him, though. There was the time he had just fallen asleep in the nude on top of his bed in a city in Brazil when he was awakened by a bright light. He snapped open his eyes and saw a photographer just lowering his camera at the foot of his bed. The light had been a flash bulb. The cameraman took off like a deer and Wayne, with a mighty roar, leaped out of bed and chased after him. He caught the terrified photographer at the door and dragged him back into the room.

Although Wayne doesn't speak Spanish, the man knew what was expected of him. He withdrew the plate from the camera and handed it to Duke.

"Now," said Wayne, "if you'll just sit there and wait until I get dressed I'll pose for all the pictures you want. But there'll be no cheesecake, see!"

Wayne got dressed and they took pictures for an hour.

It was on one of these exile trips that John Wayne first met the girl who is to be his wife, Pilar Pallette. It was in Lima, the capital of Peru, where she was employed as an actress. He saw her across a room full of people and paid little attention to her. Somebody introduced them, but neither stayed to chat. It was not love at first sight. They found nothing in common, even though both were unhappy because of marriages that were on the rocks.

But he met her again in Los Angeles a year or more later, and, as time has proven, they meant a good deal to each other after that meeting.

The sun was beginning to slip behind the row of elm trees across the valley. The large green gate began to swing open in response to a button pressed by Scotty in the kitchen. A car pulled on to the macadam road and threaded through the shrubs and trees toward the house.

Duke got up and walked to the parking strip and helped the small Peruvian girl out of her car. He kissed her lightly on the cheek and led her to the terrace.

"Scotty," he called, "you can serve dinner out here any time you're ready."

"Yes, sir," Scotty called back.

Wayne turned to Pilar. "I don't know how you feel about eating outdoors," he said. "But you might as well get used to it. You and I are going to be eating dinner out here for a long time. This is going to be home."

They smiled at each other—and you could tell they both had been looking forward to the day the big man finally came home to stay. END the first year is the hardest

Half-way through the outburst the strong arms of Tarzan reached out for his mate and lifted her up even with his six feet, four. "It must be very rugged," grinned Lex Barker sympathetically. "But tell me—sorry you married me?" And he didn't let her down until the answer came —"Not for one minute!" And along with it a contentment for Mrs. Barker that kicked away all the cares—real and fancied.

Legally speaking, you might say Lana Turner's statement that recent trying day was obtained under duress and therefore should be stricken from official records. But just for this record, she meant every word she said. Lana wouldn't trade places with any other girl in the world. As Lana and Lex Barker toast their first anniversary in champagne she can count almost as many blessings as bubbles.

For the first time in her life Lana has a husband who treats her as a partner—not a toy.

For the first time, too, Lana is solvent—and with money in the bank! Only a few months ago she was heavily in hock. Today she doesn't owe a penny outside current bills; she has annuities, blue chip stocks and interest in some oil wells.

For the first time the playgirl aura that palled is gone. For the first time Lana isn't escaping from an anxious, unhappy home life to court the frantic "pleasures" of Hollywood's glitter mills. She's running her home instead of letting it run her away. The girl who used to make sensational headlines every week, hasn't made even a mild one in fifty-two weeks.

For the first time, too, she has a happy, congenial and rounded family—the sister that Cheryl always longed for in Lex's Lynn, her exact age, eleven, and a little brother "Zan." What's more, there are plans and good prospects for new babies of her own.

Lana's career has jumped back into high gear, with the high powered, glamorous kind of pictures that made her famous. She's playing super-sexy Astarte in The Prodigal, MGM's showiest effort of the year, so expensive that it doesn't even have a budget. And this on a brand new contract for five more years at $5000 a week, with an option for two more.

Most of this—and more—Lana Turner well knows is a direct result of the happiness, peace and stability she has found in her marriage with Lex Barker. And that is a solid surprise to almost everyone—including the lucky lady herself. If cynics viewing Lana's past marital storms—and Lex's—didn't give the union an outside chance at the start, Lana herself gave it an even harder time. Not much more than a year ago, "marriage" to Lana was understandably an unpleasant word. No girl ever gagged more at the scent of orange blossoms.

Lucille Ball has been telling her studio crew her favorite psychiatrist joke: A man was notified by his psychiatrist, "If you don't pay your bill, I'm going to let you go crazy." —Paul Denis

The big house on Mapleton Drive that she had salvaged from the wreck of her marriage with Bob Topping was up for sale. Lana never thought she'd be needing it again. She had grabbed at the chance to leave Hollywood and its memories for Paris to make Flame And The Flesh, taking her mother Mildred and Cheryl—all the family she had—with her. But before she left, she made the happy mistake of accepting an invitation to dinner at Lex Barker's Westwood apartment. After a home-cooked meal she almost dropped her wine glass when that calm character observed, "Now, when we get married—"

"I beg your pardon!" gasped Lana. "When who gets married?"

"Us, of course," grinned Barker. "Who else?"

"I think," Lana cooled him off, "you've had too much of this wine and I think you had better take me home." Which he did. But he's pretty stubborn.

Only a few weeks later when Lana boarded the transatlantic plane at Idlewild airport there was A. C. Barker II, in the seat next to hers pretending to be surprised, as she definitely was. He explained that he'd been to see his folks in

New York and was on his way to Italy to make a couple of pictures for Cinemex. He didn't say why he was going by way of Paris or why his seat happened to be next to hers. But she could guess—and so without mincing words Lana corrected all mistaken impressions before they took off.

"I'll look forward to seeing you in Europe," she promised. "But marriage is out. Never again. I've had it." But that, of course, was where Lana Turner was wrong.

When you review an actress' courtship, marriage and what has followed on a first anniversary eve, events are prone to be tinted in rosy hues, especially when things have worked out as happily as they have for her. But Lana is not the type to paint any lily. "Believe me, I was putting on no act. I wasn't being coy about anything," she says, frankly, "or playing hard to get. I just plain didn't want to get married. I thought certainly experience had proved it wasn't for me ever again."

Lex was no stranger to Lana before all this began. Most people remember their highly publicized exchange of escorts at Marion Davies' big party. Lana came with Fernando Lamas and Arlene Dahl came with Lex—and after the public fireworks they switched partners. Since then Lana had seen Lex off and on.

She knew he was from a good New York family, a graduate of Phillips-Exeter Academy headed for Princeton until a weakness in math and a break on Broadway changed his plans to be an engineer. She knew he was variously talented—formerly a Manhattan commercial artist, had been the liaison officer with the French Zouaves in North Africa whose language he spoke like a native. She knew he had all the social graces, was well-traveled and a gourmet who liked his own cooking, that he was an athlete of proportions at golf, tennis and skiing. She knew he was witty, affable, friendly and of course handsome as all get out with a Greek god body. He'd had reasonable success although he considered himself destined for better things than his ape-man roles. She also knew he had a way with the ladies and that she liked him herself.

But if Lana Turner had been on the prowl for her fourth husband—which she wasn't—Lex Barker definitely would have been the last man in the world she'd have picked as her quarry.

She knew about Lex's unhappy first marriage and even more about his brief marriage to Arlene Dahl. Strangely enough, these domestic demerits—both Lana Turner's and Lex Barker's—actually drew them together and have held them that way ever since. Both appreciate what they've found in each other.

As Lex says today, "Lana's the first woman I've ever known who listens to what I tell her." And as Lana says, "Lex is the first man I've ever known who would discuss everything with me." In short, they have companionship in addition to adult love. And Lana's discovery of Lex Barker's capacity for that is really what changed her mind. In Europe she saw a side of him she hadn't known before, a side she liked too much to lose.

For eight months Lana and Lex carried on a European courtship. Mostly it was a courtship family style, with Lex's children and their governess in Italy, Cheryl and Lana's mother in Paris. Both the things they did—their sightseeing rambles throughout Italy, France and Spain—and the places they stayed—Naples, Paris, London, Capri—were with kids and in-laws around. When picture locations pulled them apart there was something missing, not only for Lex and Lana, but for Cheryl, Lynne and Zan.

Lana found herself in the puzzling position of refusing to admit she was seriously in love with Lex Barker—and at the same time knowing she was kicking fate right in the teeth. "Even when I was saying 'uh-uh' to Lex I wrote the real estate agent back home and yanked my house off the market," she remembers. "Now why would I do a thing like that?"

Bank Holiday—the time when all England closes shop tight—was when Lana's resistance finally weakened. She was in London for interiors of The Flame And The Flesh" when Lex flew up from Rome. They drove up to Maidenhead on the Thames, and a lovelier place, Lana thinks, she's never seen—with willows sweeping the shimmering river and antique beauty all about. "Anyone who could be in Maidenhead and not get romantic isn't human," she sighs. "Nobody ever accused me of that." So when Lex asked for the 900th time, "When are you going to marry me?" she found herself answering that she was going to the minute the picture was finished. And that is about what they did, one year ago September 7.

Among Lana's first-year memories naturally the ceremony in Italy stands out above all. There was another ceremony, of course, last Christmas Eve in Hollywood—just to wrap up the union without question. But the rites in Turin are the ones that Lana and Lex Barker are celebrating this September as most of Turin did at the time, despite Lana's careful plans to make a "quiet affair"—still remembering the showy rites with Bob Topping and the disastrous results.

At a preview, a fan rushed up to Walter Brennan and gushed: "May I have your autograph, Mr. Hayes?" Brennan, playing it straight, wrote, "I'll never be the actor that Walter Brennan is—Gabby Hayes."

Sidney Skolsky in The New York Post

They chose Italy because Lex's children were there and because, as Lana explains, "People in Italy get married to stay that way. We wanted all the good omens we could find, because both Lex and I wanted this to be for keeps." That charm, so far, has worked like a charm—but the memory of their cloak-and-dagger precautions for privacy and the way things turned out, still makes Lana laugh.

"We took a villa up on a hill overlooking the Po River to get all the family together. A place with high walls and hedges. We paid off half of Italy, I think, to keep the secret. We arranged to have the wedding at six o'clock after the registry closed, swore the mayor and our attorney to secrecy. On our wedding day we pulled down the blinds because the bushes were jumping with reporters wondering what was up, but with a pretty good idea.

"The afternoon of the wedding Lex drove out in the Jaguar alone—or so it seemed. But down on the floor in the back was the bride—me—covered with a car robe. I wasn't exactly blushing but I was mussed and smothering. I've always thought he kept me there too long just to make me suffer. But there was one thing we didn't know—in Italy there's a law that all civil weddings must take place with the doors wide open. We might as well have been married in the town square! I wouldn't say it was a romantic setting. Scrubwomen with mops and pails crowded around us and, because the ceremony was in Italian, interpreters had to tell us what was going on all through the event. It was hot, it was confusing and it was crowded. But it was very, very real to me and the people couldn't have been sweeter. I still have the bouquet of white bovardia the mayor who married us gave me. How he knew that was my favorite flower I'll never know."

The honeymoon was more romantic although Lana worked throughout most of it. Mildred Turner spirited all the kids back to Paris by train, then off to Hollywood for school. The newlyweds drove back, picking out every idyllic inn they could find on the way. They stayed in Lana's Paris apartment while Pierre Balmain fitted her wardrobe for Betrayed. Then Mr. and Mrs. Barker went to Holland on location. They spent most of the time there in the romantic forest of Arnhem in the Koonings Jaght, a king's vast hunting lodge. The leaves were turning crimson and gold, deer came right up to their window and in the evenings geese streaked south across the sky. No wonder Lana remembers Betrayed, despite its ominous title, as the most heavenly picture job she ever had. She worked almost every day while Lex caught up on his golf with Vic Mature. There were relaxed evenings by the fireplace and good companionship with Vic and a fellow Lana's been soft on in a filial way for years, Clark Gable. By the time they flew back to Hollywood last December, Lana and Lex realized what they had together and made some resolutions.

STRANGERS ON A TRAIN

Once while riding a train, the gentleman next to me engaged me in conversation. As we passed some snow-covered mountains I remarked, "If only I had some skis, I'd get off at the next stop and go skiing." The gentleman leaned over to the passenger in front of us and said, "Could you oblige, ski nose?" The passenger lowered his paper and laughed. It was Bob Hope!

"They were pretty simple ones," Lana reveals. "Just these—that no matter what happened we'd never say two things—either, 'I'm leaving' or mention the word 'divorce.' If you don't say those things they just can't happen. Of course, we've had arguments," she admits frankly, "some hot and some heavy. The first year is always the hardest. Neither Lex nor I are perfect. We've had our adjustments to make. But we've never gone to sleep without saying 'I'm sorry' and we've never held a grudge. I know the word seems strange applied to me—but the thing Lex and I try to be is sensible."

Lana's right. On past performance not even her best friends would beam that level-headed adjective in her direction. "Maybe I've caught some sense from Lex," she guesses, "or perhaps I've finally grown up. After all, it was about time." Anyway, on the first year's record both Lana and Lex have demonstrated sane thinking.

Take the house they live in. It's the same house Lana and Bob Topping bought, the one that was up for sale when she left for Europe—and reasonably so. Just Lana and Cheryl would never need a fourteen-room mansion. Like all honeymooners, the Barkers dreamed of something new, designed just for them. "But then," says Lana, "we asked ourselves why. It's perfect—handy for both of our studios, big enough for our family, a huge yard for the kids, a tennis court and pool. All it needed was changing for our particular needs. Instead of selling and finding something else probably half as good, we just fixed it up."

Actually, the big chateau looks very much as it did before Lana left it. The décor and furnishings are of the Topping era. Besides Lex's sword, dagger and gun collection in the lanai, some paintings and souvenirs brought back from Europe, there's nothing different inside. They added a new guest wing over a double garage. Lex's sister, Fredricka and her son Peter stayed there and Lynn and Zan sleep there when they come over from Jack and Connie Adams' house in Westwood nearby. The garage and expanded driveway is to handle their collection of cars—Lex's Lincoln Capri, the red and black Volkswagen baby bus, and Lana's new yellow racer, the Ghia Fiat that's already the talk of car-happy Hollywood. The other improvement was to convert an upstairs porch into a walk-in wardrobe closet for Lana, although there's not too much to fill it with these days. Here again, Lana has changed.

There was a time when Lana would romp off to "kill a couple of hours and spend $1500," as she remembers a little unbelievingly now. Then if she saw a dress she liked she'd buy it in all colors. Now she's lucky if she brings one home. Another smart move Lana made the minute she returned to Hollywood was to hire a business manager. "I never used to know where my money went. I didn't know whether I had fifty cents or $5000. I still don't prize money for money's sake, but for the first time in my life, I know what a comfortable feeling a little nest egg is."

Lana has more than that—although as late as 1952 she wondered how she'd ever pay off her back taxes. Beatrice Halstead, the shrewd woman who handles her finances helped work the miracle. She tells Lana, "This is for expenses. This is for taxes. This is to play with—and this is to be saved." There's no back talk. Lex and Lana are just as sensible about their family finances. He makes less than half Lana's salary and the arrangement they have divides the household expenses in proportion.

All this doesn't mean that Lana has turned pinchpenny. Nor does she have to. The Ghia Fiat is proof of that. Lana bought the flashy sports car and herds it around Hollywood considerably under the 150 m.p.h. it can do, but actually it was Lex who had his eye on the beauty ever since he and Gary Cooper took a spin in one at the Paris auto show and drooled. Knowing that, when Lana spied hers at Dutch Darrin's shop in Hollywood she said, "Wrap it up," although the price equals a down payment on a fair-sized house. There's only one other like it in America. So far she hasn't collected a traffic ticket—although the other day when Lex called her at the beauty shop and said he wanted to see her, he had hardly put down the phone before the racer screeched to a stop in the driveway. "How did you get here?" he gasped, "Fly?" And that's another thing.

Since Lana and Lex were married they've hardly been apart longer than brief hours like that—consciously, too. Both know how two careers can split up a home, that in Hollywood absence is not likely to make two hearts grow fonder. So they've resolved to stick closer than glue. When Lex was called back to New York at his father's last illness Lana went with him. When he went off to the drab desert town of Mojave to shoot Yellow Mountain, Lana trotted along, too, living in a motel where there was nothing to do night or day—except be with her old man. But that's where she was.

How long they can keep up that side-by-side resolve, of course, is questionable now that both careers are starting to roll again. Lex's new contract with Universal-International might take him almost anywhere and Lana herself has no assurance she'll check in forever at Culver City after The Prodigal and My Most Intimate Friend, which follows, with Lana's most intimate friend Ava Gardner. One of the bittersweet breaks they've had since they came home is career idleness. It's been great for companionship but as both complain, "By now we're getting a little buggy." There's nothing a contract actor can do when the studio doesn't call except wait.

Fortunately, they've had plenty to do with the house projects, catching up with their friends in the evenings and keeping three kids happy by day. Lex and Lana have Lynne and Zan every weekend and they're hoping to have them more and more. That's what they really built the new bedrooms for. Fortunately, Lex and his first wife, Connie, and her husband, Jack Adams, are on friendly terms. As for Cheryl, she's pretty crazy about the new daddy she calls "Po." Lex is the type who understands ladies of all ages and knows how to please them. He started Cherry off on her present ice-skating kick and when the piano lessons get too tough takes her side against mama as Lana wails "he does in most everything"—but she's not really too mad about it.

When Cherry begged to leave for a Girl Scout camp, Lana acted like a fluttery mother hen and forbade the overnight excursion. There was quite a scene, with tears and stormy protests until Lex sauntered in, learned the issue and broke it up with, "Why not? That's what Girl Scouts are for, isn't it?" Outnumbered, Lana gave in and wound up driving the whole troop to the mountains and bringing them back. Almost every day it's a family struggle to see who picks up Cherry at school, and it was Lex's idea that Cheryl go along when he took Lana to Acapulco for a second honeymoon after their remarriage.

Of course, life is not all kids for the Barkers. Both Lex and Lana are still out for adult good times, although what they call good times today aren't escaping from nervous loneliness to the nightclub circuit. They get around—with Liz Taylor and Mike Wilding, Ursula Thiess and Bob Taylor, Cubby and Nedra Broccoli and a lot of others, both at their houses, and out on the town—but not so often. The other night they took their house guest, Fredricka, to see Joe E. Lewis on the Strip and pulled in, a little shocked at themselves, around two-thirty A.M. But mostly it's a prosaic married folks back-and-forth dinner deal, at which Lana confesses she's hopelessly in debt. "We owe everybody in this town," she sighs, "and that's one thing my business manager can't fix." This delinquency leaves Lex Barker strangely unmoved. He has another new and sensible idea about Hollywood social life.

"Hollywood actors just get in trouble when they party around," observes Lana's husband, who should know. "Sports are the thing. There are a lot of things people don't know about Lana. Guess what I married. An athlete! You ought to see this girl swim, play tennis and golf. Why the pro at Bel Air says she has the most perfect natural swing of any pupil he ever had!" That may be a surprise to the Mocambo set, but it's gospel.

Lex dragged Lana practically by her hair onto a golf course in Holland. To his surprise, she made four bogeys on her first round. Back home he trotted her pronto to the Bel Air clubhouse and today she gives him a fair match, although Lex is a ten-handicap swatter. Now he's teaching her surfing. When the next mutual vacation comes up, they're off to Hawaii. For that idyll, Lex has been taking some instruction, too—on a guitar. Vicente Gomez, the virtuoso, dropped in at the house not long ago and when Lex heard him romp on the melon box he just had to learn. For a long time he kept it secret, hoping after their anniversary dinner to casually yawn, "Oh, let's have a little music," trot the thing out and make it ring with "Romance," Lana's favorite tune. To pull off this feat, he had to hide in the bathroom, the basement and a few other confining places to practice, so he finally let the secret out in order to get hot for the occasion.

All these activities, besides keeping Lex and Lana Barker together and out of possible mischief, have banished another nightmare that used to haunt Lana, particularly when she wasn't on a set. "I used to let myself gain weight between pictures," she admits, "then go through agonies getting in shape for the cameras. Now it's no problem." Already Lana has dropped nine pounds despite eight months vacation—and lucky for her, too.

Lana will be making the greatest bid for high style sex and glamour of her entire career as Astarte in The Prodigal, where she can use every curve she's ever owned. With slanted eyes, gold leaf makeup, and dripping half the jewels in Solomon's Mines, (one pair of shoes cost $500 and an opal-studded dress $5000) Lana is out to make all the sexy sirens of Hollywood's past look like schoolmarms.

If you know your Near East mythology, this Astarte doll was just about the end-all of femininity, a gorgeous creature who signified the ultimate in love and beauty.

Nobody thinks Lana Turner is exactly miscast and naturally she's tingling with excitement about reviving the seductive, glamour-stacked Lana the customers have always cried for.

Both Lana and Lex Barker would welcome a family of their own. Lana's mate is christened Alexander Crichlow Barker, the Second. His son is the Third and his dad is the First.

"They call Lex's father 'Al,'" says Lana, "He's 'Lex, and our boy is 'Zan.' There's just one syllable missing. All we need is a 'Der.'"

Right now Lana and Lex Barker can't think of much more happiness than their first year of marriage has brought them both. But there's just one thing that could top all that by the time their second anniversary rolls around. That's one more Barker to fill out the family name. END

little things mean a lot

(Continued from page 49) had rented private homes for their location stay in St. George. All Dick and June had was a single motel room. Here, June washed Dick's socks every evening and hung them in the window to dry. Here, too, she gabbed with Dick's two children by a previous marriage, Norman and Ellen.

Norman and Mike Wayne (Duke's son) have roles in The Conqueror. Ellen came along just to be with her dad.

June knew that Ellen's sixteenth birthday was coming up and she arranged a surprise party for her stepdaughter.

In short, June worked herself to a frazzle just keeping her family happy. She hates flying, but one weekend she flew back to Los Angeles to bring her daughter Pamela to St. George. She even rode with Dick on his new motorcycle.

She was wonderfully kind to the citizens of St. George. They would knock on her motel door and ask for autographs or ask her to step outside for pictures. June was always gracious and compliant.

One time when Dick was out in the middle of the parched desert, June insisted upon driving eight miles over really rough terrain to lunch with him. The production crew had warned her that a cloudburst was in the offing and the roads would be impassable. But June went ahead, anyway. While she was there, a bridge was washed out and she couldn't get back to the motel for hours.

When news of her many family activities wafted back to Hollywood, some local observers, jaded and skeptical, found the news difficult to believe. Perhaps they didn't want to believe that June, in the most trying of circumstances, was a model wife. For months they had been whispering that "there's trouble in the Powell-Allyson household."

FRIEND IN NEED

Leaving a Fifth Avenue store with my arms full of boxes, I tried to get a cab but I found myself dropping bundles. A nice, tall man asked if he could help, took two boxes from me and found a taxi. Gratefully, I said there should be more fellows like him. He thanked me and as he spoke he removed his sunglasses. It was Jimmy Stewart.

Miss Mary Squitteri
New York, N. Y.

This rumor began several months ago when June and Dick were out to dinner with friends. The Powells began to quarrel. June (who is so emotional she cries at card tricks) jumped up from her seat, ran out, and hailed a cab.

Next day Hollywood was whispering that the Powell-Allyson marriage had turned sour. Said one know-it-all: "It figures. Let's face it. They've been married nine years. That's par for the course."

Said others: "She's just tired of playing Trilby . . . Two careers in one family just don't mix . . . I never expected it to last!"

June was disturbed by these rumors.

"Richard and I quarreled," she admitted. "So what? All married couples have disagreements. It was nothing important. It's over and done with."

Yet June was deeply hurt. She couldn't understand why people were ready to write off her nine years of marriage.

Didn't they understand that she and Richard had been through so much together, they had become inseparable parts of each other's lives?

Didn't they realize that only a few months before she had come close to losing her husband on the operating table?

"I'll never forget it," she says, "so long as I live. It happened last winter just before I started the Glenn Miller job. Richard got up in the middle of the night. He thought he was suffering from indigestion. He took some bicarbonate of soda and went back to bed. Then he took a little brandy. But that didn't help either.

"When morning came I called a doctor. By then the pain had spread all over his stomach and his skin was red and I was really frightened.

"The doctor said it was just a virus and told me not to worry. He gave Richard some sedatives and told me everything would be fine. Only Richard's pain got worse and worse and he was in agony for the next three days.

"I stayed with him all the time but on the third night I just couldn't keep my eyes open any longer. I fell asleep right on top of the bedspread and when I awoke, Richard was sitting on my bed and water was running down his face and I remember saying to myself in a daze, 'That's funny. Why is he taking a shower at this time of the night?' And as I tried to shake the sleep out of my eyes, Richard mumbled, 'Help me, June. Please help me.' And then he collapsed in a heap at the foot of the bed.

"I don't know how I managed but I dragged him to the bed, and it was then that his appendix burst. We rushed him to the hospital for an emergency operation. Richard is allergic to penicillin, so they couldn't use that to kill the infection and it began to spread through his system.

"Then the terrible mental torture began. Suppose he dies, I asked myself. What will I do? How will I ever be able to tell Ricky or Pam?

"And Richard was dying. There was no doubt about it. Another operation was necessary. They were giving him blood transfusions and feeding him intravenously and it looked like the end for sure.

"A priest went into Richard's room and then walked out to me and said, 'You'd better go in, Mrs. Powell.'

"And I can't tell you how I felt when I walked in and saw Richard on that bed, almost lifeless. I began to talk to him, telling him that he must live, must live. I don't know what I said. But after a while his eyes opened ever so slowly and he mumbled, 'This is a helluva way to quit smoking. Isn't it, June?' And once he said that I knew he'd pull through."

Such experiences bind a man and wife together and to June it's incredible that anyone might think a picayune quarrel could nullify such love as theirs.

TO OTHERS it is not incredible at all. A prominent director, for example, who has known the Powells for years, says, "The reason many Hollywood people expected June's marriage to fail is relatively simple. At the time of their marriage, Junie had nothing in common with Dick except a show business background. She was twenty years younger than he—naive, insecure and incapable of helping him socially, domestically or professionally.

"She couldn't sail, couldn't play tennis or golf, didn't know how to run a house, was wracked by an inferiority complex, stammered when speaking to the servants. In short she was a New York City kid who had been raised in poverty.

"Her acting career, however, was going great guns, and Dick's was not. The wise

Shrinks Hemorrhoids New Way Without Surgery

Science Finds Healing Substance That Relieves Pain—Shrinks Hemorrhoids

For the first time science has found a new healing substance with the astonishing ability to shrink hemorrhoids and to stop bleeding—without surgery.

In case after case, pain was relieved promptly. And, while gently relieving pain, actual reduction (shrinkage) took place.

Most amazing of all—results were so thorough that sufferers made astonishing statements like "Piles have ceased to be a problem!"

The secret is a new healing substance (Bio-Dyne®)—discovery of a world-famous research institute.

Now this new healing substance is offered in ointment form under the name of *Preparation H. Ask for it at all drug stores—money back guarantee.

guys thought that sooner or later jealousy would ruin the marriage. They didn't understand that June and Dick are intelligent and have great strength of character.

"In the years he's been married to Junie, Dick has taught her a great deal. He still chooses scripts for her, and she still abides by his decisions, because they are wise decisions born of extensive experience.

"Some actresses resent their husbands' counsel. Not June. She respects Dick and loves him for all he's done. And in the dark days several years ago when his career seemed to have slumped, she always maintained great faith in his ability.

"That faith has paid off. Today Dick Powell is one of the biggest men in Hollywood. He owns a TV series, Four Star Playhouse, produced by Powell Enterprises and sponsored by Singer Sewing Machine. He alternates with three other top names, Charles Boyer, David Niven and Ronald Colman.

"Dick is one of Howard Hughes' favorites at RKO. Hughes signed him as a director in 1952 and Dick did an excellent directorial job on Split Second. Last year Hughes made him a producer and this year Dick is not only directing and producing but he's just finished starring with Debbie Reynolds in Susan Slept Here.

"June's career is in high, too. The Glenn Miller Story is one of the big money makers of the year, and she has just signed a share-the-profits deal with Alan Ladd. Under the circumstances, it seems impossible that career problems could cause Dick and June to split up—and unlikely that anything else could.

"But the rumors persist because people don't realize how much Junie has changed in the last ten years. They think she is the same clinging, bewildered kid who married Powell in 1945 and that Powell is envious of her success. Or that she is currently resenting his guidance."

POWELL SAYS, "Who has time to deny silly rumors? I'm too busy making a picture."

In St. George, June said. "Dick and I have never been happier. It just hurts me to see him working so hard. Every night after the day's shooting he holds long conferences with his staff. He's really a very fine director. I'm sure this picture will prove it.

"The reason I'm out here with Richard is because I love him and want to be near him. I was away from him during the shooting of Strategic Air Command. And I don't like being away from him."

That does not sound like two people on the verge of separation. Of course, conditions might change but this isn't very likely. Ever since Dick married June, he's had eyes for no one else. No matter how gauche she was, he never strayed, never grew angry, never got fed up. And as June says, "It began to penetrate my thick skull years ago that Richard loved me for myself. And when I became sure of that I began to grow up."

June was wise enough to ask for children to solidify the marriage.

At first Dick was chary of adopting children. (He had two by his previous marriage to Joan Blondell). But only because he wasn't at all sure that June could handle children.

In 1949, when Joan Crawford told the Powells about an adoption home in Memphis, Tennessee, they adopted their daughter Pamela from there.

Two years later on her way back to Memphis to adopt a brother for Pam, June found that adoption wouldn't be necessary. She gave birth to Richard Keith on Christmas Eve that year.

It has surprised many people, but June turned out to be a model mother thereby winning her husband's lasting respect.

When Dick married June she had relatively few friends in Hollywood. He introduced her to his own world, a conservative world of prominent, wealthy, influential people. June had to do some drastic adapting, and while she made many errors at first, she gradually learned to feel at home with all kinds of people.

During this adaptation, she dropped the chorus girls she had known and grown up with in New York (Betsy Kelly, Gene's wife, and Jane Ball, Monte Prosser's wife) largely because they rarely crossed her path, but partly because she did not feel capable of mixing the two worlds.

LAST YEAR after ten years in Hollywood, June seemed to have conquered her inferiority complex.

She refused to sign with MGM again and struck out on her own, fully confident that she would do well. And she has.

She hired a secretary who once worked in the Copacabana chorus line, even as June had.

Simultaneously she became the mistress of a vast new estate in Mandeville Canyon, refurbishing the place and supervising it with dispatch and precision.

There were suggestions, of course, that she was revolting from Powell's domination, asserting her own personality at last. But actually June's real personality never has been submerged. It has been merely in the process of development. It has taken June a long time to get over her fear of assuming responsibility. Now June is sure of her own values and does not hesitate to act on them.

"In my book," she said a few weeks ago, "Richard's happiness and the happiness of our family come first. If there's any time left, I'll think about my career.

So long as cute little Junie adheres to that program, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Powell are destined to go on with many years of domestic bliss.

time of trouble for liz

(Continued from page 40) Now Liz is suffering, "but not seriously," from hepatitis. Anyone with hepatitis has a serious liver condition. The charm and beauty of Elizabeth cannot except her. So maybe it's psychosomatic, suggest some. Maybe it's pseudo-hepatitis brought on by the fact that she's desperately unhappy.

ADD NASTY STORIES. A busybody on the MGM lot reports an unmistakable warmth in Liz' attitude toward a certain handsome young man under contract to that studio. Just flirting, perhaps, teasing a little—but isn't it significant that this gentleman is much closer to Miss Taylor's own age than her husband is?

"Sure, she's making eyes at some other guy," say those who consider it a privilege to cast the first stone, "and it's long overdue. Look at the record."

Well, let's look at the record, in honesty and fairness to the girl. Liz was seventeen, not even graduated from the studio high school, when she met Lt. Glenn Davis. They were in love or not, depending on how you look at it. Liz says it was hero-worship and, being a gentleman, Glenn says nothing—but a full-page picture of one of their embraces in Life magazine said a mouthful. And Mrs. Francis Taylor, in a story about her daughter, wrote, "That September Elizabeth was sent to England for The Conspirator. She wrote Glenn every night and never went out on a date the five months we were there." If that isn't love, there are plenty of Hollywoodites who would accept it gladly as a substitute.

Unfortunately, however, in pursuit of his Army duties, Lt. Davis went too far and stayed too long. In one of his absences she met a handsome and wealthy young man named Bill Pawley in Florida, and her dancing heart was gone again. Bill was on his way to the West Coast to see her again before Liz faced up to the fact that Glenn had to be told. He must have been astonished to find himself in the position of the rejected suitor, not having known that he had any competition, but Glenn retired from the field gracefully and without recrimination.

The engagement of Liz and Bill was announced on June 7, 1949. Three months later, at the request of his fiancée, Mr. Pawley, Jr., announced that the engagement was off. An optimistic lad, he hoped that the new arrangement was only temporary. Yes, they were in love. The problem was that his work kept him in the East while Liz labored in Hollywood—a full continent away. He hoped that things could be worked out, Bill told the press. They couldn't. The truth is that he wanted her to give up her career and live in Florida, his home. Possibly in the first blush of romance the picture looked rosy, but within three months Liz showed a marked reluctance to part with California, career and limelight. She couldn't promise and, since Bill couldn't be dissuaded from his conviction that a wife's place is with her husband, the engagement was off.

It was at this point that the London Sunday Pictorial suggested someone "should administer a series of resounding smacks behind the bustle of (Liz') latest Paris creation" for silly and irresponsible behavior. For the first time in her young life Elizabeth Taylor was getting a bad press, particularly notable because it was a British newspaper taking her to task. Having spent the first eight years of her life in England, she had always been a favorite daughter.

When you look at the record, she hadn't done anything so terrible. She had been engaged twice, and twice she had disengaged herself when it became clear that happiness lay in some other direction. Is that wrong? Should she instead have allowed each romance to reach its ultimate end in marriage, becoming a two-time loser in the divorce courts before she was out of her teens? It seems bad enough to make a mistake without deliberately compounding the error, which Liz would have done if she hadn't backed away from those two early engagements.

A month after the Pawley situation had been disposed of, Liz met Nicky Hilton and did not fall in love at first sight. Liz was growing cautious, as well she might, since Hollywood's reaction to her third engagement was, "Oh, really? And who's next?" She was wary, she wanted to be sure, and Nicky courted her a full eight months.

At that time Liz told no less a reliable source than Louella O. Parsons. "There is no doubt in my mind that he is the one I want to spend my life with. Since we met we have never had one quarrel, one moment of misunderstanding. Every day I love him better." They were married on May 6, 1950, in the Beverly Hills Church of the Good Shepherd. Liz had even begun taking instruction in the Catholic faith because Nicky is a Catholic.

The Hiltons' blissful state of mutual understanding must have ended a day or so after they exchanged vows. First reports from Europe, where they honeymooned, were that the youngsters' marriage didn't have a ghost of a chance. By the time they came home, it looked pretty much confirmed; Liz had lost too much weight, was overtly miserable, and the usually affable Nicky had turned surly, difficult.

PEOPLE IMMEDIATELY and inevitably took sides. "Nicky is a spoiled brat," said the Taylor camp. "Even on their honeymoon he left her alone while he drank and gambled and chased around. He used language abusive enough to crush a sensitive girl like Liz."

To which the Hilton retinue retorted, "Nobody's denying that Nick is headstrong or even spoiled. But he's also a very intelligent guy, and she's only beautiful. There's nothing below the beautiful surface. He probably went out because he was bored silly." Cruel words, accusing them both, helping them not at all.

The doom-shaped pattern was unfolding. In October Liz Taylor went to Palm Springs alone "to rest," denying that she had had another fight with Nicky or that she intended to give up her career in an attempt to save her marriage. "My husband has no objection to my career," she said then. "We are very happy."

Yet, within four weeks, she filed suit for divorce after a little more than six months of marriage. The charge was cruelty, which covers a multitude of sins and nobody knows how much heartbreak. By her own admission, Liz cried for days and nights on end after receiving her interlocutory decree. Was it the right thing to do? She didn't know, and apparently Nicky didn't, either, because two months after that initial decree was granted, the manager of the Thunderbird Hotel in Las Vegas reported that Liz and Nicky were there, dining and dancing, holding hands and kissing for all the world to see.

They got together still another time before it was all over. That October Hollywood was rocked by the news that Elizabeth Taylor, accompanied by Nick's brother, was flying to Houston to see her erstwhile husband. "It's news to me," Nick said with a poker-faced shrug. "I'm here on a business trip." But when Liz was bedded down with a cold in New York and unable to make the trip, he flew up to keep the rendezvous.

"Liz is emotionally upset by rumors that Nicky is engaged to Betsy von Furstenberg and will marry her as soon as the divorce is final," said a New York representative of MGM. Assuming that it was true, there was still nothing to get upset about. Miss Von Furstenberg has been engaged to practically every eligible male in the American theatre without having once been brought to altar.

The story was not allowed to be true, however. MGM's West Coast office rushed into print to deny it and said, instead, that Liz and Nicky were meeting to discuss a property settlement. It was a likely story, except that there was no property to discuss. Liz had already said she wanted nothing from Nicky other than a divorce. What's more, Nicky's father had given her a huge chunk of Hilton Hotel stock for a wedding present.

The odds are that the two confused kids got together to talk about a possible reconcilation one last time. Who knows, except the people involved? All the world knows is that if such was their intention, someone's proud neck still refused to bow.

This was the most trying year of her life for little Elizabeth Taylor. She went home to her family when she left Nicky Hilton, then moved away into an apartment of her own. Talk around town was that the breach between the Taylors was a bad one, which Liz refused to dignify with either a confirmation or a denial. "I moved out because I have to learn to rely on myself, to make my own decisions," she said. "I have to grow up some time, don't I?"

Judging from the defiant and often childish statements she made in the months that followed, Liz didn't grow up very much. She said, "Nicky was a big mistake. I think the idea of a June wedding appealed to me more than anything." Having been married in May, that is.

And she said, "Nick and I had a fairytale courtship. Then, after the marriage, we weren't on our good behavior any more, and we found out that we didn't even like each other very well. . . . Two weeks after the wedding I knew I had made a mistake—but it was a beautiful wedding, wasn't it?" Yup, just like in the movies.

And she said of Stanley Donen, "We're good pals. We're together constantly, and we're good for each other. But it isn't love." Why, then, did the columnists find it necessary to rebuke them in print for the amount of necking they did in public?

And she uttered one truism that will live forever. She said, "I've been able to wear a plunging neckline since I was fourteen years old, and ever since then people have expected me to act as old as I look. My trouble all started because I have a woman's body and a child's emotions." In the case of Liz Taylor that remark was either astute or instinctive self-analysis, but it could also be made, incidentally, about actresses considerably older.

Liz had fallen into the trap laid for unwary, unhappy celebrities. Trusting as a puppy, she gave interviews far and wide, and every time she opened her mouth, something wrong came out in print. When she decided—or was advised—to stop talking, she got hurt another way, because any star who refuses to discuss personal problems is automatically tagged "temperamental."

Granted, her marriage to Nick Hilton was a bad mistake. Liz has always acknowledged more than her share of blame for the failure. "I thought I was mature enough to cope with marriage, and I wasn't. I had always had my own way. Instead of pointing out my faults, people always told me how good I was. I never learned responsibility." And after the breakup, she erred further in expressing herself too freely. But Liz had never been through the Hollywood marriage mill before—how was she to know?

Through the mistakes she learned about responsibility—and humiliation and heartache. In her brief marriage she learned that she couldn't be emotionally dependent on Nicky, because he was equally immature. Then she went home to her family and was startled to discover that the role of baby daughter no longer fitted. She could no longer give her life blindly into the hands of her parents. No more a child, no more a wife, she had to go forward. Liz went out and rented an apartment of her own—for precisely the reasons she gave: she had to learn independence. "That incredible child" was growing up in self-defense.

Shortly after her final meeting with Nicky in New York, Liz was shipped off to England again to portray Rebecca in Ivanhoe. Indicative of her emotional growth, this time she was accompanied by her secretary instead of her mother. It caused no stress within the family, rumors to the contrary. The Taylors understood and accepted that their daughter must stand or fall alone.

She fell—like a plummet—at the feet of a sweet, shy, sensitive fellow named Michael Wilding. This, curiously, was their second encounter. Mrs. Taylor, in writing of the five-month sojourn in London when Liz was seventeen, spoke of their meeting and added, "I knew that except for Glenn, the man in Elizabeth's life would be Michael Wilding." This time there were no "excepts" or "ifs." Liz was ready to know adult emotion.

Way back when she was seventeen, Mike had said lightly, "Some day you should marry me, you know," and now he said, "You see? I told you, you should have waited for me!"

When word of their love leaked out, it was received with almost universal skepticism. They were totally different from each other. Mike was twice Elizabeth's age. He was a man already settled while she still had a dainty fistful of wild oats to sow. This was going to be murder. Too bad—and he was such a nice guy, too.

A few people believed in them. One was Michael Wilding, who said, "She wants to be married to someone who will love and protect her, and that someone—by some heaven-sent luck—turns out to be me. I won't let her down."

His best friends, the Stewart Grangers, believed and gave them courage. After all, Jean Simmons' beloved Jimmy is sixteen years older than she, and Hollywood cynicism has used a battering-ram on their marriage with absolutely no effect.

THE RIVALS

When Julius La Rosa appeared at Loew's State in New York a group of girls gathered outside under his dressingroom window and to the tune of "ta-ra-ra-boom - de - ay," chanted, "We're Eddie Fisher fans, we're Eddie Fisher fans!" Grinning, Julius yelled back, "So am I!" and dragging his portable record player to the window sill, he put on one of Eddie's records and played it—but loud! The girls listened a moment and then roared back to the same tune, "Now we're La Rosa fans, and Eddie Fisher fans!"

Betty Vogel
Brooklyn, New York

Elizabeth Taylor believed—in all but her own good fortune. Michael loved her. She told reporters, "I want to be married as quickly as possible, because happiness is a fragile thing, and we have so little time for it." She had yet to be convinced that happiness isn't a sometimes thing, but she had found the man who could give her whatever there was of it.

Liz and Mike Wilding have now been married almost three years. Careerwise, if Mike's child-wife soars any higher, she's going to be lost in a cloud. His own reputation as an actor's actor grows more solid every day. They have the baby boy of their dreams, and the world's warmest welcome is extended to any brothers and sisters who might join young Michael Howard in the house. And they have each other, Liz and Mike. Seeing them together, it's plain that they still have each other so utterly and completely that if there is trouble, it will have to come from something outside this marriage.

We hope there is nothing—ever. We hope that Liz Taylor's times of trouble are all behind her. END in his hand

Wrap the big hand around the little hand . . . for now begins a little heart's journey into prayer . . . the guide is Dad, the goal is a security not even he can provide.

But the pattern is security, and it is Dad's privilege to supply his part of it for the little hearts in his care.

In this binding, enclosing love life finds its finest answer.

The security of our homes is our worthiest goal. And providing it is a privilege unique in a country like ours, where each of us is free to choose his way.

And, think: The security that begins in your home, joined to that of other homes, builds the strength of America.

Saving for security is easy! Read every word—now!

If you've tried to save and failed, chances are it was because you didn't have a plan. Well, here's a savings system that really works—the Payroll Savings Plan for investing in U.S. Savings Bonds. This is all you do. Go to your company's pay office, choose the amount you want to save—a couple of dollars a payday, or as much as you wish. That money will be set aside for you before you even draw your pay. And automatically invested in Series "E" U.S. Savings Bonds which are turned over to you.

If you can save only $3.75 a week on the Plan, in 9 years and 8 months you will have $2,137.30.

United States Series "E" Savings Bonds earn interest at an average of 3% per year, compounded semiannually, when held to maturity! And they can go on earning interest for as long as 19 years and 8 months if you wish, giving you a return of 80% on your original investment!

Eight million working men and women are building their security with the Payroll Savings Plan. For your sake, and your family's, too, how about signing up today? If you are self-employed, ask your banker about the Bond-A-Month Plan.

Tampax takes pride in its vast number of real friends

We doubt that any product of interest to women gets more enthusiastic word-of-mouth recommendation than Tampax! It's not just a matter of I "like it" . . . or "Yes, I use it." Tampax users almost seem to feel it's their duty to tell other women about it.

Perhaps the reason is that Tampax sanitary protection is such a vast improvement over other methods of solving what is admittedly a "problem." Instead of a bulky, chafing external pad, you have a small disposable applicator holding super absorbent cotton. Tampax is so comfortable it can't even be felt once it's in place. There are no edge-lines to "show" . . . disposal, chafing and odor problems vanish. And Tampax is inconspicuous to carry, for a month's supply goes into the purse.

The chances are that some friend has already told you about Tampax. Believe her! Trust her! Every word she says about its advantages is true! Get Tampax at drug or notion counters in choice of 3 absorbencies: Regular, Super, Junior. You're bound to like Tampax as much as all its other friends do. Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Mass.

THE INSIDE STORY

Want the real truth? Write to INSIDE STORY, Modern Screen, 8701 W. Third St., Los Angeles 48, Cal. The most interesting letters will appear in this column. Sorry, no personal replies.

Q. I understand there's an actress in Hollywood named Mary Trouble-In-Front. For whom does she work?
—V.E., NEW ORLEANS, LA.

A. Mary Trouble-In-Front is the name of a Sioux Indian girl hired by Universal-International in South Dakota for a bit part in Chief Crazy Horse.

Q. How many times has Donna Reed been married, also Marge Champion?
—N.N., BATH, N. Y.

A. Both twice.

Q. I've been told on good authority that Victor Mature is afraid of horses and that doubles are used for his riding scenes. Is this true?
—E.K., DETROIT, MICH.

A. Mature does not feel at home on a horse.

Q. Was Cleo Moore ever married to Huey Long? —J.J., MONROE, LA.

A. She was married to his son when she was fifteen.

Q. Would you please settle a bet? Who has more hair: Fred MacMurray or Gene Kelly? —L.H., BORDENTOWN, N.Y.

A. MacMurray.

Q. How much money did Cary Grant get for making Catch A Thief?
—J.H., RICHMOND, VA.

A. Ten per cent of the picture's gross.

Q. Does John Wayne wear a toupee or a hairpiece in pictures?
—G.K., SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH

A. Sometimes.

Q. What is the name of Mario Lanza's new son and how many children does he now have?
—Y.R., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

A. Lanza's new son is named Marc. There are now two girls and two boys in the family.

OF POOLS AND PONIES

■ Hollywood editors and reporters are lucky people. They have Alan Ladd's private telephone number. On the still warm October days in California they can give the star a ring and announce, "I'm coming over for a swim." They don't even have to bring their own towels. Such generous hospitality is rare in Hollywood, not because of the towels, but because most big stars pretend to be horror-stricken at the idea of an advancing photographer or newshound.

The latest poolside report on the Ladds is that they are ready to swing into action with their newly formed Jaguar Productions (named for a car Alan liked) as soon as they decide which is the best of three scripts.

Meanwhile, Alan is going into The McConnell Story on his Warner contract, with June Allyson as his leading lady. While resting, the whole family is shuttling back and forth between their town home and the ranch where Alana is having a ball riding her horse, Key, a Spanish stallion which she rented to her dad to ride in Drumbeat. The horse is one of eleven Spanish horses, all of which were named after Alan Ladd pictures. One is called Dahlia for The Blue Dahlia, another Beret, a third, pardon the expression, Hell for To Hell and Back. It tickles Alan to report that the horse named Shane was sold for about five times what it was really worth before it got that name, and he says he's been getting fan letters from new mothers who are calling their new sons Shane. "It's all right, I suppose," he says, "but I hope the fad doesn't grow. Imagine a lot of little tikes running around answering to the name Drumbeat!"

It doesn't bear thinking on.

louella parsons' GOOD NEWS

"I FEEL FREE AND HAPPY for the first time in two years," Susan Hayward told me. I had thought Susie would be down in the dumps over Jess Barker's decision to fight Judge Walker's ruling that he is not entitled to any community property in their divorce and that Susan gets custody of the children with only rights of visitation for Jess.

But I didn't know my girl. She telephoned me and said, "I've been through so many months of horror I'm completely accepting the judge's decision as final.

"At no time did I want to drag our dirty linen through the courts. I even offered Jess a settlement because of the children. This he turned down, preferring to make a bad fight of it."

I had heard that Susan wanted to give Jess $100,000 to get her freedom and he turned it down! If this is true he must feel like jumping out the closest window, now that he gets nothing!

The irony of it is that at the time of their marriage it was Jess who insisted that Susan make a pre-nuptial arrangement that the California Community Property Law be waived and that she would get nothing from him, should they separate!

He was earning much more at that time than Susan was.

What few people know is that they separated in a matter of months after their marriage. She came to see me at that time. It never has been my policy to advise my friends about their marriage troubles. That's a personal thing. But I couldn't refrain from saying to the weeping Susan, "Oh, Susie! If he hit you and walked out on you once there's nothing to keep him from doing it again."

Susan, today, says: "You were right, Louella. But if I had taken your advice I might not have my wonderful twin boys."

WHEN THE BELLES GET THEIR HEADS TOGETHER at parties and talk "girl talk," they say Gene Kelly is the actor who puts the least ardor into love scenes.

Gene heard about his "rep" and cracked: "I don't mind roughing them up if they like it. I just worry about their make-up."

Jack Palance admits that he blew his top and was way out of line when he shouted and raved at two extra girls playing (Continued on page 12)

PARTY OF THE MONTH was tossed by Cyd Charisse to celebrate Tony Martin's Hollywood Bowl debut.

GLORIA GRAHAME and Cy Howard were married at Cy's home. Gloria wore black, carried sweetpeas.

hollywood snapshots

It was a big month for romance—with all the fellows taking their best girls out on the town.

THE NEW GUY Madison is quite a man-about-town now. A favorite date is Sheila Connolly.

OLD FLAME burns for Zsa Zsa and Rubirosa, but whether they'll marry is unsettled.

BING CROSBY and Phil Harris caught salmon. Bing wrote, "Fishing with Harris is a lot of laughs. He talks to the fish, even sings to them."

ROY ROGERS and Dale gave awards to high school kids who won accident prevention contest, talked to some who had been accident victims.

JUDY GARLAND is in Monte Carlo with Sid and Jack Warner. I hope pictures like this stop the silly talk of a feud between Judy and Jack.

GENE KELLY and his lovely wife are almost strangers, they've been overseas so much for Gene's films. Betsy still hopes to do some acting.

HEAVY RUMORS of Grace Kelly and Oleg Cassini marrying, but Grace's friends disapprove.

LIGHT TALK for Pier Angeli and James Dean. He's a Brando type—no car, many T-shirts.

BRIGHT PAIR are cute Rita Moreno and Geordie Hormel, Leslie Caron's almost ex-husband.

Like father, like son

The resemblance between Jerry Lewis and his 9-year-old Gary just amazes me—especially when they're doing their "mugging duet." (These special photographs are the cutest I've ever seen!) They learned that mournful look from a cocker spaniel!

The company was shocked by his language and Jack is sincerely sorry it ever happened.

He called me to say, "The reason for my outburst is that I was working with a terrible case of poisoning from a snake bite on location. My doctor advised me to stay at home for several days under medical treatment.

"I didn't want to do this because there were about 1000 extras working in the scenes we were shooting and I didn't want to put the director and producers to the expense of keeping these people idle because of my illness.

"All I can say is that my nerves snapped when the girls kept chattering between scenes when I was trying desperately hard to memorize my lines under my terrific physical strain."

Okay, Jack. What more can you say than that you are sorry, and I'm sure you told the girls as well as me.

ALTHOUGH BARBARA RUSH and Rock Hudson sent me a beautiful scarf from Ireland when I was in London, I didn't get to see them emote in Captain Lightfoot for the very good reason that I didn't get to Ireland and they couldn't get to London.

So I was surprised my first day back at my desk in Hollywood to get a phone call from Barbara who returned home the day after I did.

She was both happy and upset—happy to be home and upset over rumors which had been flying that she and Jeff Hunter were on the verge of parting.

"The only parting we've had is that my work took me to Ireland and Jeff's picture took him to Mexico City.

"Really, there's not a bit of truth in the reports of a rift," she told me, and I believe the gal. In fact, she was so eager to see Jeff she was flying to Mexico to catch up with her traveling bridegroom.

Speaking of Rock, he stayed on in Europe for a holiday on the continent, not a honeymoon with Betty Abbott, as had been freely touted.

Betty was the script girl on Captain Lightfoot as well as being Rock's best girl, so she had to return with the company to Hollywood to work on the cutting of the film and so on.

Sooner or later I believe Rock and Betty will get around to getting married. He dates others now and then, but she seems to be the real heart interest in his life.

THE PARTY OF THE MONTH was the lovely affair hosted by Cyd Charisse for her ever lovin' husband, Tony Martin, following his debut at the Hollywood Bowl.

Cyd took over the new room at Ciro's and turned it into a garden of flowers. At first some of the candid camera boys got miffed because Cyd wouldn't let them in to take pictures. But when Tony, who is a very easygoing guy, showed up, he had a little chat with Cyd and said, "Come on in, boys."

Esther Williams surprised everyone by dancing all evening in her bare feet. Someone asked her, "Do your shoes hurt?"

Esther said, "Nope, I just like to dance this way," and that was that.

Late arrivals were surprised to see Nancy Sinatra, ex of Frankie, apparently teamed up with Harry Karl, estranged husband of Marie McDonald. But Nancy laughingly explained that Harry wasn't her date. He was just her supper partner and later drove her to her car which she had left in front of Barbara Stanwyck's house.

Speaking of Barbara, she decided to have some fun and showed up in the red wig which she wears in her new movie. Everyone thought it was striking but preferred her own natural silvery locks.

Gary Cooper and Rocky looked thoroughly made-up. They danced mostly with one another and he was quite devoted to her.

Judy Garland and Sid Luft were excited about leaving the following day for Europe, all expenses paid by the boss, Jack Warner. Judy looked cute in a black and white chiffon.

No one admires Audrey Hepburn more than I. She is a superb actress.

But I've got some news for her firsthand: She has hurt a lot of friends and estranged many of the press by making—then breaking—interview appointments in New York and by later refusing to talk with even the people who have helped her build her career when she arrived in London.

I was in London at the time and some of her closest friends told me they were unable to reach her even by phone.

She left immediately for Switzerland where she again went into hiding.

There are many reports that Audrey's health is bad. It is also pretty generally believed that she is emotionally upset over Mel Ferrer, the big romance in her life.

Although Mel is divorced, he is devoted to his children and is in constant communication with Mrs. Ferrer.

Audrey, apparently, is so deeply in love with the actor, without whom she made no appearances in New York, that she is unduly jealous and unhappy about him.

SPEAKING OF AUDREY, I bet she never expected to be compared to cute, peppery Debbie Reynolds. But one of the London critics wrote:

"Debbie Reynolds in Susan Slept Here is the logical successor to Audrey Hepburn." Pretty nice compliment to Debbie, I calls it.

I GUESS I'M THE LEAST SURPRISED person in the world that Vic Mature and his wife, Dorothy, got in such a battle at Del Mar that they went flying to their lawyers to talk divorce.

Like the Matures, I used to spend my own vacations at the little racetrack by the sea, and each season Vic and Dorothy staged some sort of a head-on collision.

This one was more spectacular than usual.

They had been sitting in the cocktail lounge of the hotel before going in to dine, apparently very friendly.

I was really miffed about JANE POWELL

■ I really don't know what got into Jane Powell to deny so vehemently that she had any idea of marrying Pat Nerney—and then, a bare ten days later, to announce to the world that she had received her engagement ring and that the marriage would take place soon!

As I told you in this department last month, I didn't believe Jane's denials even when she herself was making them to me.

Who in the world did she think she was fooling? She and Pat have been inseparable ever since they fell in love and all the stuff about their "never even discussing marriage" was a lot of nonsense and I knew it. And printed it!

A reporter friend of mine wasn't so lucky. This writer spent two hours with Jane at her home interviewing her about her romance with young Nerney. Now get this:

Not only did Jane say she wasn't marrying Pat, she indicated that she was still in love with another man in her life!

My friend wrote her story as Miss Powell gave it to her and it was in publication, too late to stop, when the blonde actress sprang her plans to marry Nerney just a few days later.

All we reporters ask is a little fairness and honesty now and then. Is this asking too much?

I nominate for stardom: MARTHA HYER

■ She has the same look of quality Grace Kelly has and an even more exciting figure. In Sabrina Martha loses Bill Holden (temporarily) to Audrey Hepburn but she's so lovely to look at it's understandable that she gets him back.

She's twenty-five years old, weighs 116 pounds, is five feet, six inches tall and is currently redheaded. Her hair has been bleached, dyed and tinted different colors so often she has almost forgotten she's a natural brownette.

Every time she's cast in a new picture she has to switch her hair color to contrast with that of the woman star.

She says she will know she has reached official stardom when another girl has to dye to contrast with her.

She was born in Dallas, Texas, where her father is an assistant district attorney. She's one Texan who doesn't hesitate to admit she prefers living in California.

For two and a half years she was married to Ray Stahl, the writer-director son of the late John Stahl. At that time she rated (careerwise) only leads in westerns.

It's probably just a coincidence that her career took a sharp upturn just about the time she divorced Stahl. She had excellent roles in So Big, Sabrina and Lucky Me.

Unlike many babes in the Hollywoods, Martha has had solid training in her profession at both Northwestern University and the Pasadena Community Playhouse.

An important man at Paramount tells me, "Watch Martha Hyer. She can and may be another Grace Kelly."

(Continued from page 13) went to a phone booth. Suddenly, in a towering rage, Vic went to the booth, jerked the door open, stepped inside and other cocktail loungers were treated to a full view of the battle through the glass door although not a sound came through!

Sooooo, they say they are headed for divorce although you can pick up some easy bets that before this latest vacation brawl reaches the judge, these two ardent battlers will make it up as they have done three times in the past.

SHORT SHOTS: Two new children are living at Lana Turner's house these days. Don't get excited, they are the son and daughter of Lex Barker who have come to live with Lana and Lex while their mother is in Mexico City for a year. Lana is a good mother, wonderful with the kids, and they adore her.

Can't make up my mind whether I like Arlene Dahl's new short and straight hair cut or not. But with that face she can do almost anything.

The reason Ava didn't divorce Frankie when her six weeks were up in Nevada is because not only does she want him to pay all court costs but also defray all expenses on the big house which she occupied with her family at Lake Tahoe. And he ain't about to do it, he ain't.

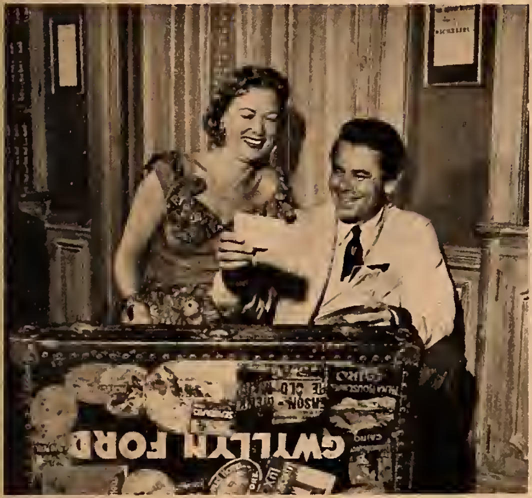
Ethel Barrymore is crazy about Frank Sinatra, whether Ava is or not. The Grand Lady of the theatre took to Frankie and vice versa like chocolate syrup to ice cream. Ethel couldn't get over Frankie's blowing her to a champagne and cake birthday party on the set of Young At Heart. "Frank is," drawls the one and only Ethel in that magnificent voice of hers, "a livin' doll."

Speaking of dolls, no one in years has given such expensive gifts to the crew and cast following a picture as those Johnny Ray handed out after There's No Business Like Show Business—gold watches and cuff links, traveling bags, cases of champagne, expensive briefcases, and to the assistant prop boy, a new TV set!

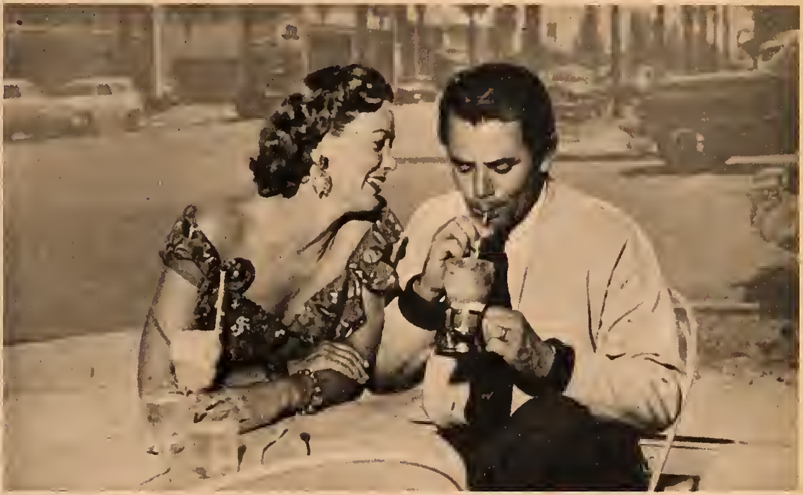
THAT'S ALL FOR NOW. SEE YOU NEXT MONTH!

Joan Crawford got award as Fur Fashion Woman of 1954 from top furrier Al Tietelbaum.

My favorite love story of the month: The Glenn Fords relive their romance.



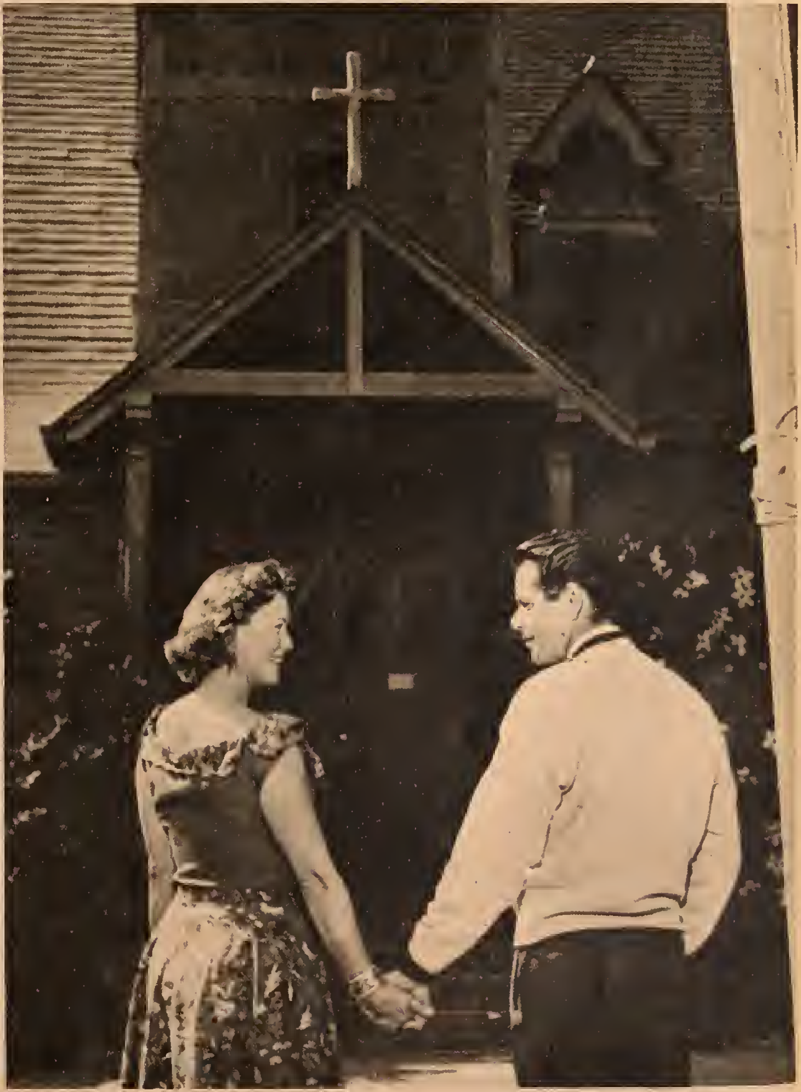
It all started on their 11th wedding anniversary when Glenn and Ellie discovered a trunk full of their old letters, written during Glenn's Marine Corps days.



Next, the scene of Glenn's proposal—a sidewalk ice cream cafe. (Glenn had wanted an un-Hollywood atmosphere.) "I can't recall what I said when I asked her," he confessed. "But I know that I ordered a chocolate soda—and I hate chocolate!"

Glenn dragged out his uniform, swore he could get into it, but didn't. He was a sergeant when he married Ellie—who had her pick of Hollywood's most eligible stars.

First on their memory lane was the house they were married in. Pat O'Brien had introduced them, told Ellie, "I know a guy you'd get along with real good."



Glenn gave Ellie a tiny diamond ring—all he could afford on his Marine Corps pay. Ellie, then at the top of her career as a movie star, insisted that he take her to St. Augustine's Episcopal Church (where Glenn had been a teacher) to put it on.

the letter box

(First, a word of explanation to those of you who complain that I fail to use your letters in this department: I try to use comments of general interest to all fans and if you'll just bear this in mind, I'm sure you'll see print. Thank you.) Now let's hear from:

JUDY TIKWORTH, Bradenton, Florida, who resents a letter from Pat Kennedy (not Mrs. Peter Lawford) criticizing Robert Wagner's upstage conduct while on location. "I, too, had the opportunity to watch Mr. Wagner making scenes and I found him gracious to the fans and a delightful young man to meet, very modest and a gentleman."

"In my opinion," pens BETTY CAMPBELL of Dorchester, Mass., "John Agar is the best-looking man in Hollywood and one of the finest actors. I am glad Universal-International is giving him the break he has so long deserved." Evidently John is very popular in Massachusetts. CAROL SHEIL, of Boston, also writes glowingly of him in Bait.

RUTH VILEISIS, Naugatuck, Conn., spent part of her vacation in Jackson Hole, Wyoming, and writes: "As I came out of a small cafe I saw a crowd gathered around a big car—and there were June Haver and Fred MacMurray. They were all smiles, giving autographs right and left and thanking the people for asking for them! How do you like those dolls?" Pretty nice, I agree.

MARGARET CANELLIS would like to make three comments: "One, Three Coins In The Fountain is the year's most delightful picture. Two, Robert Stack is the year's most improved actor in The High And The Mighty. Three, I had Fernando Lamas all wrong. He's my favorite again since he married Arlene Dahl."

Wow! Did I start something when I challenged Robert Mitchum to prove himself in Not As A Stranger. Lots of letters, mostly agreeing with me. But not BETTE COLLIER, Coal City, Ill., who blasts:

"I bet you won't be able to dig yourself out of the mail you'll receive from Robert Mitchum's many fans protesting your comments. He is perfect for Mort Thompson's novel about the young doctor." Don't say I didn't give you your say, Bette.

After their honeymoon Glenn shipped out for a year. (That's when they wrote those letters!) When he came home they lived over a garage, thought the beach the world's most romantic place.

They ended their reminiscences with a trip to The Beachcombers, their favorite restaurant, then drove down the Old Ox Road near Malibu, where they had first told their dreams to each other.

Brigadoon isn't on their map, but Gene Kelly and Van Johnson wander into it on the dream town's one day of existence in the 20th Century.

Gene and Brigadoon's prettiest girl, Cyd Charisse, fall in love, dance together, sing "The Heather On The Hill." Gene did choreography.

After taking part in the festivities for a wedding, Gene and Van return to New York—but not permanently. Other songs in this adaptation of the Broadway musical are "Almost Like Being In Love," "Come To Me, Bend To Me," "Waitin' For My Dearie," "I'll Go Home With Bonnie Jean."

Picture of the Month: BRIGADOON

■ For those who fancy fantasy here's Brigadoon rising in the Scottish Highlands like a misty dream. And that's what Brigadoon is, a dream town whose perfection is preserved because it comes into existence only one day in every hundred years. The day that Americans Gene Kelly and Van Johnson stumble on it while grouse hunting. A wedding is in progress and gaiety prevails—until the jilted suitor (Hugh Laing) declares he's leaving Brigadoon. If he does, the village will disappear forever. Van Johnson saves the day. Giving Gene Kelly time to fall for Fiona (Cyd Charisse) and sing that popular ballad, "Almost Like Being In Love." Trouble is, Kelly has a fiancée in New York. Not that he really cares. She (Elaine Stewart) is a social climber. But if Kelly stays in Brigadoon he'll be lost to our civilization, swallowed up, as it were, in a dream. Johnson persuades him to come home. However, it isn't easy to forget Fiona. Kelly broods about her and finally goes back to Scotland. "I know Brigadoon isn't there," he says, "but I've got to see where it was." You know what they say about true love. They say when you love someone anything is possible, especially miracles. It's a warm, romantic musical with excellent dancing and the Technicolor is beautiful. A smash hit as a Broadway musical, it should be just as much of a success as a movie. Cast includes Barry Jones, Virginia Bosler, Jimmy Thompson.—MGM

In these 3-hour danger periods your skin "dies" a little

Every day for periods of 1 to 3 hours, your skin is "open" to trouble, dermatologists say. This is immediately after you wash your face. In washing away dirt, you also remove natural skin protectors. Your skin takes 1 to 3 hours to re-establish its defenses. Meanwhile, real trouble can "breed":

Dryness . . . "shriveling"
Stretched pores . . . roughened, grainy texture

Read what skin specialists recommend to prevent these serious skin problems . . .

After each washing— "re-balance" your skin

Some signs of skin "un-balance" show up right after washing:

The "drawn" feel of your face.
Flakiness; often a splotchy look.

These are the first warnings of skin "un-balance." But in the 1 to 3 hours Nature takes to re-protect skin, more disturbing problems can take root. Dry lines deepen. Inside moisture evaporates away. Outer skin "shrivels." Skin secretions harden in pore-openings—cause enlarged pores, blackheads.

Should you avoid washing your face? "Of course not," say leading skin specialists. "But after each washing, 're-balance' your skin instantly . . . "

60 times faster than Nature

A quick Pond's Cold Creaming right after washing "re-balances" your skin in one minute—at least 60 times faster than Nature does. It combats dryness, shriveling. Keeps pore-openings cleared—keeps skin texture fine and smooth.

Always leave on a bit of Pond's Cold Cream for continuing skin "balance" under make-up.

A deep clearing at bedtime

Besides a 7-second "re-balancing" after each washing, most skins need a thorough clearing at night. A deep Pond's Cold Creaming dislodges water-resistant dirt from the pores. Keeps skin looking clear, vibrant!

Start this complete beauty care with Pond's Cold Cream today. Soon your friends will be saying—"Your skin looks marvelous lately!"

Among society beauties who use Pond's

MRS. FRANCIS IRÉNÉE DU PONT II
THE DUCHESS OF LEEDS
LA COMTESSE JEAN DE CARAMAN
MRS. GEORGE WHITNEY, JR.
LA COMTESSE DE LA FALAISE

More women use this one cream than any face cream ever made. Get a large jar today. Begin giving your skin quick daytime "re-balancings" . . . deep clearings each night with Pond's Cold Cream. It's the world's most famous beauty formula—never duplicated, never equalled.

Mrs. Amory S. Carhart, Jr

Young Mrs. Carhart, of New York and Southampton, shows her love of simplicity and perfection not only in her choice of dress—but also in her complexion care. "I find that the simplest skin care is also the most effective," she says. "It's a quick smoothing with Pond's Cold Cream the moment after I wash my face. And I always give my skin a deep clearing with Pond's Cold Cream every night at bedtime."

Now—a pressed powder for dry skin!

New "Puff Magic" is rich in lanolin!

New make-up clings longer, softens skin—comes in 5 flattering new shades

My dear friends,

Some of my friends with dry skin have problems with pressed powders—they don't cling long enough, and the shades are too pale. These women need a lanolin makeup, like my new Puff Magic. This pressed powder with lanolin foundation comes in five radiantly flattering shades:

Natural Magic—a stardust finish for your skin.
Honey Fair—for that "lit-from-within" look.
Honey Brunette—flattering as candlelight.
Bridal Pink—soft and natural as a blush.
Tan Magic—rich as Riviera sunshine.

If you have dry skin, try exciting new Puff Magic. It will help your skin look younger and lovelier always.

THE DETECTIVE A comedy that's gentle, soft spoken, unexpected, can be lots of fun. This one is. It stars Alec Guinness as a priest with the refreshing point of view that anyone can commit crime but most people don't because, fortunately, they don't want to. His self-appointed mission is to convert criminals into good citizens. He'd rather save their souls than send them to prison. This doesn't sit well with Scotland Yard but it sits rather jauntily on Guinness who for his work has acquainted himself with jujitsu and various thugs. Now he becomes involved with a master thief, Flambeau (Peter Finch), who makes off with a treasured cross that Guinness is taking to Rome. Guinness resolves to find Flambeau, lead him into the fold. Flambeau is a tough customer, but Guinness exhibits saintly patience and persistence along with quite human frailties that delightfully pay off. With Joan Greenwood, Cecil Parker.—Col.

SHIELD FOR MURDER Any killer is dangerous but when a cop turns homicidal in the name of the law that's worse. Detective Nolan (Edmund O'Brien) has a reputation for being trigger happy. Now he shoots a bookmaker in the back, lifts the 25,000 dollars he was carrying and claims to Detective John Agar that the shooting was accidental. But Nolan was observed by a deaf mute and even if he hadn't been, his actions are suspicious. He overplays his hand by taking his girl friend Marla English to see an expensive model home and telling her he'll buy it. The story builds to a high pitch as Nolan's sanity gives way and he fights desperately with himself, with a gang boss to whom the bookie was delivering the 25,000 and with his friend Agar. Nolan is a hot-headed and somewhat simple minded guy, but Edmund O'Brien gives depth to his characterization that raises it above the usual chase theme.—U.A.

DAWN AT SOCORRO Too bad there weren't any psychoanalysts in New Mexico in the 19th century. Would have saved a lot of gunpowder. Take Rory Calhoun, a gambler with an odd sense of honor. It surely made him sad to kill people but he had such good aim. And it made him sad to see a flower like Piper Laurie plant herself in David Brian's gambling casino at Socorro. (Piper's father had disowned her because he thought she was wicked which, of course, she wasn't.) Right from the start Calhoun doesn't want to do anything but retire to Colorado Springs because he has a racking cough due to a bullet lodged in his lung. But he has to shoot down about six men before he can get to the railway ticket office and gamble away his life's savings and rescue Piper from herself—and from David Brian. That's a large order for a man with a cough that shakes his ankles. Technicolor—U-I.

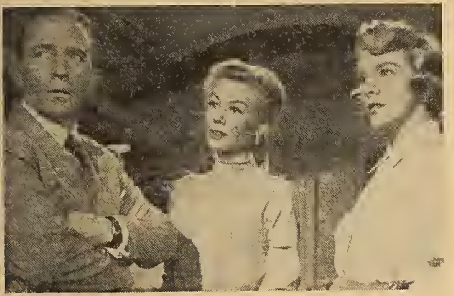
THE LAW VS. BILLY THE KID The law wasn't good enough for Billy The Kid (Scott Brady). He didn't even trust the governor, a nice old guy, who promised him freedom if only he'd stop drawing blood. Billy wanted freedom and he wanted Betta St. John for a bride, but most of all he wanted revenge against a crooked sheriff and his men who planned to take over all the ranches in the territory. Billy had found a little peace on this particular ranch owned by Paul Cavanaugh. He might have gone straight, too, under his influence if Cavanaugh hadn't been shot down in cold blood by said sheriff and men. There are some kids whose destinies are marked by violence and tragedy, and I suppose Billy was one of those kids. Although it gets kind of boring to hear them tell it. Even in Technicolor. With Alan Hale, Jr., James Griffith.—Col.

AFRICA ADVENTURE If you want to go to Africa, go alone. After seeing what it's really like I'm not budging. Robert C. Ruark, the newspaper columnist who made this documentary, has omitted all the fraud. "So much nonsense about African safaris" has been pawned off on the public, he says. I like the nonsense; it made everything so romantic. Now we see the heat, the drought, the nomads digging for water, the vultures fighting over a carcass, the bull rhino showing his temper. "And if the camera shakes," says Ruark, "it's because the cameraman was frightened." Well, the camera doesn't shake too often. A rather absorbing record of an African safari that starts in Nairobi, Kenya, heads for the northern frontier, moves along the Abyssinian border. You'll see some fascinating shots of native tribes and of Ruark's party turning Africa into a bit of home. Pathecolor—RKO

NAKED ALIBI With all this emphasis on brutality in movies it's no wonder some teen-agers take it for granted. Sure the murderer pays, but first he has a ball. Slaps cops around, drives toward Mexico to live it up with a blonde night club singer (Gloria Grahame) and almost gets away with three slayings. Only thing that stops him is Detective Chief Sterling Hayden, who is fired because newspapers think he's sadistic. Hayden spots Willis (Gene Barry) for a killer the minute he's hauled in on a drunk charge. Next day detective Casey Adams, who questioned him, is murdered. But Willis leads a respectable life, has a wife (Marcia Henderson) a child and a bakery, so what if he acts insane? Nobody can prove it. Hayden proves it on his own time, trails him to Border City, kidnaps him, brings him home kicking. It's exciting, it's suspenseful—and Hayden gets his job back, which apparently puts this film on a high moral plane.—U.-I.



Jackpot of the Month: WHITE CHRISTMAS

If the title White Christmas is familiar, it should be. It's the song Irving Berlin wrote and Bing Crosby introduced twelve years ago in the musical Holiday Inn. Aside from that there's nothing old about this film. Its score includes fourteen fresh-off-the-piano hits by Berlin. It's the story of a retired Major General (Dean Jagger) who has no place to go when the Army has finished with him. So he opens an inn in Vermont. But even a general can't order snow or requisition customers. That's where Bing Crosby and Danny Kaye come through. They met in the Army, teamed up afterward and hit it big on Broadway. The boys found out about the inn when they went to Vermont to visit a sister act (Rosemary Clooney and Vera-Ellen). Now they want to do Jagger a good turn, promote a little business for him. Naturally, the sisters misunderstand Crosby's and Kaye's intentions; they think they want to promote themselves. Naturally, the sisters are in love with Crosby and Kaye. There are all kinds of romantic, sentimental complications that resolve themselves in snow flakes and good will on Christmas Eve. Meanwhile there's dancing on costly Technicolor sets, and singing and a kind of glow which these four stars can project like nobody's business. Besides all this, White Christmas is the first picture ever filmed in VistaVision, a really exciting development that gives you an even larger picture than the other new techniques. It's unusual, too, in that VistaVision can be adapted to any size screen —even for drive-in movies—and still give you a clear, sharp picture.—Para.

THREE HOURS TO KILL When Dana Andrews comes back to town everybody reaches for a gun. Dana is not liked. Dana makes everyone in Furnace Flats feel guilty because three years ago they tried to lynch him for a murder. The corpse was Donna Reed's brother (Richard Webb) who opposed her marrying Andrews. Now the sheriff (Stephen Elliot) gives Dana three hours of freedom. Who was guilty—saloon owner James Westerfield, barber Whit Bissel, gambler Lawrence Hugo? Maybe it was Dick Coogan who married Donna and was supposedly her brother's best friend. Anyway, all of these boys were right up there with the noose and tree three years ago. It's quite a shock for Donna to see her lost fiance again. Hotel owner Dianne Foster is more thrilled than terrified. Anyway, a few hours is plenty of time for Andrews, who not only finds the murderer but also patches up his love life.—Technicolor. —Col.

Should the hostess be served—

☐ First ☐ Last ☐ In turn

If you lived in the days of the poison-dealing Borgias, you might want to de-jitter your guests! So—you'd be served first, to prove no cyanide lurked in the soup. But today, etiquette scowls on "me first" hostessing. Here, service should start with the femme in foreground (at right)—continuing clockwise; hostess to be served in turn. Being sure builds poise. That's why, on those days, you choose Kotex—assured no outlines show, thanks to special flat pressed ends!

To dress up a plaid suit, add a —

☐ Frilly blouse ☐ Faille purse ☐ Tam

All wrong—the answers above! It's a sad plaid that's teamed with ruffles, a silky purse; instead, add an elegantly simple blouse or sweater, good leather handbag. Smart tailored accessories are what's needed. And for certain needs, try the 3 sizes of Kotex—there's one just "tailor-made" for you. P.S.: No mistakes with Regular, Junior or Super, as Kotex can be worn on either side, safely!

SUDDENLY Here's an interesting, fast-paced little study of a man who tries to assassinate the President of the United States. Happens in a small town called Suddenly where nothing has happened in years. One day the place is flooded with FBI men. They're clearing the way for the President who'll get off his train at Suddenly on his way to a fishing trip. Frank Sinatra (the assassin) and his buddies arrive about the same time and take over a house above the station in which live Nancy Gates, a war widow, her young son (Kim Charney) and her father (James Gleason). Nancy is terrified of violence, terrified of life and for months has been turning down Sheriff Sterling Hayden's offer of marriage. The ordeal she goes through now teaches her plenty. And Sinatra, as the "nobody" who became a "somebody" when they handed him a gun in World War II, sheds a lot of light on what makes madmen kill.—U.A.

RECOMMENDED FILMS NOW PLAYING

BROKEN LANCE (20th-Fox): This dramatic story of early ranchers is not an ordinary Western. Fast-paced and well written, it deals with the struggle for power between rugged Spencer Tracy and his scheming son, Richard Widmark. Bob Wagner, Katy Jurado are on Spencer's side. There's romance with Jean Peters as well as plenty of action. CinemaScope and Technicolor.

REAR WINDOW (Para): The best Hitchcock thriller in some time, this one has Jimmy Stewart, Grace Kelly, Wendell Corey, Thelma Ritter and a quietly terrifying performance by Raymond Burr. Besides top-flight suspense, the dialogue sparkles, there's humor, romance and Technicolor.

THE BLACK SHIELD OF FALWORTH (U-I): If you like Tony Curtis in armor and Janet Leigh in danger, you'll love this one. Barbara Rush is in it, too—and enough jousting, intriguing and revenging to satisfy the most avid knighthood fan.

THE LITTLE KIDNAPPERS (U.A.): This one is destined to become a classic. One of the most charming, warmly humorous movies ever centered around children, this deals with two wonderful little boys, Jon Whiteley and Vincent Winter, who steal a baby because they think their grandfather, Duncan Macrae, doesn't love them enough.

BETRAYED (MGM): Clark Gable, Lana Turner and Victor Mature star in a story of spies and counter-spies (though no one knows which one is which) during World War II. Filmed in Holland in Eastman Color, it is suspenseful and exciting.

THE EGYPTIAN (20th-Fox): A really big film, this epic of love and excitement in ancient Egypt stars Edmund Purdom, Victor Mature, Jean Simmons, Michael Wilding, Gene Tierney, Bella Darvi and has Technicolor and CinemaScope as well.

SABRINA (Para): Wonderful Audrey Hepburn and her co-stars, Humphrey Bogart and William Holden, make this charming comedy about the chauffeur's daughter who falls in love with the rich man's son an absolute delight. Light, and lots of fun.

HOBSON'S CHOICE (U.A.): A really funny British comedy, this one stars Charles Laughton as a father so stingy he'd rather have his daughters stay single than give them a dowry. But daughters have minds of their own—and husbands, too, eventually.

SEVEN BRIDES FOR SEVEN BROTHERS (MGM): One of the best musicals to come along in ages, this one even has a plot in the shenanigans of seven uncouth, woman-hungry he-men who kidnap their brides. Jane Powell and Howard Keel, Technicolor, CinemaScope, good tunes and top-notch dances.

ON THE WATERFRONT (Col.): One of the year's best films, this tense and exciting story of longshoremen vs. corrupt union bosses stars Marlon Brando, Karl Malden, lovely Eva Marie Saint. Directed by Elia Kazan.

HOW DOTH THE LITTLE BUSY B?

by Barbara Stanwyck

Here's Barbara's secret for keeping young at heart.

■ Every woman should accept the necessity for thinking outside herself. An actress must do it; otherwise, how can she depict a variety of characters from the study she has made of others? A mother must think outside herself; otherwise, how can her children benefit from her observations and understanding? But women who are neither mothers nor actresses sometimes must train and discipline themselves especially hard to think of others—or drift into thinking that life revolves around them.

There is less danger, of course, of becoming self-absorbed if one is busy. Idleness is a destructive force. I sympathize with people who do not have enough to do. I, personally, get into a black mood when I'm not making a picture or preparing for one. I feel vital—alive—when I have so much to do I don't know how I am going to make hours in a day for it. And I'm sure all busy people feel the same way. An interest in others and in many things will make one more interesting to others and more interested in other things.

I try to give Stanwyck as little thought as possible. Keep her neat and clean and healthy—then forget the mirror. I find this a more satisfying existence—and a good way to keep really young.

WORDS AND MUSIC

Peggy Lee wanted fame and fun . . . and got them for a song!

■ Shoppers on Wilshire Boulevard in Los Angeles sometimes see a tall, leggy blonde making her way into a smart shop and, because she looks like one, they usually think she's a model. But the natives regard the young lady with knowing admiration. "There," they will point out for visitors, "goes the lady Irving Berlin!"

In Jamestown, North Dakota where she was born; this blonde was known as Norma Egstrom. To Hollywood, New York, nightclubbers and TV viewers, she is Peggy Lee.

In fewer years than it takes most people to get started on just one career, Peggy has enjoyed several. First she became a favorite as a singer of popular songs. Now she writes them.

When she started her motion picture career it was as a star, opposite Danny Thomas in The Jazz Singer. Now she is making two more, one of them The Benny Goodman Story. She was a featured vocalist with his band. She has not neglected nightclubs and her appearances in San Francisco and Reno have added to her fans.

Peggy has published more than seventy songs. "It's A Good Day" and "Mañana" sold over two million platters. She did the lyrics for the title song of Johnny Guitar, the theme song for About Mrs. Leslie and an entire score for Walt Disney's soon-to-be-released The Lady And The Tramp. She is the voice of five characters in the picture. She has just written and recorded for Decca a song with her guitarist titled "The Gypsy With The Fire In Her Shoe."

"I just drifted into composing," Peggy says. "It sort of comes naturally to me."

When she isn't really busy, she writes poetry—some of which is soon to be published.

I Saw BLACKHEADS GO IN 10 MINUTES!

By CLAIRE HOFFMAN

NEW YORK, N. Y.—A skin specialist today demonstrated a simple 10-minute way to rinse away blackheads. To the face of a woman who had suffered from blackheads, enlarged pores and a spotty complexion for nearly 12 years, I saw the doctor apply a peculiar, plastic-like cream. 10 minutes later . . . when he rinsed this cream from her skin with a moist facial tissue, I saw ugly blackheads rinsed away! They were clinging to the tissue that the doctor held out for all to see— actually rinsed away from the skin with a simple 10-minute home medical treatment anyone can use at home!

Actually Draws Pimple and Blackhead Material Out of Clogged Pore Openings — In Minutes!

"You will notice," continued the doctor's aide as he motioned us in closer, "that not all the blackheads are gone. That would be too much to expect from just one treatment. Especially since our subject, Miss ———, has suffered from these externally caused blemishes for a good many years. "But now, watch closely! Because you will notice that this first 10-minute treatment has not merely floated away a considerable number of blackheads, but it has also so loosened and softened the more stubborn pus formations, that I can now gently tissue even more of them away. Here is the tissue for your examination!"

As we all strained forward to see the results of this amazing medical demonstration, a large magnifying mirror was now placed before the woman's face, revealing the pore openings with startling clarity!

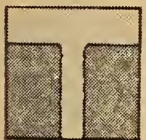
Why Many Women Confuse Enlarged Pores With Clogged Pores

"The next part of our demonstration concerns the pores. I will now place this woman's hand next to her face. Now, as you look through this magnifying mirror, you will notice that, unbelievable as it seems, the stretched pore openings on this woman's face already appear even smaller in size than those on her hand! And you will also notice that where we have applied the cream more heavily — especially around the nose — that the pore openings actually appear to have collapsed and tightened!

"Why? Because much of the dirt which we have drawn out of the skin and then rinsed away into this facial tissue — had been cemented into this woman's pore openings not only for days, not only for weeks, but for months! But when we remove this dirt, when we draw it out with this skin treatment, the pores have a natural tendency to collapse back to normal. The simple chart shows why."

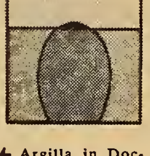
STEP-BY-STEP

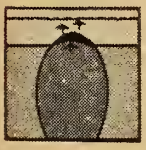
Here Is How Doctor's Skin Treatment Acts To Draw Out Blackheads And Clear Enlarged Pore Openings



Here is what a normal pore opening looks like. Note narrow, healtby shape.

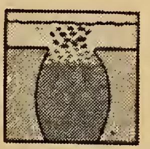
Enlarged pore opening due to clogging. Note blackhead cap which plugs pore.

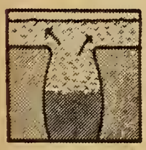




Argilla in Doctor's Cream-Mask now starts drawing, lifting action.

Blackhead Cap has already started to lift out and break up, unpluging pore opening.





Blackhead gone, hardened wastes in pore openings may now be drawn out by Arglila.

Wastes gone—enlarged pore opening due to clogging quickly tends to narrow back to normal again. Skin is clearer, smoother!

What Happens When You Apply This Doctor's 3-Way Formula!

First, to prepare your skin for treatment, we are going to soften and loosen the buried filth cemented into your pores. The laboratory-developed pore cleanser which is part one of this famous specialist's treatment, is unlike any other cleanser you have ever used in your life, regardless of how much you can afford to pay. And here is how you can prove it on your skin.

Apply the specially compounded pore cleanser. Tissue it off! Now look at the tissue!

When you see the dirt and filth pouring out on that tissue . . . when you see the infectious filth and indescribable wastes that may have been causing your skin eruptions since adolescence . . . then and only then will you begin to understand why you need a drastic change in complexion care.

2) The second part of your treatment is a medicated cream designed to get at those ugly blackheads, whiteheads and externally caused pimples which cause you so much misery.

Apply it to your face with your fingertips as you would any cream. A little thicker around the "danger areas" . . . mainly around the nose, lips, eyes and cheeks.

The first 3 or 4 minutes you will feel a strong stimulation. This is the massaging action of the medicated ingredients going to work on your skin. Your face will feel hot and cold. You will like it. Your face will feel refreshed. It is like a massage without irritation, bringing fresh, purifying blood to your face to draw off the poisonous wastes in your skin.

After 3 or 4 minutes this hot and cold action goes away, and a wonderful relaxation of all your tense, overworked facial muscles sets in. In another moment, you will feel your skin getting tighter and tighter. What is happening is this: A wonderful medicated absorbing agent called ARGILLA is drying on your skin. It is turning the cream on your face into a firm, plastic-like mask. You get a pleasant drawing feeling, a relaxing feeling. There is a corrective action, and an astringent action. You feel the ARGILLA drawing on the pus-heads. Everything it touches it draws into itself, including the hardened oils, the dirt, the waste matter, the fatty acids, whatever filth is buried in the pores, including some of the blackhead materials, perspiration and poisons given off by the skin.

After 10 minutes rinse the mask away. Hot or cold water makes no difference. It dissolves in a second. Your skin feels clean, refreshed, sparkling, smoother! Like velvet! But wait . . . you haven't finished your first treatment yet!

Now Apply Step 3 of Your Treatment . . . The Astringent

This is not merely a perfumed alcohol that tickles your skin for a few seconds. It penetrates into your pore openings, performs a final necessary sponging, dissolving action. But even more important, tightens the pore openings and leaves an invisible film on your skin that lasts for hours. You cannot feel it, you cannot see it, but it is there to help protect your pore openings!

Now Look Into Your Mirror

Some of your blackheads should be gone with very first treatment! Look for softened pimples and whiteheads that may break or be drawn out in your next treatment or two. Look at the corners of the nose, around your mouth, your cheekbones! See how your enlarged pores have tightened. Your skin will feel alive! You should actually see minor wrinkles gone . . . and this fresh, buoyant, youthful effect will last for hours.

Is This for "Normal" Skin, Too?

Certainly. Simply because this is a medicated formula doesn't mean that you have to have a "sick skin" to use it. You may be a woman past 30 who has never had a really serious skin problem, but who finds herself annoyed by occasional blackheads, whiteheads, enlarged pores or periodic skin eruptions. You may be a woman who suspects that your skin is not as beautiful and as fresh-looking as it could be . . . but your cosmetic creams can't give it to you. In that case . . . we think you'll be thrilled by the sheer, smooth, silken beauty that one or two treatments can give you.

On the other hand . . . if you have an adolescent, broken-out skin, if you are a man who is troubled by blemishes or a "sandpaper skin" and you are sensible enough not to be ashamed to use a so-called "woman's treatment" in the privacy of your own home . . . or if you are a woman who has chosen to abuse her complexion with improper and inadequate care . . . then this is vital.

You will see positive improvement with your first 10-minute home treatment. Your mirror will show it to you. And we say you will see further rapid improvement for the next 14 days. After 14 days, you will discover whether you have to keep using all or part of the treatment every day, once a week, or once a month depending on how fast your complexion begins to clear.

Being the tender tale of two star-cross'd lovers,
doomed to part.

MY FIRST LOVE

by Mitzi Gaynor

■ My first fellow happened to me at the same time as my first show. The show was Song Without Words, which we were playing in San Francisco. He was one of the ushers and his name was Fred.

I didn't know him from nothing till a girl in the show uttered those famous last words, "There's a fellow working here who's just dying to meet you."

"I have no time for men," I answered. "I am an artiste!" Knowing nothing about men or artistes.

I thought Fred was terribly old—nineteen—and terribly romantic looking. He always went around with a pipe. It never had any tobacco in it, but it gave him such an air.

We were madly, but madly, in love. Every night after the show we had dinner together in a little French restaurant. We fought about everything. If Fred said it was a nice day, I retorted, "It is not!" Just to show him that I was pretty sophisticated and knew my way around, too.

Then the show moved to Los Angeles. When Fred came to the train to see me off, he brought me an orchid. An orchid! And said, "Mitzi, do you know what this means?"

Not wanting to show my naiveté, I said in my most regal manner, "I certainly do not. Perhaps you had better explain yourself."

"It means we're engaged," Fred said, and I could have flown to Los Angeles under my own power. When we got there, oh joy, there was even a letter waiting for me. He must have written it between the matinee and evening performance on Saturday. He had a nickname for me, "Almond Eyes." I pictured myself as a sort of Theda Bara.

Letters—that was the sour note in our love song. I hate to write letters.

Poor Fred would write and write without getting an answer, and finally I'd get a cheery, impersonal note, saying, "Well, I'm engaged again." He never was, of course, but I knew I had better write or else.

I think our Great Romance lasted about a year and a half. Did I date anyone else when I was away from him? Certainly not. I had the soul of an artiste—would I betray the Man I Loved? Besides, I didn't know any other boys.

It all ended when I went to New York. Fred came down from San Francisco to see me off.

Oh, that leavetaking. When the train pulled out, I really played the scene to the hilt. There I was, hanging out the window, waving my handkerchief, shouting, "Farewell, farewell! I shall never forget you!" while Mother held on to my ankles. How I loved suffering.

In spite of my fine words, I did forget him. New York was so exciting I just didn't get around to answering Fred's letters. But I overplayed it. This time I got a wire. It said, "Engaged. Wedding set for such-and-such a date. Too bad you can't be here." Not even "love."

That wedding didn't come off, either. Fred is still single—but not carrying any torch, heaven knows. He's in the Army now and writes to me now and then. And the things we remember about our big, dramatic romance are funny enough to break up both of us and send Jack Bean, the man I'm really going to marry, into hysterics!

TV TALK

Steve Allen is moody . . . Audrey Hepburn has future in-law trouble.

Jack Paar, whose career is really zooming, is one of the most relaxed characters in the business when the cameras are turned on. In private life he is a nervous wreck. He eats hardly any breakfast, gulps iced tea or coffee for lunch, and keeps taking pills to keep himself going. His dialogue offscreen comes so fast that you wonder how he can keep it up and not collapse. He's a worrier, too. He frets over stories about him when they appear in the papers and keeps seeing double meanings in them when there aren't any. He keeps thinking his whole career is in jeopardy from one innocuous sentence in somebody's story. It's amazing that detrimental things aren't printed about him, in fact, for he has an uncanny—and unfortunate—knack for sticking his foot in his mouth. He's a little like Godfrey in that way (although much easier to see, of course). Both of them, once they start talking, can't stop; and both of them come out with statements that make them look pretty silly when they show up in print . . . Don't think that Audrey Hepburn's family and friends are the only people against her possible marriage to Mel Ferrer. Some members of Mel's family don't approve either. It isn't that they don't like Audrey—they all do—but they are very religious and do not recognize divorce. They still consider Fran Ferrer (who divorced Mel in Mexico a few months ago) his wife . . . Steve Allen seems like one of the easiest-going guys in the world. But he's not. He gets into blue-indigo moods, and no one can get him out of them. And his show sometimes suffers from Steve's funks; when he's in one, he's not so quick with the quips—and sometimes just a little high-handed with his studio audiences. Any little thing can set him off—a misplaced camera, a wrong note, a slow stagehand. The worst time to meet Steve, however, is in the morning. He doesn't start operating, or even thinking, until around noon. It's a good thing his show is a late-night one. He'd probably flop with a thud if he had to take over Garroway's work . . . It's surprising in such a suave guy, but Robert Montgomery has a stutter. The more he talks, the more pronounced it is . . . One reason you don't read more about Arlene Francis is that she's so nice many editors claim that any story about her would be dull . . . Even the smartest producers make mistakes, and Howard Lindsay is no exception. Kim Stanley once went to him to audition, armed with a letter from a mutual friend, and Lindsay told her to go back to Texas. Kim, who is essentially very shy, had spent two years getting up the nerve to use the letter and she was heartbroken. But she is also a very determined girl and she went on to her TV and Broadway successes. She had her moment of triumph when Lindsay saw her act and marched right up to her to say, "I'm so glad you didn't go back to Texas." . . . Al Hodge, who has been playing Captain Video practically since TV was born, is a big, husky, amiable boy who is the envy of many actors for one reason: They might not want to spend years playing in a science fiction TV show, but they wish they could learn their lines as fast as he does. He doesn't even have to go to rehearsals sometimes! He can just take the script, read it over and go on! . . . Rex Thompson is unique among child actors. The adult thespians just give up and let him steal their scenes when he's on stage. But—show-business miracle though it seems—they don't mind. They like little Rex. He's a very self-possessed boy—but not at all in an obnoxious way—and he's been known to cue far more experienced actors in their lines because he often knows their lines as well as his own! He's a real trouper, too.

Steve Allen and Jayne Meadows at wedding.

One time he had laryngitis and the doctor said he could not act that night. But Rex was determined that the show would go on—and it did, and he did! Another thing that's amazing about Rex is that he doesn't have to have his directors explain a part to him. Even at his age, he understands the characters he plays. Rex's accent is legitimate, by the way. His father is English, and has kept his accent even after some twenty years in this country. And Rex Thompson is his real name, although his father, a part-time actor, uses the name of Jack Beanwell. Seems that when he came to this country, there was another actor named Jack Thompson, so he changed his last name, taking his mother's maiden name. But his son uses the family's real name . . . Lots of people have commented on how much Leo G. Carroll sounds like the late Roland Young when he plays the role of Cosmo Topper. What few of them realize, however, is that although Carroll and Young were friends for years, Carroll has always talked the way Topper does. Carroll is a little bit like Topper, too—a dry wit and a befuddled air that belies the brains underneath. Carroll, in fact, is quite a scholar: he's an omnivorous reader who likes nothing better than a good philosophical or literary conversation. But he also has a side interest in magic and is not averse to placing a few bets on the horses . . . You wouldn't think it to see Tony Randall and Wally Cox (one with a pale face and the other with a skinny frame), but they often work out in a gym during their lunch hour . . . Color television is going to be very hard on some female stars. Dyed blonde hair shows up as just what it is, and every little scar on a girl's cheeks looks like a cave. Quite a few actresses who don't have perfect complexions are doing something about them right now. Some are even undergoing those sandpaper or wire brush operations to smooth up their faces. One musical comedy star who does quite a bit of TV work had one a few months ago, and the difference is amazing! They're very painful and take weeks to recuperate from (weeks when work would be out of the question), but this particular star never could have sung in front of a color TV camera without one . . . Walter Cronkite was a very unhappy man when CBS gave his Morning Show spot to Jack Paar. Not that he was delighted to get up every morning before five to make it to the studio, but the pay checks were mighty nice—and mighty necessary with a fancy apartment on the East River and two young girls in private school. Walter's ambition, however, is—and has been for a long time—to have a straight fifteen-minute news show. The trouble is, you can't get one just for the asking. Walter, although he enjoys emceeing, still considers himself primarily a newsman.

Rex Thompson proves to be a real trouper!

To work like this you gotta be nuts— or be Cyd Charisse!

FOR DANCERS ONLY

■ At the climax of the music Cyd Charisse leaped energetically onto partner James Mitchell's shoulder. They held the position like statues.

Director Stanley Donen turned to the group around the camera. Eugene Loring nodded his approval of the intricate choreography. Jean Coyne was positive not a strand of Cyd's hair was twirled out of place. A woman from the censor's office affirmed that Cyd's skirt, which was slit above the knee, had remained provocative, but not too provocative. Finally, a short eternity later, the director called, "Cut! It's a lily."

A "lily" means great, perfect. To Cyd Charisse it meant the completion of 160 hours of work for a guest specialty in Deep In My Heart. The number would last a slim seven minutes on the screen.

According to Cyd, "My shoes go flying off in the middle of an arpeggio, my hair tangles in my partner's teeth as I lean against his arm doing a high kick and my earrings take off at the slightest spin."

She has found several off-beat remedies. She brushes the inside of her shoes with toupee paste. "Then they stay on like paper on the wall. The paste is washable so it doesn't harm stocking, foot or shoe.

"I feel like a wired candelabrum every time I wear earrings in a dance. They're spin-tested first to see how long they'll stay on the ear before the force of the twirl will snatch them off. Then they run a wire around my ear and connect it to the back of the earring and dab the front with paste."

Eugene Loring, who has known Cyd for eleven years, helped to remind her of other dance "eccentricities" that had to be developed. "Cyd, as you know, has the longest legs of any dancer in town. We always used to have trouble keeping the opera length hose she wore from twisting." Now, she wraps a penny in the top of her stocking, binding it with elastic and tying it to the stocking belt. Those nylons hug her leg for dear life, and she's never lost a penny yet.

The most nerve-racking accident is the run in the stocking. The entire costume has to be taken off section by section since it is entirely sewed or hooked together.

"The dance for Deep In My Heart was a rough one," Loring explained. "We couldn't shoot it in sequence since neither Cyd nor anyone else could endure the pace. We'd film the harder leaps and spins in the morning when she was fresh and taper off after noon."

"There are so many other items to check besides the correct steps," Cyd sighed. There are the dance skins, flesh-fitting leotards made of porous latex. Every dancer wears this flesh-tone second layer of skin to keep the perspiration from soaking the costume. "As it was I had four rehearsal costumes worn out before I ever tried on the white lace and jersey one I wear for the number. They had a duplicate of it just for protection."

A good thing, too, for after testing thirty-four pairs of shoes, Cyd had finally chosen the high heels that would have balance, style and endurance. She hadn't taken more than a few steps when the rubber-tipped heel caught in the hem of her dress. It was good to know there was an extra.

She must remember other details: lacquering her hair until it fits like a cap and removing all rings so they won't cut her partner or herself. She tries to keep daisy fresh by packing her wrists in ice cubes. If these aren't available she uses cologne.

So next time you see Cyd gliding over the dance floor like whipped cream on a banana split, just be content with your comfortable seat in the theatre, your box of popcorn and your two left feet.

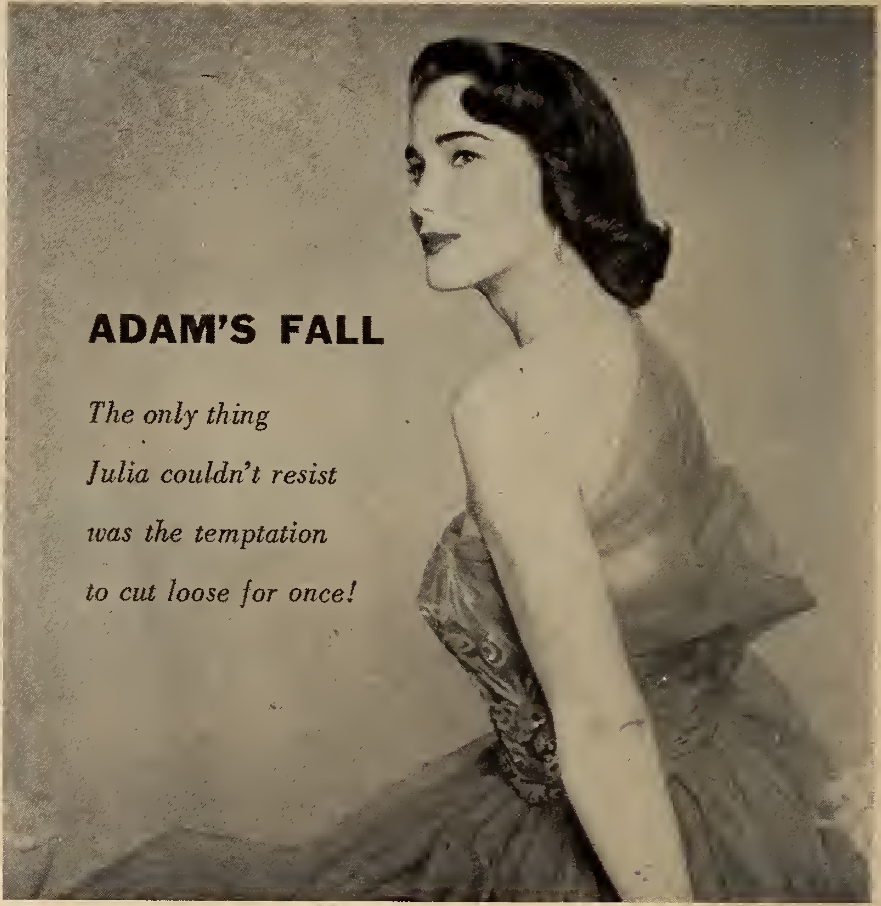
ADAM'S FALL

The only thing Julia couldn't resist was the temptation to cut loose for once!



Until recently, every time a movie villain shot a flaming arrow into the air it fell to earth in Julia's hair. As an invariably long-tressed, demure heroine, she was slapped, drowned and incinerated. Finally, tired of taking her life in her hands, she took her scissors to her hair.

"No more demure darlings," she thought happily, having chopped off a hank in the middle. "From now on I'm the fiery type."

Netless result: the "crazy cut" above, the role of an un-battered wife—and a nice long wig to wear in part of the film!

■ Julia Adams was in a rebellious mood, which was unusual. She stomped into the office of U.I.'s chief hairdresser, and shook loose her hair. "Cut it," she exclaimed. "And no arguments!"

"Very well," the hairdresser replied, and excused herself to check with the front office. Julia bit her lip. She knew that by the time Joan came back she'd doubtless have word that she'd better let the hair stay the way it was. She reached for the scissors, pulled out a big strand from the top of her head and snipped same emphatically. That's how Julia's new "crazy cut" was born.

The sequel to the crazy cut is that one week later Julia flew to Boston to start work in Five Bridges To Cross, in which she stars with Tony Curtis. For the early sequences, the studio had to slap a wig on her head, but then came the lapse of twenty years, the way they do it in movies, and Julia gets a chance to introduce her crazy cut on the screen. "And if anyone likes it, I don't own the copyright," she says, "only they're forewarned that I'm not responsible for the way it looks on any head but my own."

CLARK GABLE . . . Rumor or no: the King hasn't chosen his Queen!

■ When Clark Gable made a fast trip to the hospital to pick up his old friend Kay Williams Spreckels who had suffered a slight accident, many people jumped to the conclusion that romance was in the air. Actually, Clark maintains friendship of long standing with Kay, as with Virginia Grey, and if he ever talked of marriage to either, no one says so.

Clark, who will be fifty-three on February 1, has confided to intimates that there is only the slimmest chance that he'll ever wed again. Furthermore, he is not going to dispose of his ranch on Petit Avenue in Encino, as rumored. "Every time I think maybe I'll let it go because it's a huge place for one man to rattle around in," Clark has said, "I visualize other people living there, and I just can't bring myself to put it up for sale."

About ten years ago, this place was considered way out in the country, and he liked it that way, with the mountains between himself and the studio, but the San Fernando Valley population has grown so swiftly that the Gable ranch is now considered the center of town. The only way Clark's life has changed is that he no longer hangs out of a Sunday morning with the hot rod car specialists who used to count him one of their regulars. Too many Sunday drivers spotted him and clustered around for autographs.

Clark's chief interest at the moment is in his new 20th Century-Fox picture, The Tall Men. It will be his first picture since he left MGM. Starring in it with him will be Jane Russell and Guy Madison, as Clark once again becomes the hard-riding cowboy in a story about the Old West.

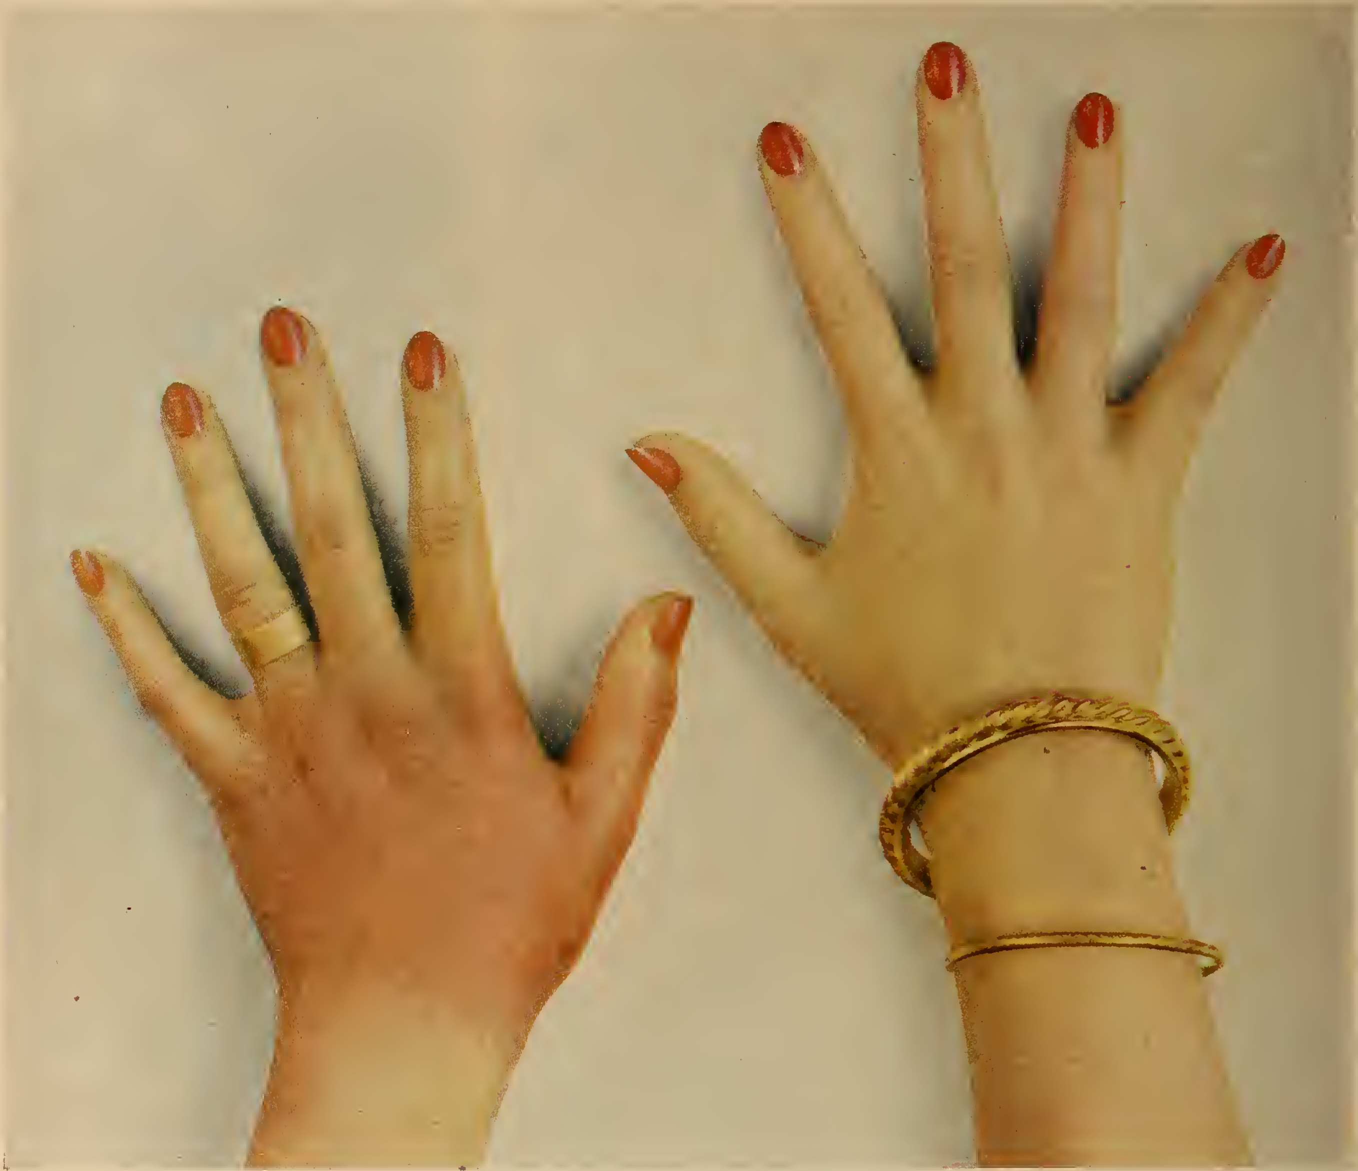
GREYHOUND®



Both hands of Mrs. Janice Mulcahey were soaked in detergents. Only her right hand was given Jergens Lotion care. The difference is remarkable! We believe this is the most important skin news in years.

Found: A positive way to stop "Detergent Hands"

A national research laboratory* proves Jergens Lotion more effective than any other lotion tested for stopping detergent damage.

Recently, 447 women spent many weeks looking for a way to stop "detergent hands."

Three times a day, they soaked both hands in detergents. After each soaking, Jergens Lotion was applied to their right hands. Their left hands were not treated.

The results were astonishing. In 3 or 4 days, left hands were roughened, red, even cracked and bleeding. Right hands were smooth, unblemished, soft, and white!

Many other lotions were tested the same way. Not one proved as effective as Jergens Lotion. Not even 100% lanolin did better (no hand care has more than 15% lanolin).

The famous Jergens Lotion formula, perfected over fifty years, positively stops detergent damage. This means it's ideal for roughness, chapping, and all the hand problems a woman has to face. It's your guarantee of romantically lovely hands.

If you haven't tried Jergens Lotion lately, now is the time. You'll find it a heavier, creamier lotion, with a pleasing new fragrance. It's never sticky or greasy. And it's still 10¢ to $1.00, plus tax.

Jergens Lotion positively stops "Detergent Hands"

*NOTICE to doctors and dermatologists. For a summary of this report, write to The Andrew Jergens Co., Cinn., O.

The Two Worlds Of Marilyn Monroe

By JACK WADE

■ Since her wedding Marilyn Monroe has been living in two worlds. One is at home with Joe in the evening—which she considers most important—and the other is her own daytime career world which keeps her famous and content.

These two worlds are separate and Joe wants Marilyn to keep them that way. And she, of course, is willing.

The vital question is: Are these two worlds antagonistic or complementary?

Can Marilyn be one sort of woman during the day and another sort at night?

Can she have one set of friends from eight A.M. (Continued on page 72)

Debbie: "What do I want from marriage? Well . . . I need a lot of security, a lot . . . hey! Let me ask you something for a change!"

"What's with this marriage-expert business? How come everyone's asking me? I'm just a working girl, I guess I always will be."

"Ohhh . . . you want to know about Eddie and me. . . . Why didn't you say so? In that case— why don't you ask Eddie!"

Eddie: "Now don't throw questions at me. Let me think. Well . . . er . . . we're just good friends!"

"Who's stalling? Me? Well, all right, you can have it straight. I've got it bad for Debbie. I think she's wonderful."

"But look . . . don't say we're married! Don't even say we're engaged. Why, I don't know if Debbie loves me that much!"

BY STEVE CRONIN

■ Are Eddie Fisher and Debbie Reynolds married?

There is no point any longer in asking if they plan to be married. Any eye which fell on them during Eddie's trip to Hollywood, before he took his European vacation, any ear which caught their words to each other, saw and heard enough to clinch the fact that matrimony was in the air.

"You've got a career started and I wouldn't want to interfere with it," Debbie said one day at a Beverly Hills gathering when someone kidded both of them about seeing a minister.

Eddie came back quickly and earnestly. "The best thing about my career is meeting you," he said.

The ordinarily blithe Debbie, who has no trouble fluffing off a compliment when the fellow doesn't mean anything, turned as rosy as the tomato-colored shirt she was wearing (with matador pants) and started tripping over her consonants before she was able to reply.

"That's different," she said. "Maybe it won't be interference then."

It wasn't long after this exchange that Debbie and Eddie met in New York—with both their mothers. At the airport Debbie was in her old form when she was questioned about Eddie. Her replies were quick and easy, but not exactly answers. But when she started back to California, Debbie was wearing a new ring and planning a wedding, probably to be in January in California.

About that interference, maybe they could be wrong. Back of Eddie stand men who have helped him to success and for whose show business judgment he has great respect (much more than he has for his own, as he will frankly admit) and even as they insist that they are open minded about Eddie's acquiring a wife, the possibility of it makes their faces set (Continued on page 77)

There's a ring on Debbie's finger and a gleam in Eddie's eye; there may be wedding bells right after New Year's—but only weeks ago (left) look what they were saying!

She looks like a bride

Only A Few Of Our Stars Abroad Forget Their Homes And

Ingrid Bergman, once regarded here as the perfect wife, shocked America by her conduct with Rossellini—but Europeans accepted it calmly.

REPORT FROM EUROPE:

WHY CAN'T THEY BEHAVE?

By Sheilah Graham

■ The British just couldn't believe it. There was a stunned silence as Errol Flynn, grinning fatuously and foolishly, followed his wife Pat Wymore off the London Palladium stage. It was the Night Of A Hundred Stars—the "Midnight Matinee" organized by Noel Coward for a charity. Royalty was in the stalls, represented by seventeen-year-old Princess Alexandria, daughter of the Duchess of Kent.

For no reason anyone could guess, Errol Flynn, late of Hollywood, had elected to read The Kinsey Report from the stage. It was shockingly tasteless, and to make it worse, Mrs. Flynn performed a just-as-vulgar semi-striptease.

"But why was there no mention of this strange exhibition of bad manners in the press?" I asked a newspaper friend of mine a few days later.

"That's what Flynn wanted," he replied, "so we decided to punish him by ignoring the incident."

Insult Their Hosts—But They Make Many Horrifyng Headlines!

Shelley Winters, temperamental anywhere, really cut loose in Italy. Few and far between were the times when the jealous Shell calmed down to pose smilingly with Vittorio, Michael Rennie, Silvana Mangano.

No one is more poised in Hollywood than Gene Tierney, but she throws caution to the winds in Europe. The Aga Khan (left) smiled tolerantly at some of her antics but turned thumbs down on her as Aly's wife.

Although usually accompanied by mutual friends, Ava and her bullfighter shocked the public by disappearing together for days in Spain. But Ava was the one shocked by Dominguin's behavior in America.

Bob Hope and his wife, photographed in a rare nightclub appearance, are as circumspect overseas as they are at home, do a great deal to make up for the bad impression left by other Hollywoodites abroad.

Errol has always loved to shock and startle. But I was amazed on my recent trip to Europe, to discover that other movie stars who are usually cautious in their statements and conservative in their behavior, had lost popularity because of sounding off and acting up.

I was surprised, for instance, to find that Clark Gable had lost face in Paris over the Suzanne Dadolle affair. Now it's one thing not to marry a girl. But in France you are not a gentleman if you deny you are engaged to a lady, after she has announced it. It is not gallant. Actually, poor Suzie might have grabbed Hollywood's best bachelor if she had realized how easily film stars are frightened by ladies who announce, "We are engaged to marry." But all the same, I'm sure that if the same thing had happened in Hollywood, Clark would have remained noncommittal and gone off shooting or something instead of flatly denying that his intentions were matrimonial. Such ungraciousness wasn't like the King.

And Gene Tierney. No one is more sedate in Hollywood than Gene—when she's here. Gene was born and raised in Brooklyn. She has a passion for titles, and she longs to be a princess. All this palaver about trying to decide whether she should or should not marry Prince Aly Khan is stuff and nonsense. If the old Aga Khan would give the word, it is my opinion that Gene would marry Aly faster than she could say yes. Ironically, one of the Aga's objections to Gene as a daughter-in-law, I'm told by one of his close friends, is that Gene tries too hard to act like a princess—or rather she conducts herself as she thinks a princess does—haughty, cold and disdainful. I haven't met many princesses, but the real article has always been warmly gracious.

And Gene's technique with Aly was, shall we say, a little clumsy. True, she was surrounded (Continued on page 79)

New love has brought new happiness to
Jeff Chandler's lonely life.
But this time
he wants to be sure!

BY ALICE FINLETTER

A time to work things out

"We've both been through emotional upsets," Jeff says. "My divorce won't be final till next year and Gloria doesn't want to be tied down yet."

■ Jeff Chandler must rearrange his life, now. In his new kind of life, there must be a woman, sooner or later.

Most of Hollywood believes that woman will be pert, petite, beautiful Gloria De Haven. Jeff and Gloria have been going around together ever since their estrangements and divorces.

That they care deeply for each other is obvious. When Gloria recently opened at El Rancho Vegas, a swank nightery in Las Vegas, Jeff flew in from Hollywood to lead the opening night applause. A few weeks later when he was on location in Kingman, Arizona, making Foxfire with Jane Russell, Jeff again took off to visit Gloria on the week-end.

This jaunt from Arizona was supposed to be a surprise, but it backfired. When Chandler arrived in Las Vegas, he found that Gloria had another guest—Marty Himmel, the husband she was then in the process of divorcing.

The newspapers said that Marty and Jeff exchanged strong words, that the tall, burly actor invited Himmel to step outside and that while Gloria was singing to the cash customers, the two men in her life squared off. But Gloria says it isn't true.

"I read in the newspapers, too, how Jeff and Marty were supposed to have fought over me. It's a lot of bunk.

"Jeff happened to fly up to see me. I didn't know he was coming. And Marty happened to fly in from New York. My divorce from Marty was very friendly and I was glad to see him. I was glad to see Jeff, too. There was no fight of any kind.

"After the week-end, Jeff flew back to his location and Marty went on to Los Angeles. Two weeks later I got my divorce from Marty.

Valley desert. Friends say he rented the lonely place just to escape "all those Hollywood dames who call him up."

I seem to have done it again. I didn't think the dress was so shocking, but the roof fell in, as usual. And there I was, as usual —flat on my face!

How to take Criticism

BY TERRY MOORE

■ The editors of Modern Screen have nominated me a likely authority on criticism and how to take it.

Thank you. I think.

Well, it's true that I have had a little more practice in this particular field than a lot of people I could name. Certainly there have been more times than one when I have felt that the world was not a hundred per cent behind Terry Moore.

But on the whole, I think I have benefited more than I have suffered from the barbs—and I am not talking in the sense of publicity. I'll get to that. I believe I have benefited by evaluating constructive criticism and turning it to my own uses. I believe that—by a somewhat painful process, I grant you—I have learned to accept criticism and even antagonism with some grace.

I have a friend who collects quotations the way some people collect stamps, and he has lent me a couple of them for this occasion.

He says that Ernest Hemingway has defined courage as "grace under pressure." I like that. I don't say I'm a brave woman yet, but I'm trying to learn to be one.

And it was Oscar Wilde, this friend says, who once remarked: "Experience is the name men give to their mistakes." It seems to me Mr. Wilde was being more clever than sound. This would be true only of a person who never learned a thing from being wrong. The value of criticism lies in what your critic might be able to teach you, doesn't it? And if you do learn from it, then that is experience. I didn't come here to tangle with Oscar Wilde, but sometimes a girl has to speak (Continued on page 80)

WHEN TERRY DECIDED TO SHOW

Terry piloted her mother and Rita . . .

In the afternoon they went swimming

Later that day they rode—and rested

CITY-BRED RITA MORENO THE GREAT OUT-OF-DOORS THEY HEADED FOR THE HILLS—AND A DUDE RANCH!

but Rita drove the jeep. They turned out to be equally gleeful at wading in icy brooks—and at eating, of course!

and next morning got up early to explore. First discovery: a calf. Second: novice Rita could handle a horse!

. . until the prospect of a square dance sent both girls (slightly bowlegged) to change for the party and goodbyes.

Trips to her beloved seashore are a necessity for Jane, who overworks when making a picture, has been known to crack up from the strain.

Bob prefers fishing in the mountains for vacations, so, Jane says, "We compromise. He goes to the mountains—and I go to the beach!"

Why try to change me now?

JANE'S STUBBORN AND SHE KNOWS IT, TEMPERAMENTAL AND ADMITS IT—BUT YOU CAN'T TEACH "THE OLD ONE" NEW TRICKS!

■ Shortly before she left for Europe this fall to star in the first Russfield production, Gentlemen Marry Brunettes, Jane Russell sat with a couple of friends in her beach house at Malibu. The dove-and-pink livingroom with the clean modern lines has almost become a trademark of hers. This was during the time that she was making Foxfire with Jeff Chandler and, as always, Jane was dog-tired midway through the picture. She isn't a girl who takes her film emoting lightly. Because she was tired, she had done what she always does when a blessed free week-end unfolds—beat feet for the seashore.

It was particularly quiet there that Sunday afternoon. After an active morning on the beach, her kids, Tracey and Thomas, had needed no urging to fall into bed for their naps. Robert had gone fishing with a couple of cronies. The beach house had no (Continued on page 89)

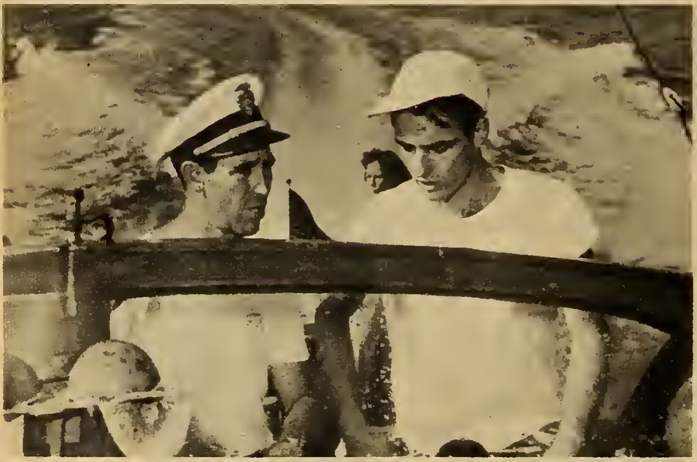
It isn't arrogance that makes Clift hide from the public, flee from romance. It's a deep-rooted fear of failure that's turned him into Filmdom's Vanishing Man!

BY RICHARD L. WILLIAMS

WHAT MAKES MONTY



After every film Monty disappears, usually turns up somewhere like Varadero in Cuba, where he can relax, go yachting with friends like Italian socialite Marcel Grief—and feel fairly safe from reporters.

Monty has dated girls like Judy Balaban (above), Liz Taylor, but the women he admires most are older, "complicated" ones like Libby Holman, Natasha Lytess (Monroe's dramatic coach), Mira Rostova.

Serious about his work, Monty appeared for minimum salary in The Seagull in New York and in DeSica's Indiscretion Of An American Wife in order to work with artists he admires.

■ It's always shocking to discover that a good friend has it in him to be a heel. It can be just as surprising to learn that a person you've written off as impossible is really a nice guy, after all.

Well, Montgomery Clift is really a nice guy, after all. The reportedly snobbish, standoffish, elusive, boorish, reserved Clift has given the infuriating impression that he just can't be bothered with people and that he has stayed single all this time for the want of a good enough girl.

The only trouble is, you've got to get to know Monty to find the niceness under his hard-shell—and it's very hard to get to know him because once he gets the idea that you want to, he scuttles away like a crusty turtle. Or, more exactly, a frightened one. For Monty has a peculiar defense mechanism: he's so afraid of not being "true" to his own picture of himself, that he'll readily risk offending people rather than let them think, perish the thought, that he's a glad-eyed hail-fellow in pursuit of them. So he runs away.

Good for each other

IN THEIR NEW HOME FERNANDO AND ARLENE DISCOVERED THAT THEY DON'T HAVE TO HAVE EVERYTHING IN COMMON—JUST AS LONG AS THEY DO HAVE SOMETHING VERY SPECIAL!

The Lamas' Dutch Colonial house stands in a quiet Bel Air canyon. Built against a mountain slope (for privacy), it has glass-walled patio and livingroom. Fernando promptly named it "Happy House."

The livingroom is furnished with pieces from Fernando's former apartment and Arlene's. For two months before they were married they secretly decorated the house.

One of their very few brand new purchases was a spinet piano; now Arlene can accompany Fernando, who loves to sing at parties. "Most of the adjustments," Arlene admits cheerfully, "have been mine."

One month after they moved in their home was ready for a housewarming. Both Arlene and Fernando work best under pressure, love to be rushed and to meet deadlines.

■ The picturesque California coastal town of Carmel is such a popular honeymoon spot that the citizens are especially considerate of newlyweds. They are friendly and courteous and they leave them to their blissful ways.

When Arlene Dahl and Fernando Lamas strolled into a Carmel curio shop recently, the saleswoman retired discreetly into the background.

She had recognized the movie stars immediately. Only the night before she had read of their elopement to Las Vegas. And it seemed perfectly natural that they, too, should choose to honeymoon in Carmel-by-the-Sea.

"Darling," Arlene murmured as she glanced around the curio shop. "This place is jammed with treasures. We can get simply wonderful things for our livingroom shelves."

"Why not buy books?" Fernando asked with masculine logic.

Arlene shot her husband a wifely look. She prowled and poked among the curios, examining and pricing every object. Some minutes later she found a black and gold musical cigarette box. She carried it to Fernando.

"When you open it," she explained, "it plays two tunes—'Smoke Gets In Your Eyes' and 'Two Cigarettes In The Dark.'"

"I like it,' Lamas announced. Arlene noticed that he, too, had made a purchase.

"What did you buy?" she asked (Continued on page 68)

"I've got a secret!"

LINDA DARNELL: As a young star, Linda was nervous, chewed her fingernails, forgot errands, needed to relax but didn't know how. Then she found a way. Her secret: "Music. I keep my radio or recorder going practically 24 hours a day. I eat to music, drive to music, study scripts to music (her latest is This Is My Love) and even sleep to music all night. My friends sometimes jokingly refer me to their favorite psychiatrists, but I find music—from swing to symphony—a great relaxer." (This, by the way, is the secret of many famous people: find something that always relaxes you—whether it's music, murder mysteries or finger painting—and turn to it when necessary.)

JAN STERLING: Jan takes even more pains than most Hollywood stars to keep looking her best. Yet her extremely unglamorous role in The High and The Mighty, in which she wiped off her make-up before the cameras, and her equally unattractive part in her latest film, Women's Prison failed to frighten her. Her secret: "I remembered that the most important person in my world—my husband—often sees me at my worst. If he can forgive this face, I can show it to the rest of the world!"

DONNA REED: Donna wanted to go to college. To support herself, she took the first job offered at the first price that was suggested—washing dishes for meals and a dollar a week. Too late she learned that the regular salary was $10 a month. Now she's a high-priced, high-rated star in The Last Time I Saw Paris. Her secret: "Take your time, investigate, don't make a decision until you know the facts. And most important, don't underrate or overrate yourself . . . know your own value and stick to it at all times."

Here are little-known facts about well-known stars; secrets that account for their success with people and with careers—and may be the answers to your problems, too!

MARILYN MONROE: Marilyn knows that her primary appeal is her sexy beauty. Her secret: "Variety. For example, I change my hair color for almost every film. Honey, champagne, amber. Now silver blonde for Show Business. I experiment with different shades of lipstick often too. A woman can't really change her face, of course, but subtle coloring can make an interesting difference."

ANNE BAXTER: In Ten Commandments Anne wears ornate toe-rings, popular in Biblical times. On impulse she ordered a few for her personal wardrobe—and she'll wear them! Then just watch her start a new fad! Her secret: "Do at least a few of the things that really seem fun. Nobody should be afraid to have fun . . . even if it's silly."

VIRGINIA MAYO: In her high school days, Virginia never dated, was so shy that others thought her aloof and snobbish. Now starring in The Silver Chalice, Virginia is poised and charming. Her secret: "I learned that people are basically kind. When they didn't seem friendly it was usually something in me that was pushing them off."

JUNE ALLYSON➤

Like every popular star, June has critics. Unlike most, she isn't bothered by being called a "professional sweetheart with a knack for nasty niceness." She just grins and admits that no one is perfect. Her secret: She pokes fun at trouble. She has organized "The Allyson Obnoxious Club" and includes among the other revolting members Dick Powell and Jim Stewart.

MARY MURPHY

Starring in Love Is A Weapon, Mary is a conversational acrobat. She can discuss philosophy—then switch in a second to baseball! Her secret: "I've found that men can't bear a girl who takes over the conversation, but they like her to hold her own."

JEAN SIMMONS

Jean's wardrobe is a trademark. Her secret: "I'm an extremist. I love really elegant gowns for evening, rather bare and of lovely, fine fabrics. But I prefer jeans and shirts for everything else—whenever I can get away with them!" Jean's in Desirée.

MITZI GAYNOR ▲

Mitzi has a new look—you'll see it in There's No Business Like Show Business. It's a combination of beauty, grace, sincerity—and sophistication, carried just far enough. Knowing where to stop took a lot of thought, planning and effort. Her secret: "Sophistication is wonderful if you really understand yourself. But don't forsake your own personality by trying to be someone else. Be yourself. It's the starting point for all real self-improvement."

FRANK SINATRA

Marriages may come and go, but Nancy Sinatra gets the sole credit for being the backbone of Frank's sincerity, for having an uncanny knack of bringing out the best in this turbulent man. Now, his stormy second marriage a failure, Frank seems to realize that he has found peace only with Nancy and his family. He may not be the world's best husband, but he is a truly fine father, proud of his kids and conscious that Nancy is responsible for their turning out so well. Since she has known him, during their marriage and even after the divorce, Nancy has given Frank unwavering loyalty. May their most recent happy date not be their last!

RORY CALHOUN

In private conversation she's his Moll and he's her Blackie—and when you see them together you know why. Lita has all the loyalty of the moll for her man—even goes sailing with Rory though the sight of the ocean turns her green. And he's as tough as they come—ex-logger, miner, cowpuncher, Rory was once the guy who'd just as soon take a poke at a producer as say "Good morning." Now that she's reformed him, Lita occasionally takes a job (she is a successful professional singer) just to prove she can be independent. But neither she nor the head of the house wants to roam. One might say they're thicker than thieves.

◀ ROBERT WAGNER Not one but several women have had the molding of Bob. Perhaps the most influential now is Barbara Stanwyck, who has shown him the intricate ins-and-outs of Hollywood living, from how to take direction to how to avoid gossip. He learned the ways of young love from his romance with Debbie Reynolds (though neither was ripe for marriage then) and lovely Jean Peters taught him the importance of pure friendship. But no one knows which woman will eventually show Bob the beauties of adult love.

ALAN LADD ▶

"Give-everyone-else-credit" Ladd is less the product of the women of his love than of his own stature as a genuinely honest human being who concentrates more on others than himself. Yet it is Sue Ladd who has managed his career, advised him, added the smooth finishing touches to the hardy gentleman from Hot Springs, Arkansas. And together they are a team that has never been matched in Hollywood, the people's choice as the town's most ideal married couple. Not only do they have a wonderful family of kids, but Alan, for more than a decade one of Hollywood's ten most popular stars, seems headed for another long stretch of big box office pictures and admits, "I never could have done it without Sue."

◀ BOB MITCHUM

Few Hollywood wives envy Dorothy Mitchum. Hers has been the hardest job in town, keeping her big, tough mug's feet on the ground when everyone, including Bob, had almost given him up. But Dorothy has succeeded. She once told him, "Before you do something, ask yourself how it will reflect on your boys." Since then, most of what has reflected on his sons has been Mitch's superb acting and now his courage in leaving the soft berth of a studio to start his own producing company. The job has been a tough one, but now the rewards are in—and they are big ones in the fields of love and laughter. Though she will always need a supply of patience, Dorothy Mitchum, secure at last, envies few movie wives.

◀ JIMMY STEWART

At age forty, Jimmy The Paradox was the shy one, the glamorous war veteran who played the field as an untouchable bachelor. At forty-one he found Gloria and plunged like a pleased puppy into the sea of matrimony and family life. Twin girls joined Gloria's two sons to fill out the family and Jimmy's famous smile became less wistful, more contented. The magic influence became suddenly apparent when career-conscious James paid less attention to movies and more to picnics, even letting Gloria select his scripts . . . a job which she handled with such success that The Glenn Miller Story and others made him approximately $4,000,000 richer than he was as a bachelor. Two, it seems, don't have to live as cheaply as one!

▼ DEAN MARTIN AND JERRY LEWIS

It's not always funny to be a comedian's wife. Dean's wife, Jeanne Biegger, had to come from way behind in the care and handling of her man . . . but today she has the upper hand—and rules well with it. It took her encouragement to help Dean break into recording, it required her stabilizing influence to bring Dean home from his wanderings as Don Juan Supreme. Jerry's wife Patti had it equally rough; she found herself married to a lovable guy who trusted people so little that he slept with a gun under his pillow! She gave him the first home he had ever known, calmed his nerves, became more important to him than his beloved audiences. Someday, under the same management, he will have big money in the bank—and all his much-needed security will be courtesy of Patti.

THE GRANGERS

And no matter what kind of madness Hollywood calls it, the tyrant and the martyr are about to celebrate their fourth happy anniversary!

BY IDA ZEITLIN

■ "Cough once," said Granger. Jean coughed like an ailing butterfly. "Cough big!" She coughed big while he leaned from his height to bend a judicial ear.

Flu had felled her on the set of Desirée. Just out of bed, she was bound for the doctor's. "You think I'd better go back to work tomorrow?"

"Over my dead body."

"Why?"

"Because I'm bigger than you are."

Though the day sweltered, even on their sky-reaching hill, Jean was winter-clad. A scarf tied snug under her chin. A dark wool slack suit covered her from throat to ankle. She looked small and woebegone, a bunny huddled against nameless perils. To ward them off, she clasped her husband's waist, dug her head against his chest. His arm went round her. "Can I have some moola?" she asked, piteous.

The other hand fished out bills. "This one? Or are you planning to take a boy friend out to dinner?"

She plucked the larger one. "I'm a gold-digger."

"Come along, gold-digger. The taxi waits."

This homespun domestic scene (Continued on page 62)

CALL IT LOVE

THE GRANGERS CALL IT LOVE

continued

Despite their preference for hearth and home, the Grangers do go nightclubbing occasionally when Jean feels like dancing. Both have excellent senses of humor, enjoy wits like vivacious Shelley Winters.

Their new home is smaller, more convenient than their first mansion in Hollywood . . . yet gossip insisted their change of homes meant the marriage was shaky!

On location for Green Fire with Grace Kelly, Stewart has the distinction of being one of the few leading men whom Grace has not been linked with off-screen!

(Continued from page 60) left a pleasure feeling as of bells rung in tune. It's a tune that has always sounded good to the Grangers. For reasons hard to assess, Hollywood seems to enjoy playing it jangled.

Consider last winter. Granger works for MGM. By and large, although with an occasional struggle, he goes where they send him. They sent him to England to make Beau Brummell. Jean stayed behind. Columns, having subsided for a while, broke into new and fevered rashes. He was sore because she'd refused to go along. She was sore because he'd left her flat. While she moped at home, he was living it up with the Wildings. Even—tsk, tsk—dating Elspeth March, his ex-wife.

So much for creeping innuendo. Now for the facts. With more weariness than ire, being past ire, Granger lays them on the line. Yes, he saw Elspeth March. "She's the mother of my children. We had matters to discuss concerning their welfare. I also happen to be fond of her. So is Jean. We're rational people. That Elspeth was once my wife doesn't now make her my arch enemy." The Wildings, baby and all, shared his apartment. "If this be living it up, make the most of it." As to who got sore, his look said louder than words that some asininities sink too low for comment.

Jean stayed behind for the same reason he went. She had to—by the terms of her contract with Hughes. In the hope that she'd be able to join him later, Granger took what he calls a woman's apartment. "Double bed, silk sheets. Wouldn't be caught dead in it by myself." At the last minute she was shoved into a picture. "Which was rather worse than saying goodbye, period. Knowing it's for months, one steels oneself. But this other sort of teasing thing—she's coming, she's not, she'll be here, she won't—that's murder. Someone else said it more tastefully. 'Hope deferred maketh the heart sick.' "

It's true that he kept her in tears while he was gone. By his own peculiar methods. When she was sixteen, Jean's father died, but he remained a living part of her life. "You loved him so dearly," said her husband. "I can't understand why you don't have a photograph of him."

"Mummy's got the only one and she won't let me have it."

This offered no insuperable obstacle. In England he asked Mummy for the photograph, vowing to guard it with life and honor. As she went to fetch it, he insists he grew panicky. "I'd heard so (Continued on page 87)

Grandmother and the Good Life

There's nothing so helpful in keeping a marriage happy as learning to get along with yourself!

by Janet Leigh

■ When I got back from Hawaii a year ago last summer after losing the baby I had expected, I learned that my grandmother Lita was dying of cancer. For two months all of us were in attendance on her, my mother and father, my two aunts and their husbands. To help out, I made it my business to have dinner for everybody cooked in my house every evening, and when I got home from work I would bring it over to my grandmother's house where they were gathered.

While the others, who had been with grandmother all day, ate, I would sit with her, stroke her forehead with a cool cloth, and hum or sing to her if she didn't feel like talking. Sometimes this could soothe her to the point of forgetting her pain and she would drop off into blessed sleep. When this happened we used to weep sometimes in gratitude at her surcease from agony—and perhaps weep all the more because she never once complained.

Grandmother's trust in ultimate goodness, as shown by her acceptance of her lot, was a beautiful one. She never moaned, she never asked once why this had happened to her, she never once lashed out at anyone or anything in retaliation as stricken people sometimes will. More than this, she even retained a sense of responsibility; she could not, even in the teeth of convulsive pain, shirk what she felt was (Continued on page 85)

At every stop, kids gathered. Doris signed six dozen pictures, answered questions. One girl asked what they did on the train. "Not even Scrabble," Doris laughed. "We're just resting this trip."

Doris posed for many snapshots with the train's crew. She and Marty preferred the leisurely train ride to flying direct to their destination, New York. "We're not in a hurry," they agreed. "Why rush?"

Breakfast, in the famous Harvey manner, consisted of ham and eggs, potatoes and steak! The Melchers ate in their compartment. At Chicago their car was transferred to the New York train.

"I think Marty and I never talked so little as during that breakfast," Doris recalled later. "No, we hadn't quarrelled; mostly we couldn't take our eyes off the scenery. Indian country . . . so beautiful."

"Next time I take a vacation," Doris said happily, "I won't bother with going somewhere. I'll just

■ When Doris Day and her husband Marty Melcher boarded the Super Chief for Chicago, en route to New York, it was with the distinct understanding that they were just ordinary passengers. "No autographs," Doris had said firmly. "No special favors. No publicity. We're on vacation. See?" The management of the Super Chief saw. In fact for twenty minutes after Doris boarded the train, the superintendent refrained from inviting them to dinner on the house. And for almost ten seconds the ever-hungry Marty refrained from accepting. Although the telegraph operators wired ahead to every station on the line that there were celebrities aboard, no one except porters, waiters, conductors, passengers and assorted fans gathered at the Melcher's compartment door for autographs. And as to Doris Day, girl hermit, it was at least five minutes before she got lonesome in the peace and quiet she had requested and flung open the door of the compartment to the first fans, settled happily down to signing autographs and told Marty, "Gee. Isn't it just awfully nice of everyone to make such a fuss?"

Doris' favorite fan reminded her of her son Terry, who, Doris told everyone proudly, was off to camp all by himself. She spent much time writing him postcards.

At a station stop Doris bought an Indian bow and arrow for Terry. "Say," she asked the Indian, "are these from Brooklyn?" "No," said he, "but I am!"

But even on the train there was work. "At least," Doris said, "it puts me to sleep!"

IT'S A BRAND-NEW BRANDO

BY ALICE HOFFMAN

The T-Shirted Terror is tame at last—in more ways than one. Here for the first time is how Marlon himself explains his sudden change of heart!

■ "Look," Marlon Brando said. "I'm not going to pose in any T-shirt. I'm tired of that screwball routine. From now on, I'm not going to have people say I'm a souped-up wack."

Brando was talking to a group of photographers who were trying to shoot him on the set of Desirée where he had a few minutes off between scenes.

He looked around and borrowed a jacket from a friend. Slipping into it, he said, "Okay." And the shutters started clicking.

"Got enough?" Brando asked presently.

The amazed photographers looked at each other. Was this docile, gentle, pleasant young man really Marlon Brando?

Was this the enfant terrible, the holy terror, the actor with the blazing, unpredictable temperament? Was this the very same fellow they'd been warned against, the actor Twentieth Century-Fox had sued for $2,000,000 because he'd walked away from The Egyptian?

He was humble, cheerful and helpful—and on the Twentieth lot, too. Jean Simmons, his leading lady in Desirée, passed by and said voluntarily, "Marlon Brando is the greatest."

The publicity men, notoriously jaded and sophisticated, agreed that they never had worked with a more cooperative player.

Were they all sincere or were they merely climbing on the bandwagon because Brando is expected to win an Oscar for his superlative performance in On The Waterfront?

The answer is that Marlon Brando, the most enigmatic and talented young actor Hollywood has ever known, has turned over a new leaf. Ever since April, Brando has been a relatively new man—new in his attitude and in his behavior.

He has become outgoing. He has developed great warmth in (Continued on page 92)

good for each other

Fernando shook his handsome head. "Not until we're home."

Arlene tried but no amount of teasing or pleading could make him divulge his secret. "Honestly," she said, looking as though she might stamp her foot a little. "I think you're terrible." They both smiled.

THE MORNING after Mr. and Mrs. Lamas officially moved into their small Dutch colonial house in Bel Air—they had been furnishing it secretly two months before their wedding—Fernando unwrapped his mystery purchase and hung it on the wall outside the master bedroom.

At the sound of the hammering Arlene stopped unpacking and began investigating. Her eyes fell on a brightly painted wooden disc about the size of a ten-inch pie plate. The disc had one clock hand, and around its outer edges were painted such adjectives as "tender, sullen, hungry, passionate, tired."

"It's called a marriage barometer," Fernando explained. "Especially designed to help a new wife anticipate her husband's moods."

At that Arlene burst out laughing and collapsed weakly against her husband's chest. "Of all the crazy things," she began. And then she was off on another wave of laughter. "I promise," she announced between giggles, "to check it every morning, noon and night."

Although Fernando planned the barometer as a gag, it has its semi-serious aspects as well. Of all the recent Hollywood marriages, none might use a barometer quite so well as the Lamas-Dahl union. This was one love affair most of the movie colony's observers did not expect to see grow into a marriage.

These two people are completely opposite in background and temperament.

ARLENE'S ANCESTORS are pure Scandinavian from away back. Born and reared in Minneapolis in a neighborhood that is still a section of transplanted Denmark, Arlene was taught to be reserved, poised, composed and always in control of her emotions.

Fernando, on the other hand, suffered a disruptive childhood in Buenos Aires where he was brought up by his grandmothers. He fought and struggled for everything he ever won. Emotionally, he has a low threshold, sizzles suddenly and boils over quickly.

A great athlete, he loves all outdoor sports, riding, hunting, swimming. Arlene does not. Her hobbies run to painting, cooking and sewing.

"And yet despite our differences," Fernando says, "we are becoming more alike all the time. I am not sure of the reason for this. Is it because we are very much in love or is it because we are only now discovering the fundamental ways in which we are truly the same?"

ARLENE AGREES that she and Fernando are growing together but this is because in every marriage someone has to make adjustments. "And most of them," the tall redhead adds good-naturedly, "have been mine.

"For example, Fernando happens to like women with straight hair. I don't know why. So I've changed my hairstyle to a loose page boy cut.

"Fernando likes to sing at parties, so I've started practicing on the piano again so I can accompany him. His favorite colors for me happen to be black and green so I now find myself buying only black outfits. And I had our friend and interior decorator Larrie Mako, change the color scheme of my bedroom from pink to green.

"Then there are Fernando's eating habits. He comes from Argentina where dinner is served at ten P.M. As a result we eat late. Not that I wait until ten, but sometimes I can last until nine.

"Also he has a habit of falling in love with certain foods — French toast or breaded veal cutlets or Bologna sausage and crackers. When one of these spells hits him I dutifully accept my fate and serve his current specialty for breakfast, lunch and dinner.

"I don't have to share his enthusiasm, however, so I specialize in liver which the doctors tell me I should eat regularly."

The Lamases' good friend Larrie Mako says that she too, has noticed a growing of similar taste in Arlene and Fernando.

"Six months ago," she says, "I would've agreed with everyone else that they are as different as night from day. But now that I've been working with them on getting their little house furnished, it's surprising to learn that they do have a good deal in common.

"They both love movies, good wines, formal parties and surprises. They're both ambitious and strong-willed and they both love to work. I don't think there's anything they can't accomplish. They love to have their fingers in many pies."

Arlene is busy these days designing a new line of lingerie for an eastern manufacturer. She also writes a beauty column twice a week, and she's just finished A Woman's World for Twentieth Century-Fox.

Fernando is rehearsing a nightclub act for Las Vegas in addition to starting an import-export business and reading half a dozen scripts.

Their friends expect that within a year Fernando and his bride will have organized a corporation to be called Lamas-Dahl Enterprises, Inc.

BETWEEN THE TIME the false prophets predicted that Fernando would never marry Arlene and the wedding day, these two stars began to shop for a home. They searched together on Sundays and they hunted apart on weekdays. They wanted a smallish place that combined beauty with complete privacy. Ultimately they found their honeymoon home in one of the garden-like canyons of Bel Air.

Their house is Dutch colonial with two bedrooms, a den, and a charming garden. It nestles gently against a mountain slope so that the glass walls in the livingroom and patio are completely protected from neighborly curiosity.

Fernando calls it "Happy House."

Two months before they moved in, the couple began to work on the furnishings. Happy conspirators, they had great fun working together while many of the gossip writers insisted that it was all over between them.

"First off," Arlene recalls, "we started decorating the livingroom. We decided to do it black, grey and gold, using old pieces that we owned. I took my four television chairs and had them covered in a grey and gold print. Fernando had his couch covered in grey.

"Practically the only new things we had to buy were a few lamps and a spinet piano for Fernando."

The Lamas den was another joint operation. Fernando covered the floor with one big square of cotton shag carpeting, and Arlene installed a white plaid couch from her old house.

"This room," Fernando likes to point out, "doubles as an office for our business affairs. We wanted it to be light and pleasant and I think it is."

The diningroom and foyer were left untouched but upstairs Arlene turned the second bedroom into "Fernando's Hideaway."

"We kid about this room," she explains, "with its sign on the door and everything. But the truth is that it is a nifty hideaway for Fernando. He answers fan mail here and watches television and studies his lines. It's the perfect escape spot for a man."

All the furniture in this room is simple and utilitarian. The room has two walls of hanging space for Fernando's rather extensive wardrobe.

WHEN FRIENDS marvel at how quickly the Lamases got settled, the man of the house generously attributes the speedy success to Arlene. "We both work better under pressure," he says, "so Arlene gave us a deadline of one month. 'After one month,' she said, 'I want us to be ready for a housewarming.'"

And the Lamases were ready, even though Arlene had to sit up until two A.M. the night before finishing the curtains for Fernando's Hideaway.

The housewarming party was memorable. It showed a lot of skeptics that the Dahl-Lamas marriage was well planned and carefully executed—not an impetuous thing.

A pair of white doves in a huge gilt cage hung above the door set the theme for the party. There was a buffet dinner for sixty-five, ten to a table. The tables were covered with red organdy and the centerpieces were gilt birdcages filled with red and white carnations.

"There were no place cards," Fernando says, "because I don't believe in place cards. What kind of thing is it to take friends who are enjoying cocktails and say, 'Sorry, but you must separate now. You sit here and you sit there.' I think guests should choose their own company. That's why at our house, never place cards."

THE PARTY was a huge success and it went on until the small hours of the morning, and after the last guest had departed, Fernando took his wife in his arms. "Tell me," he said, "and you must be honest. If you had to do it all over again, would you still marry me?"

Arlene made a cute, pouty face at her husband.

"Ask me in the morning," she said, "after I've checked my barometer." END

a time to work things out

(Continued from page 43) "As to the future and Jeff—that's hard to say. He's a wonderful guy and I enjoy his company. He's not hard to look at. He's got a sharp but subtle sense of humor. And no matter what they write about his being moody and complex, I've never known him to take himself too seriously. You can't say that about many actors."

How does Jeff feel about Gloria?

Notoriously careful about discussing girls, all he will say is, "Gloria is as fine a young woman as I've met in this business. She's sweet, she's sparkling, she's a lot of fun and she knows her way around.

"I like to be with her or I wouldn't be seeing her. But we've both been through emotional upsets. My divorce won't be final until next year, and if I know Gloria, she doesn't want to tie herself down, either. After all, she just got divorced."

Still, Jeff Chandler is not one to lead a lonely life. Nor is he likely to turn sour on marriage because his first one failed.

"What I need most of all," he says, "is time to work things out. Basically I'm a simple guy. I confront problems as they come along.

"I've got the kind of face that makes me look moody or miserable, so that people are always attributing deep and complex motivations to my behavior.

"They say that I'm carrying a torch for Marge (Jeff's ex-wife) or that I'm pining away for Gloria or that there's a big thing between me and Joan Crawford. They say that I'm lonely and in search of a wife.

"The only thing that I've been searching for lately has been a house on the desert and I've found it." Two months ago Jeff decided that the Hollywood pace was too fast for him, so he moved out of his apartment in Westwood and rented a house in Apple Valley in the Mojave Desert.

It's a small house with two bedrooms and a swimming pool. On week-ends when he isn't working, this giant of a grey-haired actor races his Cadillac into Hollywood, picks up his two daughters, Dana and Jamie, and speeds back to his desert retreat. Here he plays and swims with them, cooks dinner for them or takes them to the Apple Valley Inn. And here he finds the peace which eluded him in Hollywood.

On Sundays Jeff gets his little girls back to Marge in time for dinner and then drops in to see Gloria De Haven.

If he has to report for work the next day he spends the night in his dressingroom at Universal-International. He uses the dressingroom as his town headquarters. But his home, he says, is Apple Valley, 104 long miles from the bright lights and the beautiful women of Hollywood.

How long Jeff will go for the simple, quiet and solitary desert life, no one knows.

A friend of his says, "This desert kick Jeff's on is just a stage. It's a reaction to his divorce. He can't take it for any appreciable amount of time. He's a city boy, born and bred in Brooklyn. All of a sudden he's crazy about the desert, in love with sand and driftwood.

"You want to know why? He's tired of all those dames calling him up in Westwood. De Haven is something else again. He's really stuck on her. But she's not about to give up show business and even if she were, she's not about to take her two kids and live twelve months a year in the Mojave Desert. I don't care who she loves.

"Not that I've got anything against the desert, mind you. It's a wonderful place for a couple of months. But I don't think Chandler can take it all year round."

Jeff says time will tell. That is why he rented a house instead of buying one. But he did spend $4700 for an acre and a half of land in Apple Valley, and if he doesn't tire of the place, he plans to build his own house there next year.

His divorce will be final then and he will be in a position to marry again, which brings us back to Gloria De Haven.

Although she is not yet thirty, Gloria has been married and divorced twice.

Her first husband was actor John Payne, by whom she had two children, Kathy, eight and Tommy, six. Her second husband was wealthy New York contractor Marty Kimmel.

One reason these two marriages ended in divorce was that Gloria was not ready to renounce her career in favor of domesticity, a demand of both of her ex-husbands.

"Show business happens to be in my blood," Gloria says, "and I just can't get it out. Not yet, anyway. Jeff understands that and I'm sure he appreciates it."

Gloria is the daughter of the late Flora Parker and Carter De Haven, one of the greatest of all the stage and screen teams of yesteryear.

She was sent to various dramatics schools, music academies and dancing schools. When she was twelve, David Selznick signed her to play Becky in Tom Sawyer. But by the time Selznick was ready to roll, Gloria had outgrown the part.

A few years later, director George Cukor who was a family friend, begged Gloria's parents to let their daughter play a small part in Susan And God. "Just for the sake of theatrical tradition," he urged. They said yes and Gloria was in show business.

She was a featured soloist with Bob Crosby's orchestra, sang next with Jan Savitt's band, and presently went to MGM for a role in Best Foot Forward. She played with June Allyson and Gene Kelly, Judy Garland and Van Johnson.

After her marriage to John Payne she went to work at U-I and Twentieth Century-Fox and then did a musical at RKO. Early this year she went to U-I and starred in So This Is Paris with Tony Curtis and Gene Nelson.

It happens that Jeff Chandler and Tony Curtis are close friends. One afternoon Jeff wandered onto the So This Is Paris set to see Tony and took one look at De Haven. One look is all that's necessary.

Jeff's growing interest in music added fuel to the fire. Sonny Burke, head of Decca Records on the west coast, had talked Jeff into singing some solos for the kids at Balboa Beach. Jeff had done so well that Sonny had offered him a Decca recording contract.

Gloria is under contract to Decca, too. So these two handsome people had something in common right from the very beginning—records, royalties, disc jockeys, Sonny Burke, orchestrations.

Jeff spoke about his first two recordings, "I Should Care" and "More Than Anyone." He was afraid they'd flop.

Gloria said, "I don't think so." She was right. More than 150,000 copies have been sold so far.

Jeff was so encouraged that he began to do something he had always wanted to do—to write—"to create something out of my own imagination." He wrote the lyrics to a melody and entitled them "That's All She's Waiting To Hear." Then he recorded the song and backed it with "Lamplight."

He made exploitation recordings for the disc jockeys and drove down to the Broadway department store in Los Angeles and autographed his records for hundreds of admirers. Gloria De Haven remained in the background, happy and glad at heart that he was finding himself with work that gave him satisfaction and stimulation.

Jeff Chandler is a paradox, and Gloria De Haven realizes it.

Jeff likes to say, "I'm lazy and all I want to do is sleep and take it easy." But give him a modicum of spare time and he's renting an office in Beverly Hills, organizing the Chandler Music Company, working on the plans for a series of Jeff Chandler comic books or doing research for a transcribed radio program he hopes to put on the air any day now.

Gloria understands this apparent contradiction because she herself is blessed or handicapped by the same nature.

"I'd love to be able to relax," she says, "and just do nothing." But the minute she has nothing to do, guilt assails her and she's after her agent pleading for work.

Although they come from different backgrounds, Jeff and Gloria are two of the same kind. Superficially they appear phlegmatic. Inwardly they are both ambitious workers. Ambition is necessary for screen stardom but frequently the bugaboo of Hollywood marriages.

For example, it is commonly held that one of the reasons Jeff's marriage to Marge Hoshelle failed was that Marge coveted fame and subconsciously resented Jeff's success. Marge was under contract to Warner Brothers when she married Chandler eight years ago. He was completely unknown. As Marge took time off to bear his children, her career waned and his rose.

The same thing happened at the same time to Gloria De Haven and John Payne.

Gloria's career was really gathering momentum in 1945. Following Best Foot Forward, MGM predicted that De Haven would achieve topflight stardom within a year. Gloria married John Payne and three months later she was pregnant. Temporarily, she abandoned her screen career, and because of that, MGM switched the build-up to another newcomer—June Allyson.

Gloria was having another baby and it wasn't until the spring of 1948 that she was ready to return to screen work. By that time John Payne was the family breadwinner and Gloria De Haven was regarded as a promising performer who had passed up show business in favor of housework and child-rearing.

Gloria set out to disprove this allegation and to regain her former standing as a bright young actress. This led to arguments with John Payne and a divorce.

Gloria has learned from her past mistakes and so has Jeff. They aren't kids any more. They have no intention of repeating the same errors. They fully realize the cares and responsibilities of marriage and the price, tangible and intangible, of failure.

So Jeff works almost all the time. He doesn't play golf or tennis. He owns neither a plane nor a boat. He used to play a little softball once in a while.

Because he has achieved a fair degree of stability as a motion picture actor, he is currently concentrating on the things he's always wanted to do: writing, singing and living in the desert, knowing that financially he can afford the luxury of possible failure in these lines.

Jeff realizes that no matter how enthusiastic a man is about his new work, there comes a time when without the love of a good woman, life deteriorates into mere existence. He wants a complete life, and this must include a woman.

Since he started going around with bewitching, good-natured little Gloria, he has dated no other girl. And he seems to be happier than he's ever been before.

Whether the romance will eventually lead to marriage or fade before Chandler's divorce becomes final, no one can say for sure. But certainly at this point, Jeff and Gloria are making beautiful music together. It might lead to wedding music. END

the two worlds of marilyn monroe

The chances are good that as you read this, Joe and Marilyn have been separated, geographically speaking.

Joe should be somewhere in the east covering the World Series, and Marilyn should be somewhere in the west making a comedy called The Seven Year Itch.

It is probable, too, that you will read—in fact, may already have read—that the Di Maggio marriage isn't exactly paradise. The idyllic twosome has become more realistic with the passage of time, which is the normal course of marriage.

BUT MARILYN'S marriage happens to be unusual in several ways.

She married a great athlete who was already retired when she met him. At the time of their marriage, January 14, 1954, Marilyn was approaching the zenith of her career; her husband no longer had one.

Besides their mounting and undeniable love for each other, the Di Maggios have relatively little in common. Joe knows very little about acting and dramatics, and Marilyn knows just as little about baseball.

Marilyn has no intention, certainly, of becoming an athlete, and Joe refuses to try to mastermind his wife's career.

Joe and Marilyn have completely different backgrounds. Joe was raised in a large, happy, healthy household filled with laughter and companionship. Marilyn lived the youth of an unwanted orphan, alone, afraid, insecure. Because of all this, some people are now saying trouble will come.

Some of these have gone so far as to suggest that Joe is jealous of his wife.

"Why," they ask, "does he refuse to visit her on the set? Is that normal for a loving husband?"

They ask further, "Why won't he pose with her for home layouts? Why does he object to publicity? One of his best friends, a sports writer, telephoned from New York and asked if he'd pose for some photos. Why should Joe turn down his friend?

"Why won't he take Marilyn to parties or previews or premières? Why won't he make the slightest sacrifice for her career?

"Sooner or later the girl has got to resent his indifference."

WHAT THESE PEOPLE don't seem to realize is that beneath her exterior of naivete and breathless bewilderment, Marilyn Monroe is one of the most sensible and naturally bright beauties in Hollywood.

She can hold her own with any sophisticated glamour star you care to mention. And she knows in her heart that Joe's so-called indifference is not indifference at all. It is independence and self-reliance.

"It may be okay for other guys to manage their wives' careers," one of Joe's friends says. "Sid Luft and Judy Garland, Marty Melcher and Doris Day, Freddie Brisson and Rosalind Russell, Tom Lewis and Loretta Young. But they've all got show business backgrounds.

"Joe's background is baseball. Just because he was one of the greatest outfielders the game has ever known, he doesn't feel entitled to call the shots on Marilyn's career.

"The only time I've ever heard him give her any advice is when she and Twentieth were negotiating a contract. 'The publicity is swell,' he told Marilyn. 'Only be sure to get the money.'"

As for Joe's refusal to pose for pictures with Marilyn or to visit her on the set, he isn't being contrary and he isn't trying to be difficult. He's just being himself.

But finally, toward the end of Show Business, the rumors of Joe's indifference became so widespread that he decided to dispel them by visiting his wife on the set.

Quietly and unobtrusively, he showed up and stood in a corner while she sang her tempestuous heat wave number.

"I'm here," he announced, "because the newspapers insist that there must be something wrong between Marilyn and me because I don't visit her at work."

When she finished her song, she ran over to him and said anxiously, "I hope you liked it, dear."

"I liked it all right," Joe said, "but it takes so long to shoot so little. It makes me nervous hanging around here watching everybody get ready."

A moment later, Di Maggio posed for a picture with Irving Berlin and then as quietly as he had entered the studio, he drove out in his 1953 Cadillac.

"He never has liked parties or previews," Marilyn says, "or show business celebrations. And before we were married, he never would take me to any. I didn't expect marriage to change his habits or his likes and dislikes."

So far as anyone knows, Joe has posed in the studio with Marilyn for only two shots. On each occasion there was a third person along.

One time Joe visited Marilyn on the set of Monkey Business, a film she made with Cary Grant. Joe agreed to stand up for a photo with Marilyn and Cary. After the negative was printed, Grant's face was cropped out.

On another occasion Joe visited Marilyn with David March, the agent who had arranged their first date. This time March's face was cropped out.

Joe has been offered large sums of money to pose with Marilyn at home.

CITY ZONE STATE

"My private life is private," he says, "and that's out. Right now too many kids know where we live because the picture of the house we're renting was published in the magazines. They ride up and down the street and even ring the front door bell."

"As soon as our lease expires," Marilyn says, "we're moving. I don't know where, but we're moving."

After ten months of marriage, Marilyn still insists, "Joe comes first." But the studio has pre-empted most of her time.

Marilyn has said on many occasions that Joe has no objections to her continuing her career so long as she spends her evenings at home with him.

During the day Joe likes to play golf or go to the races or listen to the ball games. Marilyn has no interest in these.

Since sports, spectator or participation, are no fun for her, Joe figures that it's best for Mrs. Di Maggio to do what keeps her happy. And Marilyn is happiest when she's working in front of the cameras.

"Lots of times," she recalls, "I starved so that I could have the chance to act in pictures. Joe sees no sense in my giving it up. Besides, what would I do? Act as his caddy on the golf course?"

IN THE STUDIO Marilyn is surrounded by talented craftsman and artists whose appeal to her is primarily intellectual.

Natasha Lytess, who is probably Marilyn's closest friend, is a great dramatics coach, one of the finest in the business.

Years ago when Marilyn was fired from Columbia, Natasha took the young girl into her apartment. In Marilyn she recognized a totally unprepared, uneducated but potentially acceptable actress.

So Natasha, the widow of an outstanding German novelist, introduced this young, lonely girl to the fascinating world of Shakespeare, Freud, and Thomas Wolfe. She taught her about the various schools of acting, about art and literature and life. In Marilyn she found a responsive mind.

Subsequently, writers who interviewed Marilyn, expecting to find her a dumb bunny, were startled when she spoke briefly but knowledgeably on George Bernard Shaw, the Stanislavsky method of acting and the works of Eugene O'Neill.

It is Natasha Lytess who is responsible for much of Marilyn's acting success, and Marilyn is the first to acknowledge this. It is Natasha Lytess who still coaches Marilyn on every line. But once the day's work is done at the studio, Marilyn closes the iron door. Intellectual stimulation is over for the day.

ONE DOES NOT find Natasha Lytess dining with Mr. and Mrs. Joe Di Maggio. Nor are the Di Maggios found at Hollywood Bowl listening to a symphony or at the Biltmore Theatre engrossed in a play.

Chances are they are watching a good, old-fashioned western on TV or perhaps visiting Joe's friends, Vic and Marguerite Massi, or maybe entertaining Joe's sister Marie and her daughter, down from San Francisco.

At these gatherings Marilyn does not expound on the virtues of Marlon Brando as an actor. She doesn't talk about the excitement she felt when she watched Brando perform on the set of Desirée. Nor does she talk about the dance teaching of Jack Cole or studio politics.

By the same token, Joe does not discuss the various idiosyncrasies of Casey Stengel or Ted Williams' batting average or the bases Jackie Robinson has stolen.

The Di Maggio family discussions are usually limited to immediate plans and problems: where to move, to buy or to build, the welfare of Joe's relatives (since Marilyn has virtually no family and practically no close friends). By nature, neither Joe nor Marilyn is talkative. Nor do they crave excitement and wild times. They are a peaceful, very-much-in-love couple.

Marilyn did not marry for scintillating conversation, sparkling dialogue, or the furtherance of her career. She married purely for love, a family and a home.

"I never had these things as a child," she says. "With Joe beside me I'm never alone any more."

LONELINESS is frequently a state of mind. When Marilyn was single there were hundreds of men in the motion picture industry intensely anxious to cultivate her friendship. But still, she was lonely because she felt in her mind that she belonged to no one. In case of illness to whom would she turn? In case of unemployment, who would lend a hand?

All of that is different, now. No matter how she fares in her career, Marilyn feels that she still has Joe, and this situation gives her more courage and independence and security than she's ever known before.

It also helps her career immeasurably, since the studios rarely take advantage of a girl who has a financial alternative. Before she was married to Joe, Marilyn was suspended by her studio because she refused to make Pink Tights.

Marilyn's salary at the time was $750 a week. The studio knew that she had saved practically no money, that sooner or later she would be hard up.

Once Marilyn got married, the situation changed completely. The girl had someone to support her. This called for new tactics. The studio signed Sheree North in an attempt to stampede Marilyn into Pink Tights, a script she had refused.

Movie Director Mike Curtiz told Peter Arnell he was looking for a week-old baby for a movie role. "Preferably," he said, "one with experience."

Earl Wilson in The New York Post

But Marilyn refused to be stampeded. She had Joe for a husband, and she didn't care who the studio signed.

In the end, it was the studio that capitulated. Monroe was given a new contract, the lead in Show Business, and she was told to forget about Pink Tights.

THIS WAS HER first triumph in studio negotiations, and Marilyn realizes that she won largely because she had a husband to back her up.

You can see therefore what Joe means to this girl, and why she is willing to live in two worlds on his terms.

When Marilyn is with Joe in San Francisco, there is no studio discussion whatever. She helps her sister-in-law Marie with the food, occasionally cooks spaghetti for Joe—he has taught her how—makes the rounds of the relatives, dines at the Di Maggio restaurant on Fisherman's Wharf which is run by Joe's brother Tom, and in short, she does everything to please her husband.

In most homes it's the husband who goes off to work in the daytime and returns at night to the waiting arms of a loving wife. When Joe and Marilyn are living in Hollywood the setup is reversed. This doesn't necessarily mean, as many detractors imply, that the marriage will founder. All it means is that Joe and Marilyn have developed a way of life that fits their own particular set of circumstances.

Right now their strong love is the bridge that spans Marilyn's two worlds. Tomorrow it will be a baby, perhaps, and when the baby does come, Marilyn's career will be relegated to third position behind Joe and bambino. END

she looks like a bride

(Continued from page 38) in grim lines. "You never can tell about the reaction of feminine fans to a young romantic singer who is no longer eligible," said one representative of Eddie's management group. "The women don't seem to hold the more mature crooners, Crosby, Como or Sinatra, personally responsible for the sentiments expressed in the lyrics of their songs. Or if they do, these older fellows have been around long enough to develop a following strictly on the basis of the music in their voices rather than on personality alone. But when a youngster like Eddie sings about the loneliness and heartbreak that is so often the subject of ballads, he is much more convincing if he is single. After all, married men are not supposed to be lonely!"

THIS PSYCHOLOGICAL notion about the girls who make up the bulk of his audiences is something Eddie is well aware of; so are his friends, and of course Debbie knows about it. She is strongly career-minded, having many times said she must get her own career going before she thinks of marriage. She still talks like that even though, with her success in Susan Slept Here and the great work she is doing in Hit The Deck at MGM, there is no doubt about the firm status of her stardom. And it is a safe bet, too, that if she marries Eddie, theirs will be a double star family. Debbie won't abandon her career.

"I'm a working girl, you know, and I probably always will be," she told him late one afternoon when he laid plans for a great evening and she begged off so she could rest for an early studio call.

Few young couples who are altar-bound can keep from revealing their plans in one way or another. So much like a loyal and dutiful young wife has Debbie acted toward Eddie, and so close to the attitude of a young bridegroom does his become sometimes, that a report claiming they have already secretly eloped has got a lot of credence. Probably those who do believe this are the type who not only are quick to add fact to rumor, but often multiply the one by the other. Yet if you were at the Hollywood Bowl the night Eddie sang there, or at the Mocambo on an early morning date with them as he crooned in Debbie's ear on the dance floor, or heard their dialogue the dozens of times she "dropped in for a minute" to see Eddie and was still having her hand held by him hours later . . . you would admit that the best description was "newlyweds."

ALL SUMMER, when they didn't happen to have a formal date they had a little informal routine that picked up the slack in this phase of their romance. The big white mansion Eddie lived in was on the Coldwater Canyon route Debbie always used driving home from the studio. You could always tell when Eddie was in because he never parked his black Cadillac in the garage—always in the driveway right at the front door. It is doubtful if on her way home after work Debbie once drove past that "standing" invitation to drop in. She would pull up behind the Cadillac in her salmon and cream Pontiac, slip inside the main hall of the house and peek through the back windows to the pool in the yard. That was all she had to do. Eddie, whose eyes are as sharp as his singing notes are true, would jump up from whatever he was doing (usually lounging in the sun) and run to get her.

Then would begin the business about her being able to stay only a little while. Eventually, to hold her around, Eddie began to use counter-strategy. He would claim that the drive home would be too much for her unless she had something to eat before she started. Or else he would insist that if she loved him she would go into the pool with him. "Isn't it true," he asked her one such evening, "that this is the best time to swim in California? Just before dinner?"

Debbie replied that this was true of the San Fernando Valley, where she lived, but she didn't know about the fancier Beverly Hills area where his house was. But she did stay around and that was the big idea.

You couldn't be blamed for thinking that Debbie acted very much like a conscientious wife and daughter-in-law if you saw her the night of Eddie's concert at the Bowl. Eddie got the best seats in the place, Box No. 32, for Debbie and her parents; center and smack in front of the stage. Debbie's folks were in it, all right. But not Debbie. She quietly walked to another box where Eddie's father, Joseph Fisher, was all alone, and sat with him.

Before the concert began she was backstage with her folks and they all gave Eddie their good wishes, Debbie sealing them with a kiss—and re-sealing them several times. And Debbie came back again after the show, of course, and you could tell it meant a lot to Eddie. After which Debbie went even further and revealed a fine understanding of the professional niceties involved in the event. She took a chair out of everyone's way—and let the rest of the world come and deliver accolades to the young artist.

Besides other singers, actors, musicians, managers, songwriters and producers who trooped into Eddie's dressingroom to congratulate him, a whole girls' club had somehow wangled permission to get autographs en masse. They lined up to see Eddie. At this, Debbie, for fear she might be recognized and thus intrude on his big night, shifted further into the shadows to be sure no one would recognize her.

Eddie had sung some of Irving Berlin's songs at the concert and there are plans for him to do Berlin's life on the screen. When the famous songwriter came back stage he wanted to take Eddie out for the evening. Eddie ran to get Debbie.

There were others in Irving Berlin's party that night but, except for rare moments, it was a twosome as far as Eddie and Debbie were concerned.

"You've got a real flip girl there," Berlin said to Eddie once, as they took seats at a Mocambo table.

"Yeah, she comes up with the good ones," Eddie agreed.

Up to that particular period in the evening Debbie had been talkative. But a little later when they were on the dance floor, and Eddie was singing to her, she was a girl existing in rapt silence.

"They were really sufficient unto each other that night," said a friend of the pair who was there that evening. "Believe it or not they had one drink—a soft drink—between them from the time they came in until they left. One drink and two straws. If it weren't for their evening clothes they would have looked like small town kids on a soda fountain date."

Eddie's birthday gift from Debbie was a pair of gold cufflinks inscribed, "A wonderful thing happened today—you."

Almost everyone Eddie meets seems to think it important to point out his youth to him (he's twenty-five) and emphasize that he has a great future if he doesn't make any false moves. No one tells him to his face that marriage would be a mistake but it is plainly the general idea. Eddie, a kid who hasn't had an easy life (although he always says, "It was okay with me having been poor; I didn't know any different"), sometimes gets fed up on this trend of conversation. And he often can be heard unconsciously trying to create the impression that he is older than his years.

"I bet you think I haven't been around much," he said to Irving Berlin once, "but how about this song?" And he sang one of Berlin's own numbers, written so long ago that Berlin barely recalled it.

"You weren't even born yet, when I wrote that one," Berlin said.

"Well, I grew quick," Eddie replied.

He is also a little sensitive about complaints that his tremendous success has so complicated his life with an endless round of rehearsals, shows, interviews and conferences that nobody can get in to see him. He can't forget that for most of his life nobody ever wanted to get to him.

He was a judge on Peter Potter's Juke Box Jury TV program in Hollywood last summer when Donald O'Connor guest-sang a song published by O'Connor's firm.

"That's the kind of song I would have liked to do last season on my Coca-Cola program," Eddie commented.

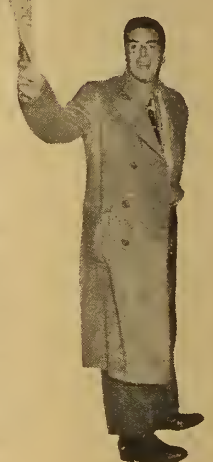
"Why didn't you?" Potter wondered.

"Nobody asked me," Eddie replied.

Potter turned to O'Connor and asked him why he hadn't brought the song to Eddie's attention since its use by Eddie would help make it a hit.

O'Connor raised helpless hands. "How do you get to Eddie?" he asked. "You have to climb over people."

PRESS-AGENT SUPREME



Two years ago, I was standing outside of Lucey's Restaurant in Hollywood when a group of movie stars came out. A crowd of autograph seekers formed, and above their excited cries a husky voice was heard booming out, "Get Jean Simmons! Get Jean Simmons!" Presently the owner of the voice, a tall, broad-shouldered man, approached me and suggested that I get the autograph of "that fine British actor, Robert Newton." To my surprise, the man giving out the advice was Victor Mature!
Miss G. H.
St. Paul, Minnesota

The others laughed but there was truth to Donald's excuse and Eddie was a bit embarrassed. For a simple boy from south Philadelphia the high levels of the amusement world to which he has ascended present many complications. The demand is not only for his professional services as a singer; his personal life gets involved. Take his love for Debbie. One way or another there'll be repercussions in his career if they marry, maybe good, maybe not.

It was clear last August when he was on his way to Europe that his romance would certainly be one subject he would discuss with his manager, Milton Blackstone, whom he was to meet in London.

"Milton is not just my manager, but my friend," Eddie pointed out a few days before he began his trip. "When things have come up I have listened and come to my own conclusions, but always, too, I have passed the problems on to him. He's got my interest at heart, I know." END why can't they behave?

(Continued from page 41) by other guests and servants when she stayed at his houses in Paris, Ireland and Deauville, but I would have bet more on her chances of becoming a princess if she hadn't. And that dash to join Aly in Mexico was a trifle less than discreet.

But how can movie stars be discreet? Rita Hayworth didn't have any chance for privacy when she traveled with Prince Aly Khan half way around the globe before they were married. And when the deluded film star hoped to have their baby in Switzerland without any publicity, she was surrounded by reporters from practically every newspaper in the world.

The same or worse befell Ingrid Bergman. I want to put on record that I knew about the baby before the story broke, as Ingrid's former press agent, Joe Steele, can testify. I had received the amazing news from a close friend of Ingrid's in Rome. And I talked about it with Joe, who was very worried, but I assured him I would never break such a story. I felt too sorry for Ingrid, who until then had been regarded in this country as almost saintly. I'm sure she herself had no idea of what the warm Italian sun and the warmer Italian director would do to her northern personality—or I know she would have taken her daughter Pia with her. She did not mean to abandon Pia. But Ingrid was trapped by her emotions. This could never have happened here.

Naturally she loves it over there. Apparently, no one was shocked by her behavior and no one refers to it. When I saw her in Paris, surrounded by her three children and doting husband, she told me she was completely happy—and the situation with Pia was improving.

"I've decided not to fight any more; there have been too many fights. But I am in touch with Pia and I know that one day she will forgive me and come to see me of her own free will," said Ingrid with calm assurance.

Ava Gardner's big romantic escapade in Italy and Spain didn't turn out so well. She fell with a thud that was heard all over Europe for the fascinating charms of bullfighter Luis Dominguin, and she planned to do a Shelley Winters and help him to a movie career in Hollywood. But the best laid plans of mice and movie stars sometimes go astray. The matador came to Hollywood while Ava was in Nevada to shed Frank Sinatra. He left her there after a short visit and was seen with this and that glamour puss around the night spots of Hollywood. And if there's one thing Ava can't take, it's having her man make eyes at another woman.

But it was fun while it lasted. When I was in Rome, I was told that Ava had made herself inaccessible to the press, the public and her alma mater, Metro, that she would disappear for days at a stretch with the handsome bullfighter.

To go back to Sinatra, it wouldn't be correct to say that he behaves badly in Europe. Sinatra is himself whether he's in London, Paris, Rome, Las Vegas or Hollywood. And himself can be pretty sweet sometimes and sometimes on the very sour side. I don't know what happened at the fashionable Milroy Club in London, but owner John Mills canceled Frankie's membership card. And London clubs fall over themselves to have Hollywood stars for members.

Shelley Winters is usually herself wherever she happens to be working. And I've seen her very temperamental in Hollywood. But when she was making Mambo in Rome, Shell really let herself go. I was told the intimate details of the fracas. It seems that Shelley was working in a scene with her husband, Vittorio Gassman, from whom she was then estranged. His girl friend, eighteen-year-old Anna Maria Ferrero, was on the set.

"Get her off," hissed Mrs. Gassman between takes. Vittorio's reply was to go over to the younger actress and embrace her. I find it hard to blame Shelley for losing her temper and throwing a glass of water into the pretty face of her rival.

Jane Russell was very worried about returning to England where she filmed part of Gentlemen Marry Brunettes for two reasons. The last time she was there, Janie had made the headlines as the heroine of a raucous party. Jane denied the story and it seemed very strange to me at the time because in Hollywood Jane is a quiet, easygoing, church-going girl.

The other reason for Jane's fear of Europe is to her credit, although the actual facts were just as surprising to me. I refer to Jane's leaving England with the little boy she later adopted. The emigration authorities over there were on her neck for taking a British subject out of the country without official sanction. And more foolish, when there are so many unwanted anonymous babies here who could use Jane's good home, why did she take a European child whose parents knew her and might try to regain the child at any unforeseen time? In fact, I heard recently they were planning to come here to live within a few acres of Jane's home in the valley in order to be near their son.

When Gregory Peck lived in Hollywood, he was regarded as a model husband and father. There was one short period when he and Greta separated, but they both explained it was an unimportant quarrel and didn't mean a thing. It took a long stay in Europe to reveal the serious state of the Peck marriage. I've always contended that the woman has yet to be born who can break up a happy home. The Pecks came to the parting of the ways in Europe before he met Veronique Passani. I knew there was something wrong when Greta flew here suddenly with the boys, leaving Greg to carry on alone in Europe. He carried on, but not alone. And last reports had Miss Passani decorating the big house he bought near London. As of now, she is slated for the position of Mrs. Peck, number two. But there might have been only one Mrs. Peck instead of a bushel, if Greg had made his pictures here.

Gary cooper came back to this country just in time to regain his equilibrium and his wife Rocky. Coop is an easy target for a designing female. They tell me that Gary is available for the asking, but he's too lazy to make the first move. I believe he was really in love with Pat Neal, but the complications of getting his freedom represented too much work for this easy-going guy. But that girl in France, Giselle Pascal, had Gary spinning.

But don't get the idea that all Hollywood stars kick up their heels and kick over the traces when they leave the four hundred or so reporters who watch over them here. Some of our top luminaries are great ambassadors for our way of life.

Victor mature, for instance. No one appreciates a buck more than Victor, but no one can be more generous or more charming where it does the most good. Little things, but they count in a big way. Like when Vic was in Holland co-starring with Lana Turner and Clark Gable in Betrayed. His driver was a young Dutchman whose whole family had been killed while he worked for the Allies in the Underground Army. Now he was setting aside some of his earnings to pay for his neglected education. Came the last day of the picture and the chauffeur looked as blue as his uniform. Then spake Mr. Mature to wife Dorothy, "Let's not fly back to England. Let's drive through Germany and then stay in Paris for a week. And I must have my chauffeur, of course. They say those French drivers are dangerous!"

Vic could have hired anybody in Paris. He could have driven himself through Germany. But the extra money and the trip meant so much to the Dutchman.

And Lana Turner, aided and abetted by Lex Barker, was just as kind. Some of the picture was shot in front of a Catholic Orphanage in The Hague. There were eighteen little orphan girls and Lana promised to take them to the circus. They were all dressed up and ready to go when Lana discovered there was no matinee. Could have been a tragedy, but Lana took them to her hotel, fed them ice cream, cake and soda pop and took them to a show in a park instead.

The British recently sent an appreciation plaque to Bob Hope for the money he has raised and donated to the British version of Boys Town. On one visit, Mr. Hope who is always charitable, gave his entire earnings in London to the project—some fourteen thousand pounds. And then there are the dozens of stars in Hollywood—Danny Kaye, Jack Benny and many others—who go regularly to Army bases in Europe, Asia and wherever there is a lonely G.I. These make up the real aristocracy of Filmland. And it is good that Europe can see and meet them in order to erase the bad behavior of what is still, thank goodness, a minority. END

I personally find it hardest to keep silent when the charge is made that I'm publicity mad. Perhaps I should let it pass. My advisors usually tell me: "Don't get into a hassle, dear. It'll just make it worse." But I get into a hassle anyway, because if you do not reply sooner or later to criticism that is merely destructive or plain untrue, then there comes a point where you can't live with yourself.

I'm told that someone once said of me that I sought publicity with all the ardor of a salmon fighting its way upstream to spawn. Even if this were true, which it is not, the simile is wrong. The salmon knows perfectly well it's going to lay an egg. I always have hopes to the contrary.

Here's an example. I came my latest cropper at Las Vegas—latest at the time of writing, that is. It was over a gown I wore in the finale of my act there. It was considered overdaring.

I was in Vegas on account of criticism anyway. Friendly and good-natured, but it was a challenge. Eddie Fisher told me I had the worst singing voice he'd ever heard. So naturally I had to get together an act and sing. Show Eddie Fisher, who—if my dear friend Debbie Reynolds doesn't mind—is my idol among singers.

Now the gown bit went like this: in the act, I was to go through three phases. First I was costumed and made up as a very young girl, no more than high school age. In the middle part, I was post-debutante size, and in the finale ultra sophisticated, something like Lana Turner. For that, naturally, we'd ordered a sophisticated dress—but not an ultra daring one. You'll see.

Here is what the papers didn't bother to report:

The gown arrived no more than an hour before show time, so there couldn't have been a change even if we'd thought it desirable. But why should it have been desirable? The gown wasn't transparent above the waist, as written. It had a flesh-tone foundation. (I think Miss Dietrich's did, too. Didn't she say something about a camera being able to see through anything? And how right she is if she did!)

I tried it on for the kids in the company and they loved it. So I wore it in the last number with no forebodings at all.

Jack Paar recalls the time he was under three-year contract to RKO: "But I didn't do a day's work. In fact, they wouldn't even announce me for pictures due to be canceled." —Paul Denis

Then the roof fell in. It seems to me I'm climbing out of the debris of some roof or other every time I look around.

The newspapers wrote what wasn't true —and never let anyone tell you a camera can't lie because a camera can, often does.

Newspapermen later admitted to me that the pictures of me and the gown had been retouched for a shocking effect.

But the damage was done. Everybody got into the act. The affair of the ermine bathing suit was resurrected and Terry Moore was back in the soup.

I made my big mistake then and there. I turned chicken and put away the gown. Opening night was its first and only appearance. It shouldn't have been. I should have kept right on wearing it. By not doing so, I seemed to plead guilty.

I kept it hanging in the dressing room, though, and friends would drop in and say, "What ever happened to that gown?"

"That's it," I'd say, "hanging over there."

And the inevitable response: "You mean, this is what all the fuss was about?"

Yet I can hear my advisors now as they look through these words: "Yes, but why bring it up again? Let sleeping dogs lie."

No. Not so long as they let cameras lie, I won't. To my mind, that wasn't criticism, that was wanton damage, and wanton damage is something I must fight back against—or give up and live in a cave.

I SUPPOSE there are all kinds of degrees of criticism, and you have to sort them out. I got a rough press stateside—never from the Army—when I wore the ermine bathing suit in Korea, and part of it I could understand. No, not understand—that isn't quite right. But it struck me that if people thought I had lapsed from taste in wearing it, then they had a right to think so. Wait. My quotation-happy friend may have one that goes with this—and he has. "I do not agree with a word you say and will defend to the death your right to say it." That was how I felt.

But when they called the suit a Bikini, I cried. Because it wasn't and I have never worn one of those and never will. I've made a lot of mistakes in my young lifetime so far and will make a lot more. I expect to be called on the carpet for them and hope to learn from the lecture. But I hope just as hard that I shall never bow to untruth or unjustified abuse.

There's always such a good chance that your critic, who is looking at you from a comparatively objective viewpoint, may be right.

One writer said that I was always trying to please everybody, and in that way sort of crossed myself up, if I got his idea correctly.

That was true at the time. As a consequence of the piece, it is not so true now. It would be nice to please everybody, yes, but I'm afraid it won't be practical until we get the forty-eight-hour day.

Roger Price, who divorced his last wife, Anita Martell, recalls how he persuaded her to marry him: "I threatened to hold my breath until she gave in."

—Paul Denis

Not that I've broken away from the habit completely, or probably ever will. This eagerness to please goes hand-in-glove with being sensitive to criticism and both are very much a part of me.

For instance, a few months ago I put on a little weight between pictures, and a friend mentioned it to my mother.

"For pity's sake." Mother told him. "Don't tell Terry. She'll go right out and starve to death." I imagine she was right.

But that has to do with vanity as well. This other trait, this wanting so badly to see it the other person's way can have serious consequences.

It's supposed to be Christian to put yourself in the place of others, and I'm reasonably sure it is, but it's surprising how thoroughly you can stumble doing it.

I made a well-meant effort to cooperate in a campaign involving some cheesecake poses, brief costumes but cute, and positively nothing offensive.

Therefore, I was startled, to put it mildly, to read a few weeks later that I had instigated the whole thing, practically announcing my candidacy for Miss Sexy Dish of that or any other year.

Now this sort of fiddlefaddle doesn't do a girl any good—and it was fiddlefaddle. Not a word of it true, not even the substance of it true. Indeed, my attitude was the opposite. So I hit back as hard as I could. Just made the hassle worse, as they say. I don't know if it was what you'd call graceful acceptance of criticism. But there we are again. This is criticism? No, this is misrepresentation.

I'm not combative by nature. When experienced and wise Hollywood commentators like Louella Parsons and Hedda Hopper take me to task—as they have—I accept what they say and try like fury to take their advice and use it. Miss Parsons, to paraphrase her, wrote that I was pressing too hard in a promotional way, that it had begun to look to her as if I'd do "anything for publicity." I hadn't meant to be like that, really, but I could see the point to her censure and I put the brake on the Terry Moore calliope. I think she has forgiven me.

Miss Hopper, during a gadabout period of mine, suggested I begin getting to bed earlier. So I began getting to bed earlier. Miss Hopper is worth listening to.

Indeed, if all counsel had the wisdom of Hedda's and Louella's, Terry Moore wouldn't spend so much time behind the eight-ball. But all counsel doesn't.

And this you should know about me—I am one of the most avid takers of advice in all Hollywood, where advice is as free and as plentiful as smog. I take good advice when I can. If it isn't available, I take so-so advice. And when they're finally out of that, too, I take any old kind.

I'm like the inveterate gambler in the place with the crooked roulette wheel. Told it was dishonest, he replied, "I know, but it's the only game in town."

All that may seem a trifle far afield from the subject of criticism and me, but I assure you it is not. It's all part of the package. The time may eventually come when I will go for a year or even a decade without putting my foot into my mouth or myself into an ermine bathing suit. That's what I'm working on now.

It's not that I'm ashamed of anything I have done. I'm not. I might be if I had actually done some of the things I've been accused of, but since I didn't, then the only shame would have to be that of the misinformed writers for themselves. But no girl, emphatically including Terry Moore, likes to be in the middle of a certain type of uproar. No publicity is worth it. I don't believe for a moment the axiom that any publicity is good publicity, and if it were so, then I'd rather skip publicity altogether. No, what I want to stay clear of from now on is misunderstandings, misinterpretations of my motives. Like most people, I mean awfully well. But my toe seems to stub more easily than the average.

In New York quite a while ago, at a party, someone wanted me to pose with an ape. I was in a bit of a spot at the time, as usual, and I thought it might strike my hooting section as undignified, so I declined. Word got around fast: Terry Moore's so hoity she won't even pose with an ape. So I agreed. Word got around fast again: Terry Moore's so nuts for publicity, she'll pose with an ape! How do you win? Incidentally, I had plenty of advisors on both sides, but not one to advise me to get up and go home.

Another time, at a Hollywood premiere, I was escorted by an officer from the Korean theatre, a friend of mine. We stopped in the lobby to be photographed, and when the pictures appeared in the papers, my friend was a little in the background. I, of course, didn't realize it. I'd looked where the photographers asked me to look, as anyone does when having a picture taken. But at least one of the columnists next day couldn't see it like that. Do you know what I had done? I had upstaged a Korean war hero. It's not terribly easy to forgive the person who wrote that.

Don't misunderstand me. I'm not a saint and I don't claim privileged immunity from attack. In my line of work, it's foolish to cry every time you're hurt.

And as I say, criticism can be a good thing, beneficial and constructive.

But where it is not, where it is malicious or disorderly, I guess there are two alternatives: ignore it with grace or fight back. Under no circumstances, I believe, should you let it get you in any other way. I know a few hypersensitive people who get sick, physically sick, when they hear something adverse about themselves. I'm sorry for them. No one likes it. We like to think everyone sees us in our own conceptions of ourselves. But that's a rarity. A man of great understanding once put the situation in these terms:

"You're like everyone else," he told another actor, who had been worrying about his personal popularity. "Some people like you, some people don't, and the other ninety-nine per cent don't give a hoot one way or another. Now forget it."

I thought it advice—another rarity—to remember. The actor to whom he spoke had abandoned grace under pressure and was, so to speak, crying on our shoulders.

When I think of grace under pressure today, I think instead of another player, a very famous star who had become involved in a truly sordid scandal. I neither stone nor condone him. That's not my department. But I do know that two days after the headlines broke—and they were still breaking—he lunched at Romanoff's with his lawyer. That in itself was a pretty brave thing to do. But his entrance was almost magnificent. He walked to his table easily and jauntily. He wasn't swaggering; heaven knows, there was nothing to swagger about. But his chin was up and his smile was on and you knew he wasn't going to flinch, whatever happened. I believe most of us—and remember, he was still presumed innocent in the eyes of American law—wanted to stand up and cheer.

You know, that's for me. Not a sordid scandal, I mean; on the contrary, perish forever the thought. But that kind of courage—well, Mr. Hemingway must have given his definition some thought.

Mother says it takes a really big person to swallow and digest honest criticism and then use it for nourishment, and that the honest kind frequently is the hardest to take. That's about it, I guess. It's like some health foods. They may not taste very good going down but they can work small wonders once they're there. And one more point: making a face while you're swallowing won't make them taste any better. Smile instead. END what makes monty run?

(Continued from page 48) that had just applauded the final curtain of Anton Chekhov's moody masterpiece, The Seagull. On the dark landing the youth tapped on a dressingroom door, and blinked in the bright light as it opened to reveal the grease-painted face of Kevin McCarthy, one of Clift's closest friends.

"I—I wanted to see Mr. Montgomery Clift," the youth said a little timidly.

"Then come on in and see him," said McCarthy, and pointed to the dressing table where his old friend and roommate, bare to the waist, was at work with towel and cold cream. Clift half turned around, said "Hi," and gestured with one hand to show he couldn't shake hands yet.

The photographer introduced himself. "I know everybody has been after you," he said, "but my editor and I thought if I showed you some of my work, maybe we could make an appointment to take pictures of you—you know, the kind you'd like yourself."

"Sure, I'd like to see your stuff," said Clift, and a few minutes later he and McCarthy were examining the natural-lighted portraits. While Clift sized up the work, the photographer sized up Monty Clift: the tousled dark hair, the hazel eyes looking a bit tired this night, the ruddy skin, the naked chest far from muscle-bound but looking healthy, hairy and suntanned.

"I like them; I really do," Clift was saying. "I think you would take the kind of pictures I like—natural, no posed-looking stuff, me and all my pores. But here's my problem: I've had to turn everybody down till the run of this play is over, because I'm putting everything I've got into it. And while you probably wouldn't distract me, if I said yes to you I'd have to say yes to them all and I'd be run ragged and I just can't have that; I gotta concentrate on this job till it's over." The eyes and the frank voice seemed to implore the young man to believe this.

"Well, all I'd need would be an hour or so some morning," the photographer persisted, "and it'd be a real break for me—" But Monty Clift shook his head. "Let's get in touch the day we close here, or the day after, and I'll see what I can do. Okay?"

After a few minutes the young man bade a disconsolate goodnight to Clift and the sympathetic McCarthy and picked his way down the stairs. Monty Clift heard from him the day The Seagull closed after a successful run. But the photographer didn't hear from Monty Clift because the actor fled almost at once to rest (and to grow a beard!) in Ogunquit, Maine, from the labor of love which had netted him the Equity minimum for playing frustrated sweetheart to Mira Rostova and frustrated son to Judith Evelyn.

THE YOUNG CAMERA artist still feels snubbed and baffled. But he has the consolation of being in good company, for with rare lapses Clift has been running away from the press for years. Except for the George Evans agency, which built him up as a natural, T-shirted, male Garbo, he has been frustrating to press agents, too. He vanishes just as rapidly after a million-dollar movie, when he's needed for publicity. Not that he's truly uncooperative or boorish (as his loyal friends have grown a little weary of explaining), but that he's less afraid of seeming that way than of seeming to be on the make. He remains grimly determined to sell himself on his work alone.

At thirty-four (October 17) this fear of seeming pushy would seem a little unreasonable, if not actually groundless. But it is not Monty Clift's only fear. Apart from all his positive attributes he retains an abiding fear not of success, but of what success might do to him—make him lose touch with the "real" world. And it is fear of failure in marriage that keeps him running away from serious romance.

THERE HAVE BEEN, and still are, women in Montgomery Clift's life. His friends say that he has been in love, and not just once. But he has seen love enter nearby lives only to go out the window leaving bitterness behind. He hates the thought of having this happen to him or to one he loved.

"I know it sounds trite," says his brother, William Brooks Clift, Jr., director on the NBC-TV Home show, "but I think Monty's still waiting for the right girl to come along. Sure, he could have been married long ago, have had kids by now, have had all the fun of being married—but who's to say? Maybe he's been right in waiting. Right now, though, no matter what you hear, I'm pretty sure there's no 'romantic interest' in his life."

The lack of one has not always stopped writers from inventing one, like the mythical Mary, a wealthy Eastern girl who was on the point of marrying him only to marry, for no apparent reason, someone else.

During and after the making of A Place In The Sun Monty had many dates with Elizabeth Taylor. It wasn't for the sweet uses of publicity alone; they enjoyed each other's company, but they never considered that they were cut out to marry each other. He used to be seen often in the company of Judy Balaban of the theatre-owning clan. Off and on for years now he has dated Libby Holman, the torrid torch singer widowed by Smith Reynolds. Many commentators have jumped to the conclusion that he "prefers older women," where the truth is merely that he prefers complicated women he can respect and with whom he isn't bored. Because his fear of phoniness keeps Monty out of New York's bigger, brassier celebrity hangouts, he and Libby have been seen most often in smaller East Side bistros in the neighborhood of his tastefully furnished East 61st Street bachelor apartment. What they find to talk about, Monty and Libby don't say. Some columnists have sworn they talk of love, others say they just talk.

In Hollywood he also used to date Natasha Lytess, who is Marilyn Monroe's dramatic coach. But the real mystery woman of Monty's life—because nobody can quite figure out where she stands with him—is the one who has been his own dramatic coach. Mira Rostovskaya Letts, billed in her United States acting debut in The Seagull as Mira Rostova, is a petite blue-eyed brunette, at once birdlike and intense, whom Monty and Kevin have known for more than ten years.

MIRA, BORN IN RUSSIA, was an actress in Europe before the war. Monty formed an immense respect for her from their first meeting. She was attractive, with some of the forlorn and frightened-looking beauty of a Luise Rainer, and she had the same kind of small, appealingly-accented voice. She also had brains. She became Monty's coach, a sounding board off whom he could bounce all his deeply-felt urges to improve himself as an actor, a judge of all his experimental striving toward naturalness—which does have to be striven for.

She even went onto the sound stages with him, rehearsing him between takes, unobtrusively cueing him when he was on camera. Nobody on the set was ever quite sure what she did do, but as long as Clift came out good, nobody minded. Not until From Here To Eternity. Mira was absent then, some said at the studio's request, and Clift still came out good—and stronger than ever—as Private Prewitt.

Mira Rostova had a lot to do with Monty's doing The Seagull for peanuts this year, at a time when Stanley Kramer was hounding him to play in Not As A Stranger, when John Huston wanted him for Ishmael in Moby Dick, and when the late Leonard Goldstein was after him for The Leather Saint. They were waving up to $200,000 under his nose.

"Kevin, Mira and I had been promising ourselves for years that some day we would get together and do a play," Clift said. "We read plays by the dozens," (nothing new for Monty, who chain-reads screenplays and treatments while chain-smoking and chain-drinking cups of coffee, ever searching for just the right part) "but the only one we felt was right for the three of us was The Seagull. People like me need a live audience . . . Many an actor on top of the world and his career at the same time, does his soul good with a little comeuppance, which he gets most effectively across the footlights."

Being a trio of perfectionists, Clift and McCarthy and Rostova couldn't accept a standard translation. Night after night (usually in Monty's roomy living room) they worked at constructing their own version, with Mira translating from the original Russian and the three of them worrying out each line of dialogue!

Add it up and undoubtedly there is affection between Monty and his Mira, but if it were ever to ripen into marriage it should have done so long ago.

Just where does all this leave the people who (in print) have been stubbornly trying to marry Monty off to one of the women in his life? It leaves them holding the bag. If he had been the eccentric they had mistaken him for, he might have rushed into marriage long ago. But he's not really an eccentric, and certainly he isn't a radical, despite his reputation as the pre-Brando Marlon Brando who went to Hollywood with one suit, two ties and a built-in sneer. (He happens to like grey flannels and grey tweeds, often dresses today as he did yesterday—but not necessarily in the same suit!)

On the contrary, he is one of the most conservative actors on either coast. It is conservatism, as well as seriousness about his work, that makes him fear losing contact with the "real" world where an actor finds his roots and inspiration. He feels that once he starts throwing his money around, or trades in his 1940 Buick coupe on a 1955 Caddy convertible, or gets to spending his time with famous people to the exclusion of ordinary people, he'll be lost. Playwright Arthur Miller once put this feeling as one of "having to have a neighborhood around me."

It was the same kind of earnestness that led Monty and Kevin to take seven months off and go to Europe with Mrs. McCarthy and their son Flip, so that Monty and Kevin could labor over a screen treatment of You Touched Me, the Tennessee Williams play that shot Clift to Hollywood and thence to stardom in Howard Hawks' Red River. No studio ever bought their product, but they believe it was worth doing anyway—because they had to.

"Monty's that intense, earnest and dedicated about everything he does," his brother says admiringly. "He could have been a tennis champion if he'd wanted to bother. He still goes to the gym all the time and keeps himself in great shape. . . . I think he'd make a great director; he has a director's point of view and an uncanny sense of what an author means by a part. He treats every movie as if it were a play, working on his part the way he'd work on a theatre part and not settling for anything but his best."

Deborah Kerr, who can be pretty intense herself, tells this story:

"When we were making From Here To Eternity all of us, naturally, were most excited by the work," she recalls. "The book was gripping, and Danny Taradash's script was wonderful. We all worked very hard toward understanding our roles. It was rewarding, but it was intensive work too, and at the end of the day we'd often discuss something else.

"One afternoon Fred Zinneman, Burt Lancaster, Donna Reed, Frank Sinatra and I were having tea. We were talking about Harry Truman, what kind of person he was, how you could dislike him or like him, but couldn't ignore him or deprecate him at all as a fighter. Monty joined us when the conversation had already reached the pronoun stage. He pitched into it fervently for fully twenty minutes—before we realized that he was talking not about Mr. Truman but about Maggio, the part Sinatra was playing in the film!

"That was all he cared about then. He lived for that film when he was working on it. And bear in mind that he wasn't just concerned with his own part, he was involved, deeply involved with the other characters. I've never known any actor who works so thoroughly and completely on whatever he does. We would sometimes relax, but Monty always thought of the film and of every aspect of it."

It was because he admires thoroughness, sensitivity and directorial greatness that Monty sought out Vittorio DeSica in Italy a few years ago and applied for an acting job knowing very well that the pay, if he landed it, would be closer to off-Broadway scale than to his $150,000-per-film Hollywood price. DeSica said he'd think it over, and thanked Monty for saying all those nice things about Bicycle Thief and Miracle In Milan. Monty got acquainted with Cesare Zavattini, the happy, humane, gnomelike genius who writes most of DeSica's screenplays, and convinced Zavattini that he was really serious about it. So Monty got the role opposite Jennifer Jones in Indiscretion Of An American Wife, the poignant vignette laid in Rome's modern railway terminal. No picture part in the world would have made Monty happier, because only this one gave him the opportunity to sit at the feet of DeSica.

Before he branches into directing himself—and it appears plain that this is where he's headed—Monty would like to do some comedy roles, either in films or on TV. He'd also like to play in The Emporium, a no-scenery play about a country store, if his good friend playwright Thornton Wilder ever gets through tinkering with it. Beyond that Monty would like to keep on making an occasional pile of Hollywood gold. "It gives a guy wings."

But whether he'll keep on winging about the world alone, or in the company of a wife, remains a baffling question. Maybe it even baffles Monty. Please, somebody, marry him! It isn't right for a guy so nice to be alone so long when marriage could make him so much nicer! END

grandmother and the good life

(Continued from page 63) still her duty. "Has Grandpa eaten his dinner?" she'd want to know. What did he have? Were we sure we didn't give him any greasy gravy? Were things going well generally? How was I doing in the studio?

Thoughts of death might be in our minds, but not in hers. She was too occupied with thoughts of the living. And sometimes, as she lay sleeping, I would look at her and become again conscious of the convictions I have come to in my life.

Her body, I saw, was just a shell, a place in which was stored love and experience and learning and skill—certainly not to be lost when the shell cracked and had to be laid away! Why, this little gentlewoman, as she lay dying, was still developing in stature. She showed it in her superiority over her pain and her indifference to her mortal fate! Why, this was beyond the flesh and into the realm of the divine; this must go on. There could be no doubt.

This, in essence, is my faith.

I AM PRETTY SURE that I am held to be a lighthearted person, not only by those who know me, but also by those who have had occasion to read about me. And this is true. So what I have said, or rather the way I think, may be a surprise. Let me then make it clear that if I am associated with the quality of happiness, credit should go to the fact that I do think the way I do.

I have always, even as a child, had a sense of being which did not depend wholly on the flesh. Don't all children? They never for a second think of themselves as temporary in nature, existing between never was and never will be again. But as I grew older I needed a little more than just this "sense," I needed the support of logic behind it and I got this out of a realization of what I have to call the continuity of goodness—continuity in the sense that I knew my grandmother's goodness must continue somewhere.

Esther Williams spent all the day climbing down a mountainous Roman wall via an anemic rope. Before she started her first descent Esther looked down at the craggy rocks, which furnishes the "bed" at the bottom of the wall in this particular scene for Jupiter's Darling, then glanced nervously at Howard Keel, and said, "What happens if I slip?" "Don't worry, Esther," said Keel, "it's the last scene in the picture."

Sidney Skolsky in
The New York Post

When people anywhere in the world talk about a "fully developed man" don't they always mean that in addition to whatever fields of knowledge he has specialized in, he is also a good man, morally? Is it not acknowledged that a clever man who is not good is incompletely developed?

TEN YEARS AGO (just to use a good comparison point in my life) it is my opinion that I was about as bad a person as I was good. About this time my leanings toward either direction were about equal, I figure. There was a desire to be good, a series of temptations to be bad. Before this my major impulses belonged to childhood and can be discounted. Since then, I know I am definitely a better person than I was. I may even in time become a good person. To be good is the basis of my belief.

Maybe I should make what I said more clear. I don't mean that I am less evil today than I was as a child, but rather that I am better for having improved those qualities of character that come with time; wisdom, tolerance, understanding. After all, a child can be willful, greedy, argumentative, noisy, impolite—and yet truly innocent in that he is not any of these things by intent. Only if he persists in them beyond the phases of growing up, would he take on guilt.

In my religious lexicon there is no such word as punishment, so that a state of guilt does not mean that one is damning himself in an active sense. That you are not good does not necessarily mean that you are bad. I don't think any of us are all of one or the other.

I know there are days when a test will find me wanting and other times when I will undergo it in a manner to make myself feel quite proud. And it takes energy to be good. While driving the other day I found myself trapped behind a truck making an improper left turn, and I just knew I wasn't going to be able to fight off the temptation to be angry. So I let go. "Go ahead and have yourself a ball, girl," I told myself. And I did. I out and out swore. (Not that he nor anyone else could hear me!) But such relinquishment of my main drive to improve myself as a person is pretty infrequent. I'll never even be nearly perfect; but I'll never quit trying.

In this I am not just working for benefits to come in another world. Believe me, it is making me stronger, better, happier in this one. What I can face today I never could have faced when I was younger. It is pretty comforting to feel this about yourself. It is worth striving for in itself even if it were not part of a whole faith.

THERE IS NO one religion which interprets existence for me, both here and beyond, as I have come to interpret it for myself. Not Presbyterianism, into which I was born and will forever hold fondly; not Unitarianism, which has stimulated so much of my thinking; nor Christian Science, which I devotedly read. Yet in all three of these, and partly in others as well, I have found inspiration I needed. They have helped me come closer to knowing that which, perhaps, I shall never know—but must always go on seeking.

This search began seriously at the time my first marriage was breaking up.

I didn't find it easy to contemplate divorce; I was sad and frightened. I would sit and try to imagine how it would feel to be single again. And though there were pleasant aspects my predominant reaction was uneasiness.

At this point my husband's mother suggested that he and I both read Christian Science. I know she did this not only because she felt it might help keep the marriage, but because she knew it would bring us comfort. She was right about that and I will always be grateful to her.

As I read, and mulled over what I read, curtains seemed to be lifted between me and the future; and I saw that with courage I could walk through glorious vistas ahead. With courage, that is, and with truth. To fear the end of my marriage was not being in truth, but in weakness.

To continue to be a wife when wifehood was not making me happy was simply to be afraid of losing a label which supposedly gave me distinction because it read "Married." Actually it was a misrepresentation, and I was the one most fooled by it.

I am not a Christian Scientist but I still read Science. I need it as I need essentials of my Presbyterianism and Unitarianism. I discovered that my mind was of a type which was not satisfied to stay on any one path to spiritual understanding and thereby close off all the others. Being what I was I had to think my way spiritually, and my thinking is still going on. God has to make sense to me—at least as far as I can understand. It is good that His teachings through Jesus did not encourage passivity, that religion is properly dynamic, because God to me represents a search I must make, not a goal I have achieved.

It may seem that life might be a little disturbing for someone of my type who cannot accept a formal faith because none answers all my questions. And it is true that for those who can fulfill their spiritual needs by worshiping in the established church of their choice there would seem to be less time-wasting indecision. But for a Janet there can be no other spiritual disposition; because wherever a question remains unanswered she cannot forget it, but must keep asking it.

What would be the point of sitting in any one church if your mind kept asking a question that might only be answered in another church; or sitting in the second church when queries arose that could best be satisfied in the first church? And so I feel that all who seek God are joined, no matter how separated their temples.

I know that to many I would seem to be floating nowhere, but I can assure you that here and there I find a marker which tells me I am not astray. It may be just a line, like the one in Mary Baker Eddy's Christian Science writings, "Life is a showing forth of God." From this, in a simpler interpretation, I came to understand that if there is a God the only way He can be expressed on earth is through people. And there was a singular happiness in this for me. I was not only able to think, "Well, my job is to express God through me," but that I will be able to see God now many times in what other people do. I have. In the little things as well as the big.

I sat in the Brown Derby restaurant with friends the other day as a waiter—a little, old waiter—gave me a second cup of coffee when he saw that my first one had gotten cold, what with all the time I had taken out for talking. It came to me as he did this that while being attentive was part of his duties, he was really at an age where a gabby girl could rightfully be a nuisance to him. But instead of annoyance there was a fond, almost fatherly, look of understanding in his eyes, as he put the second cup down and took the first one away. For a split second as we looked at each other, we were more father and daughter than we were waiter and patron. And that meant, of course, for that split second we were human and real and doing good—God's good.

NOW COMES further benefit from this phase of my faith. If God can do His work through others, then these others become important to me; the waiter, the truck driver who delayed me, the girl who waits on me in the drugstore—there is as much to their lives as there is to mine. And with this my relationship to my fellow man becomes clearly a responsibility I must never evade or hold cheaply.

A few years ago I met a group of people, and when we began to talk of religion I mentioned some of the ideas I have given here and they acted as if I were silly. It threw me a little. I admired a few of them and I began to wonder if I could be wrong, if perhaps I had no right to spread my particular kind of "good." Then a few nights later I found myself alone with one of the women, and out of a clear sky she told me she had been greatly helped by my words of the previous evening. More than this—she had needed the help inherent in my viewpoint. But she hadn't wanted to reveal her trouble to everyone, of course, so she had said nothing. She hadn't wanted to tell me either, for that matter, but she had to in justice to the comfort she had gotten, and, you might say, to practice the preaching which had helped her. Here was the continuity of good again; from Grandmother to me to this friend and back to me again; enriching all to whom it came.

There are side benefits to such an attitude. I remember last spring when I sprained my ankle at a time when I had dozens of plans which necessitated my being on my feet, not off them. My first reaction was to get myself steamed up into as mad a mood as I could achieve. But then I talked myself out of it. I decided to see if I could possibly profit from that sprained ankle. I did. Tremendously.

I did it by thinking. For the two weeks that my ankle kept me home I tried to do all the thinking I could about my life and the problems in it. As a matter of fact, I did my thinking for practically the next five years in that two weeks, and then went back and did it all over again for Tony as well. And the things I got to know, as a result of this, of what we should and shouldn't do, in our private lives and in our professional ones, and all the reasons for same; I mean the actual worth of the information made us feel twice as rich.

IT'S INCREDIBLE what you can do for yourself just by keeping quite still and letting those little wheels in your head turn; you can't afford not to!

Last May, for instance, Tony and I were getting ready for a real vacation—a three-week hideout in Connecticut. Then one night Tony walked in with his face way down to here and announced that he was in a new picture and would have to leave for Boston location for those three weeks.

Anger flared up in me. Something was wrong somewhere. Either the studio had an awful nerve to intrude into Tony's vacation period or he had said yes when he should have said no. But where previously this would have been the extent of my thinking and I would have acted on it, now my mind carried on unbidden to a saner and better conclusion.

If I raised the devil and demanded that Tony keep to our original plan for our vacation, he would. This would mean notifying the studio that they would either have to change the schedule for the picture, or use someone else for the lead. This in turn would mess up the studio's production plans, affect Tony's relationship with the studio so that he would feel miserable, and when it was all over what would I have gained? Answer: nothing.

Mike Connolly reports that Corinne Calvet calls the décor of Johnnie Ray's new house "Early Miscellaneous."

Earl Wilson in The New York Post

"Boston?" I asked. "Well, at least Boston is in New England and being in New England was to be the main feature. We'll still have our week-ends together."

Tony's face lit up as if he thought I were wonderful. Well, I'm not wonderful. But any time he wants to think so—

I see the power of goodness as something as mysterious as the power of the atom, but far more enduring. Whence comes the power of the atom? The scientists can't tell you. They only know that something which holds an atom together, and which they label "the binding force of nature," is where this power originates. Man has a binding force just as mysterious in its persistence; the power of good. Even the mighty power of the atom is depleted in its explosive death. But the power the human heart exerts is never gone—the more good we do the more good there is. Somewhere here is the secret of living past life itself, I believe. END

the grangers call it love

(Continued from page 62) much about him. Suppose I hated to look at his face!" The face was strong, sensitive, beautiful. He stared for a good two minutes and paid tribute. "No wonder she loved him." He had it enlarged and framed, reproduced in sizes small, big and various—for a billfold, a locket, a dresser—sent them all to Jean. From having no picture of her father, she was suddenly surrounded. She cried.

The trip was something she'd hungered for. "I want to walk up the London streets," she moaned, "and get lost in the fog and smell the Thames. I'm homesick for London." The cry echoed in Granger's ears. By good chance, he met an artist who specialized in London scenes—fabled places like Fleet Street and The Mall. With a certain diffidence he broached his scheme, which involved a tiny little street in Hendon. "Its artistic interest may be nil. It's not very beautiful except that my wife was born there. Would you go down and draw it for me?" The artist obliged, delivering his sketch to the studio. The cameraman on Beau Brummell, an old friend of Jean's, took a look. "Very nice," he said, "only she wasn't born there. Family moved to Hendon when she was three. If it's her birthplace you want, go to Holloway. Right near the Holloway Jail. Wonderful old pub on the corner. You'll like it." Both sketches flew the Atlantic, arriving on that strategic day when Jean's hope of joining her husband was finally quashed. She cried again.

BALCONY SCENE

In the Chicago Theatre Rosemary Clooney was midway through one of her songs when she came to a line something like, "I'm just a little girl with no place to go." A joker in the balcony immediately let out a long and loud "Come-on-a-my-house!" and the audience went into hysterics—while Rosie giggled so hard she had to stop singing!

Let's concede there's nothing noteworthy about a man's thoughtfulnes for his wife. It does, however, indicate sound relations. Yet the snipers snipe, taking what seems to be almost gleeful aim at the Granger marriage. They can do it no real harm. But when the peppering grows so heavy as to bring phone calls from Jimmy's mother in England, it acquires nuisance value. It also begins to bore those who hold no personal stake in the game.

GRANGER IS the target, not Jean. Jean is the martyred darling. (A darling she is, though singularly unmartyred.) What makes him a target is what we profess to admire—individualism. He refuses to be—more accurately, he's incapable of being—anyone but himself. In many communities, life goes more smoothly if you're cut to a pattern. Granger isn't.

He's a fighter for one thing, and fighters risk treading on people's pet corns. When his spirit yells no, you won't hear his mouth mumbling yes. His are honest battles over issues he honestly believes in—be it a script that seems ill-suited to himself, a contract he considers one-sided or further lengthy separations from his wife. Returning from five months in England, he delivered an ultimatum. "I won't leave Jean again." "Sorry, old boy," they told him, "but you're going to South America for Green Fire. Relax, it's only two weeks." He stood his ground, and collision threatened. Though you may have heard hints to the contrary, studios are often human and Granger is reasonable. They pared the two weeks to six days. Granger went.

Moonfleet, which he's making here, presents no problems. But a cloud lurks over the horizon. They want him to do Bhowani Junction in India. He'd be all for it—if Jean could play the girl. "Or even if they'd let her do a film in Burma," he suggests dryly. "At least we could nip across and see each other. It's this awful sensation of 8000 miles between you that's soul destroying. Cables and phone calls don't help much. Hang up the phone and you're lonelier than ever. Not that I'm blind to MGM's viewpoint. We'll have to work it out together, that's all."

THIS HARDLY sounds like the mulish truculence with which he's sometimes charged. That he's no Job for patience he'd be the first to grant. Inefficiency irks him. His standards of workmanship are high. He won't sacrifice them on the altar of popularity. Universal popularity doesn't head the list of things-he-can't-live-without. Hollywood is an open-armed town, where yesterday's stranger is tomorrow's darling. Not so with Granger, a Britisher and a Scotsman, to boot. If one Britisher is more self-contained than another, it's the Scot. Those friends he has and their adoptions tried, he keeps for life. Easy intimacies fail to attract him. "We ask people up here because we want to see them, enjoy talking to them. You can't talk to four hundred at once. So we have six or ten or even two. What's wrong with that?" The answer, of course, is nothing. You like big parties or you don't, and neither inclination is a subject for censure. But tell that to the critical, who tag him snooty and bewail the fact that he won't even take poor little Jean out dancing. Poor little Jean feels no pain. True, she likes dancing and he's tepid about it. "It's a difference," she points out, "not a yawning abyss." He recognizes the difference. Often as not, he'll strangle his reluctance. "There's this little jive joint somebody told me about." (Both prefer little jive joints to glamour clubs.) "Come on, you can dance your head off." Often as not, she'll be the one to protest. "Darling, I'm tired. Anyway, Groucho's on tonight."

Others may cavil. His wife feels not the slightest yen to change him. She's purringly content with him as he is. They talk the same lingo, the same kind of nonsense exhilarates them. Where Hollywood is effusive, they thrive on understatement. Any public display of sentiment makes them squirm. "In simple affection," he explains gravely, "we call each other idiot." If she does it, it's cute. It he does it, eyes glaze and paragraphs get into all the papers. "What Granger said!" Most are perceptive enough to realize that one man's "idiot" can hold more tenderness than another's glib "sweetheart." But they need fillers.

All stars are subject to similar forms of attention. It's the price they pay for stardom. No marriage within memory has

Shrinks Hemorrhoids New Way Without Surgery

Science Finds Healing Substance That Relieves Pain—Shrinks Hemorrhoids

For the first time science has found a new healing substance with the astonishing ability to shrink hemorrhoids and to stop bleeding—without surgery.

In case after case, pain was relieved promptly. And, while gently relieving pain, actual reduction (shrinkage) took place.

Most amazing of all—results were so thorough that sufferers made astonishing statements like "Piles have ceased to be a problem!"

The secret is a new healing substance (Bio-Dyne®)—discovery of a world-famous research institute.

Now this new healing substance is offered in ointment form under the name of *Preparation H. Ask for it at all drug stores—money back guarantee.

been so constantly assaulted on such flimsy grounds. Take the oversize house he bought on arrival. He had made a mistake, rectified it, paid for it with his own hard cash, and whose business was it anyway but their own? Yet the town sliced it up until it sounded like a misdemeanor, if not a slight felony perpetrated against his bride. Take Jean's early unhappiness in her work, which sometimes reduced her to tears on the set. These were promptly translated into rows with her husband; why else should a girl weep? Take home economics. He's handy with a skillet. She'd rather go hungry than fix herself a meal. Domestic details aren't up her alley. He can manage them with a twist of the wrist, and does, seeing no reason to impose on her distasteful burdens. This is bad? Apparently. Why? Because he's invading her realm, robbing her of her feminine right, treating her like a child. Take even the matter of a couple of TV sets. How can they love each other when they watch different programs? Yes, it gets that silly.

They've been under fire along other fronts. But here, at least, they're in company. No British actor has ever drawn a Hollywood salary check without being prodded, more or less gently, on the subject of American citizenship. Some ignore the prodding, some react off the record. Ask Granger a straight question, and you get a straight answer. "I'm forty years old. I've spent nine-tenths of my life in England. I have two children, a mother and sister there. Jean has a mother, a brother and two sisters. Our roots are there. You can't tear them up because you've worked elsewhere for three years. Put yourself in the same position. England means to us what America means to you. If we changed citizenship now, any thinking person must know we'd be hypocrites, acting through shabby motives—to help us over taxes, to make travel easier on an American passport. This would be an affront to America, not a tribute. Hollywood has given us a lovely way of life on this hill. But obviously it's not the American way. We don't know enough about America to form opinions. Later, perhaps, especially if children were born to us here, we'd make it our business to travel up and down the land, study it, learn it, and become citizens, if we did, not as a convenience but because we loved it and wanted to spend the rest of our lives here."

THEY HOPE to have children, though not yet. Through her former contract, Jean's career stagnated. Now it's blossoming again. She'd like to concentrate on it for a while. "We don't believe in turning kids over to nannies. That way, you have a little thing in the house and never get to know it. Baby cuts his first tooth on Nanny's finger, takes his first step and topples into Nanny's arms. All agog, she phones Mummy at the studio. Mummy wails to high heaven, feeling cheated and with good reason. When Jean becomes a mother, she'll do one picture a year."

Their work has kept them apart more than they like. In three and a half years, they've had no time for a holiday together. Last summer they planned to go to La Paz. Green Fire was due to finish the first of the month, Desirée to start on the sixteenth. Reservations were made, fingers crossed, eyes fixed on the promised land. Then Green Fire dragged on through the twelfth and La Paz went a-glimmering. They sighed and swore, each according to his gender, and resigned themselves. The twin career holds no terror for them.

"What," demands Granger, "would I do with a woman who's never known the exhaustion of a day at the studio? What would she do with a man who wants only to flop and put his feet up? Words, I imagine, would flow like Niagara, and words have been known to lead to drastic action. Jean and I understand without too many words. We've been pricked by the thorns of the same profession."

REAR WINDOW

A few years ago as I was driving to a friend's house, I noticed that a man in the car in front of me was looking out of the back window and making faces. He was so funny that I couldn't help laughing. I followed his car for about a block and he continued to make faces at me and other cars that went past. Then I recognized that versatile face—it belonged to Bob Hope!

Linda Young
Austin, Texas

With an adult outlook, each respects the other's need for fulfillment in work. Granger's masculinity doesn't require the prop of a little woman dancing attendance. So long as Jean wants a career, he'll encourage her in it because of the bred-in-the-bone conviction that every person has the right to express himself in his chosen way. In acting, she has found her medium. He hasn't.

Physically equipped as few men are to play doughty heroes, doughty heroes give him a pain. "They're dull creatures. Nor do I consider that by donning a wig and sword, you achieve anything much." Here too, however, he sees the studio's viewpoint. His derring-do films bring home the bacon. "And who's to argue with bacon? Yes, I'd like to slip out of ruffles now and again into the skin of a real character. But if I don't fight too hard for a change of pace, it's because I'm not all that keen about acting. Acting leaves me feeling fenced in, a little frustrated. I fancy myself creative along some line."

His far-from-secret goal is to be a director. Although it's a serious ambition—more likely, because it's a serious ambition—he kids it. "I've yapped about it so much, I'll probably never do it. In which case, I can always tell my grandchildren what a fine director their granddaddy might have been. Better than maybe risking the ghastly chance that you're lousy."

DIRECTOR OR NO, he's bent on owning a farm, getting down to such basic creative activity as crops and calves. Jean stipulates only that none of the calves shall ever be sent to market. Meanwhile they pursue their lovely way of life on the hill. "Lovely to us," says Granger, "and dismally unspectacular in the telling."

Since his return from England, something new has been added in the person of Rushton, who used to work for him over there and agreed to temporary transplantation. A quietly glowing gem, Rushton runs the household, does the marketing, rises virtually with the dawn to fix Jean's breakfast when she is working. Which ought to leave Granger slumbering undisturbed. Only it doesn't. "When Jean gets up, nobody sleeps. For a small girl, she makes disproportionate noises. She falls down, she trips over things. I hear her mutter 'Excuse me' to the bedpost, 'I'm sorry' to the door."

"Creative fancy," says Jean, returned from the doctor's now and comforting herself with a spot of tea. "Some day he'll stick that bit into a movie."

Heedless, he plunges on. "Whereas my wife can sleep through thunder, earthquakes and dogs licking her face. On those rare mornings when we're both unemployed, Rushton brings in the coffee. I drink it, with this dead body beside me. I shower, I dress, I go out and putter round the garden. Contrary to printed report, I do not uproot trees with my bare hands. My horticulture consists in meditating on what to tell the gardener to do next. I change into trunks. I take a plunge in the pool. By now it's ten, so I look in on my sleeping beauty. She continues to lie motionless. I drop a heavy object. Nothing happens. I grow uneasy. I clunk her over the head three or four times."

"With a soft hammer," she prompts. Then they eye each other. "Uh-uh. Somebody might believe it. Delete jokes."

"Hammer deleted. What I actually do is open the door to the clustered animals and let them climb over her."

The animals number four. Two cats called Traybert, in combined honor of Spencer Tracy and agent Bert Allenberg. Two miniature poodles—Young Bess from the movie of the same name, Old Beau after Beau Brummell. Granger is this kind of despot. Jean says: "I would like a cat." He says: "Darling, you don't want a cat," and orders a couple of Siamese.

FINALLY DRAGGED from unconsciousness, Jean breakfasts in bed with the newspapers. "She's a diligent reader. First, the funnies. Every picture and word of the funnies from stem to stern. Then the columns. If she's mentioned, she yells. If I'm mentioned, she yells. If a friend's mentioned, she yells, though not quite so loud. If she devours them in silence, it's a sign that nobody she knows got a tumble that day. I'm not sure whether she's relieved or disappointed."

"A smidgen of both," she tells him.

They putter some more, they inspect their once barren hillside, now blooming like paradise. They bask in the sunlit hours of a lazy day. "How can you itemize them?" he asks, forever astonished that anyone should be interested in the trivia of their daily lives, but doing his best to oblige. Friends may drop in. Their reputedly British circle is liberally sprinkled with Americans—Tracy and Allenberg, Garland and Luft, directors Cukor and Kazan. Jimmy cooks up some dinner. Jean hovers. The culinary arts fascinate her at a distance. She eats what he gives her, criticizing all the while. "This meat's too well done. There's not enough pepper."

"Shall I hand in my notice, madam?"

"I'll think about it. Ask me in fifty years."

WHEN THEY'RE ALONE evenings, TV holds them enthralled. "Being competition, it makes us feel slightly guilty. We swallow our guilt and tune in just the same." He's mad for baseball and the fights. She plays her own favorites, then wanders over to him. Baseball she likes. "Unless the blokes paste each other too hard."

"Then she ducks. Our attachment to TV stems less from the programs than the sociability. It's cozy lounging together on the couch with a bottle of beer in your hand. You watch the Rheingold commercial and take another slug of Budweiser."

"For that remark Rheingold will doubtless crown you."

"It's a typographical error. It's also time for you to pop back into bed."

We caught a final glimpse of them in the doorway. Bess' tufted head poked out of the nest of Jean's arms. Looking for something to chew, Beau took a sniff at Jimmy's shoe. The Grangers, big and little, stood close. They stand close in more than the literal sense. They're nice people. They're happy. They love each other. Let's leave 'em be. END why try to change me now?

(Continued from page 47) telephone, no TV set, not even a radio to invade one's privacy. There was only the hypnotic tone of the surf beyond the picture window . . . only the bittersweet nostalgia of the blues coming softly from a pint-sized phonograph on a nearby table—and Jane Russell sitting quiet, her dark eyes brooding over the sea she loves so well.

Suddenly she spoke, shattering the illusion of serenity. "Next time a writer asks me for a story idea," she announced, "I'm going to come up with one for him. A story to be called If You Don't Like It, Lump It."

Ah, ha! you might well think. Now that she has formed her own picture company, now that she isn't tied down by a contract, Miss Jane can't concern herself with what the public says.

No such thing. In spite of, or perhaps because of, the controversial storms she has shrugged her way through with apparent indifference, Jane has always needed approbation more than most movie stars. She goes out of her way to avoid antagonizing people, she cares very deeply how the public feels and she isn't about to develop one of those "I'm-bigger-than-all-my-critics" complexes.

THERE WAS A reason for her saying what she said, however. One of the friends relaxing with her that Sunday was a writer, who had been giving her some tiresome, uninvited "for your own good" advice about a certain current Russell project which had nothing whatever to do with the making of motion pictures. The unwanted counsel had been offered some hours earlier, at which time Jane neither sulked nor argued her point. But now she came up with this like-it-or-lump-it routine. Although it was a pretty sneaky way of telling a friend to go climb a tree and not up to her usual standard of forthright insult, there are mitigating circumstances. First, she was tired. Besides, the writer was a guest in her house, and Jane is never rude to guests. Well, hardly ever. And finally, she wasn't mad at anybody. She made the remark without a trace of malice, and when comprehension dawned on the guy, she grinned at him fondly. Just so he knew where she stood.

WHERE SHE STANDS is on her own two feet. She'll make mistakes in her newfound independence, maybe, fall flat on her face, maybe, but the point is that at least they'll be her mistakes. One of the things Miss Russell is most tired of is being slapped on the wrist for obeying orders. "If people think a thing is in bad taste, it's their privilege to make a fuss—but before they criticize me or anyone else for what they see on the screen, couldn't they at least ask whether our contracts permit us to object to scenes in the picture? I can insist on script changes now, but I couldn't always." This is one desirable aspect of independence, but it has its drawbacks, too. With the announcement that she wears no man's collar, any future goofs must be laid at her own door.

OF COURSE, what constitutes a goof is a matter of personal opinion. Earlier this year Jane made a trip to New York and, on a nocturnal search for some real crazy music, ran into a columnist who reported the following day that Miss Russell considered the Almighty "a Livin' Doll when you get to know Him." A national magazine duly noted the comment, and there were sanctimonious howls of outrage at her blasphemy and retorts from cooler heads pointing out that if Old Jane knew the Lord well enough to call Him a Livin' Doll, she was in much better shape than people who didn't know Him at all. Jane was mildly surprised but not at all upset by the to-do. "I guess I did say it," she confirmed placidly. "It sounds just like me—why, you've heard me say it a hundred times." She doesn't regard that as one of her mistakes. But she's a wicked one, all right. At the end of her nightly prayer she has even been known to implore the Lord to take care of Himself.

When magazines break out in a rash of stories asking whether success had changed Jane Russell, they'll just be words. Currently the Old One's (Miss Russell's four brothers' pet name for her) favorite song is a standard called, "Why Try to Change Me Now?" and it ought to be her theme song. Nobody is going to change Jane, for her own good or otherwise. She's as stubborn as a mule, unshakable in her loyalty—and she'll stay that way. She indulges whims she knows will land her in hot water up to her chin. She always listens to people who know more about making movies than she does and, unaccountably, she sometimes listens to people who wouldn't know a camera angle from a hole in a doughnut. She's convinced that she's a sound judge of character and yet, jokingly or not, she sets quite a store by astrology. "I don't even know why I like you," she often complains to one of her friends. "Everybody knows that Geminis can't stand Taureans!"

She's curious as a squirrel about strangers—some strangers—but never try to make book on which ones will appeal. When they don't, she ignores them. "I've never been so embarrassed in my life," relates a member of the RKO publicity team. "We were in the gallery, shooting some art for a magazine cover, when the editor of the magazine came in. I introduced them, and Jane said, 'Hi,' in that disinterested voice that I ought to recognize by now. Then she proceeded to look right through that woman for two hours. I nearly wore myself out trying to make small talk.

"Still, you can't get mad at her. After all, just to do these pictures, she was giving up a day when she could have been at the beach. She made every costume change we asked; she did everything the photographer said. Only her mind was somewhere else—and if I had said anything to her about it, she'd have answered with something sarcastic, like, 'Who's going to put my mind on a magazine cover?' You can't change that dame."

When she thinks a stranger is bright or cute or funny, believe it or not, Jane is shy. The high-voltage eyes look hither and yon, sneaking only an occasional glance of appraisal. She becomes a model of decorum, causing studio representatives to shift uneasily in their seats.

If she's satisfied that this one is worth the time, for instance, she might pull a complete switch in the next moment and become the Legend. This myth, perpetrated and carefully nurtured by her devoted crew, insists that Miss Russell is mean as a snake, arrogant, temperamental, unreasonable—and her mother should bite her when she gets back to the kennel. No one can become a crew member in good standing without adding to this canard.

One Legend victim was a serious young man who came out from New York to write a story about The Real Jane Russell. He was introduced to her in the RKO commissary and they talked briefly, but Jane was bored, indifferent, uncooperative—which to the initiated meant that she liked him and was feeling playful. Calmly she outraged his artistic integrity by suggesting that he go on home and create any little piece of fiction that came into his head.

Smarting somewhat, the young man persisted. He was bound to write nothing but The Truth. Finally, Jane shrugged. "If you want to know what I'm really like, why don't you go over to the set and talk to my crew? I guess they hate me the best."

The crew greeted his appearance with fish-eyed coolness, and when he diffidently explained his mission, they responded with variously uncouth noises of derision.

"Why waste our breath, telling you what she's really like?" scoffed hairdresser Steffi Garland. "When your story came out, it would be the same old watered-down version!"

"That's not his fault," stand-in Carmen Nesbitt pointed out sympathetically. "If he wrote the real story, they wouldn't allow it in the mails."

Behind his horn-rimmed glasses the young man's eyes were beginning to glaze ever so slightly, a fact which the crew noted with complacency. They led him to Miss Russell's portable dressingroom, sat him down, and began relating the reasons why she was an impossible employer.

At this point Jane entered. Although there was some shifting about to make room for her at the dressing table, she was otherwise ignored. She glanced in the mirror at the writer and asked, "Well, what have they been telling you?"

"Uh—nothing," he lied uncomfortably.

"That doesn't surprise me," Miss Russell remarked, applying mascara with a deft hand. "I'm surrounded by fools and idiots."

Nobly the writer stepped into the breach. "Miss Russell, there's something I'd like to ask you about. In looking over your studio biography, I ran across something rather peculiar. It said that when you were a baby, your mother used to leave you out in the snow in your buggy for hours on end. Would you—"

"What's so peculiar about that?" interrupted wardrobe mistress Mary Tait. "If you had given birth to something this horrible, wouldn't you encourage pneumonia?"

It broke up the whole bunch, Jane Russell most of all, and gave the writer his first indication that they were pulling his leg. To date Jane has given her best acting performances as the Legend.

The real Jane Russell is so untemperamental and so cooperative that she feels defensive about making a reasonable adjustment in her daily routine. As everyone knows, she habitually tries to do too much, and has cracked up on several of her recent pictures. Worried, her family and friends persuaded her to cut down.

"Say, Old One," teased a friend who didn't know the circumstances, "you been taking lessons from So-and-so?" naming a star well-known if not well-liked for the regard in which she holds herself.

For once, Jane didn't smile back. "Taking lessons in what?"

"Well, all of a sudden I hear Russell does not permit luncheon interviews—"

Jane looked stricken. Then, "I don't," she said tightly, "and I haven't on my last two pictures. I just have a sandwich in my dressingroom and use my lunch hour to rest or pray or cry or whatever I feel like."

It's probably the smartest move she has made in years, and there isn't a reason in the world why she should feel uncomfortable about it—except that she always has given up her free time in the past. The way it used to be, Jane was up at the crack of dawn in order to drive in from the valley and arrive at the studio on time. She worked through the morning, ate her way through a lunch interview, and hurried back to the set to work all afternoon. Usually there were other writers visiting the set, waiting to talk to her between scenes, and a member of the RKO publicity department once tabulated forty phone calls—all urgent—that came in for Jane in the course of a single day. Small wonder that she cracked up.

THE WOMAN'S TOUCH

I went to the première of Lucky Me in Miami Beach and sat next to a man wearing a black sports outfit with a blazing white tie. When the lights went up for the floor show I must have been staring at this strange outfit for the man smiled at me and said, "Kinda loud, huh? But my wife made it for me and I love it." It was Robert Cummings.

Stella Kamp
Miami Beach, Florida

Now she has cute Penny Sweeney of the dandelion coiffure to screen the calls and the visitors, and she keeps her lunch hour free. Know what she does with it, besides resting, praying and crying? She answers the calls that worry her the most.

Let's say that you're in trouble. The phone rings, you answer, and this flat, unemotional voice says, "Hi. This is Jane. How are you today?" After the first time, you won't need to be told who it is. After the third or fourth time you stop puzzling about the rest of it. There doesn't have to be a reason why she concerns herself with you; she just does. Her voice doesn't ooze solicitude with every syllable, she doesn't comfort you in wildly affectionate terms of affection a la Hollywood, she doesn't preach the gospel. Instead, she says with simple, hard-headed logic, "Look, do you have a really good doctor?" Or lawyer or candlestick maker, depending on your particular need. ". . . Because if you haven't, mine is the best." It's entirely possible that Jane's doctor, lawyer and candlestick maker do more charity work than professional philanthropists, and apparently they're happy about it. They eschew payment for whatever service they have rendered warmly but firmly. "Anyone who's a friend of Jane's—" is what they say.

Of course she believes in miracles and kill-or-cure methods. There is a reporter in Hollywood rumored to be sitting in a corner, gibbering to himself and playing with a piece of string, on account of Jane. It seems that he had a blue-ribbon assignment on her, one of those directives that said, "IMPERATIVE. DROP EVERYTHING ELSE. DEADLINE." So he went to U-I to visit her on the Foxfire set.

He was moping around her dressingroom when she came in, and immediately Jane asked, "What's the matter with you?"

"I dunno," he answered. "Picked up some kind of bug, I guess."

"So what are you doing here?"

"Well," the reporter was vague, as reporters usually are, "I had this assignment on you."

Jane clobbered him with a look. "I'm not going to talk to you," she said with absolute finality. "You look horrible. Go home and go to bed."

"But my story—"

"I said, go to bed. I'll call you later."

She did. She called that day and the next and the next. The second day she had a personal physician at hand. The third day she turned up with the most novel idea in publishing history; she had a writer from a competitive publication in her dressingroom when she called. "I told him about you," she said, "and he says he'll be glad to help you out in any way he can. Write your story for you or anything." Big joke.

The only thing she was steadfast in refusing to do, over the telephone or otherwise, was to hold still for any interview. "My doctor says you're too sick to work," she said stubbornly, "and if I don't give you any material, you can't write a story." And if he didn't write the story, he's probably peddling pencils on a street corner, or playing with that piece of string.

But why try to change her now? She's a magnificent, complex creature of fantastic impulses and pedestrian caution which are almost always in conflict.

Like quicksilver and the sea, Jane is changeless. She's only in a different mood right now. A grave, adult mood acknowledging that this might well be the most important year of her life. For the first time since she appeared on the Hollywood scene, Jane is a free agent.

While she was under contract to Howard Hughes, Miss Russell probably didn't realize how relatively sheltered she was. When she read a script, she didn't have to look into a crystal ball and decide whether the picture would be a hit or lay an egg; she merely had to play the role written for her. The outcome involved neither her money nor any responsibility.

Now that's all changed. She and Bob Waterfield will sink or swim on the strength of Russfield, and Robert admittedly knows nothing yet about making movies. Jane has got to read a script and visualize a picture, buy it or turn it down. Dicker for co-stars and directors. Rely on her own judgment regarding promotion, publicity and a dozen other facets.

It's enough to make anyone serious, but Old Jane faces the future confidently because she labors under the delusion that she has mastered a very dirty word: compromise. She hasn't, of course, since in her books compromising doesn't include making concessions or ending up with anything less than she wanted originally.

How does she compromise? "Well, take music. Bob Thiele of Coral likes me to make a certain kind of record a certain way. I like to make another kind my own way. So I do four that he wants, and then he lets me do four of my own.

"Or in picture making. Universal wanted me for Foxfire and we want to borrow Jeff Chandler for a Russfield production. So we compromised.

"Or in private life. If Robert wants to go fishing in the mountains and I want to go to the beach, we can't do both so we compromise—he goes fishing and I go to the beach."

She was perfectly serious, explaining all this, although in every instance she cited, Jane Russell ended up getting what she wanted. Apparently "compromise" means the difference between getting what she wants immediately or five minutes later.

Lazily, the Old One smiled, and her eyelids dropped to cover some secret thought of her own. "But I'll let you in on something. There are some situations where it looks like I'm compromising. I let people think I am. Only, I'm not—I'm just bidin' my time." The thought had mischief in it, but why try to change her now? END

(Continued from page 66) his personal relationships. He likes people instead of fearing them. His conduct with Josanne Mariani, is different from his old manners with women. Josanne is a black-haired, brown-eyed Corsican actress Marlon had met in Europe. When Josanne came to Hollywood, she visited him on the Desirée set each day.

He was kind, considerate and attentive to her. In the past he's been chary of showing any affection to a girl, particularly in public. But with Josanne he was every inch the courting gentleman.

When newsmen asked if they might take her picture with him, Brando grinned and shook his head.

"You better not," he said. "Don't you think so? We've got no right to intrude on her privacy." Because Brando was so gracious, the photographers agreed.

They saw Josanne around Hollywood a great deal. Phil Rhodes, Brando's friend, used to drive her to and from the studio, and they could have photographed her a dozen times. But why get Bud Brando sore when he'd gone out of his way to help?

Who is responsible for Brando's new attitude? Why has he changed his tune? Only a year ago he was saying, "I've had enough of Hollywood. Came out to the movies for only two reasons: loot and experience. Now I've got 'em both and I'm pulling out." He talked about going to Europe and to the Far East and making pictures there but he was defintiely soured on Hollywood and its ways. He claimed that unjustifiably he had been depicted as an irresponsible screwball. After Julius Caesar, he said, it would be a long while before he hit the West Coast again.

For a while he was true to his word. He flew back to the East and presently his girl, Movita Castaneda, joined him there. Gradually, Movita helped weaken Bud's prejudice against Hollywood.

"You're too sensitive," she told him. "You take everything so much to heart. Why do you care what they say about you? They think you're rough and crude and crazy. But all the people who know you, all the people who've worked with you like and respect you."

But Bud was still hurt.

When Julius Caesar opened in New York, he declined to attend, explaining, "I just couldn't go through it."

Asked if he'd read the wonderful reviews, he said, "I never read reviews. They either praise you or kick you. But they don't help you."

Then Stanley Kramer, the producer for whom Brando had made his first Hollywood movie, The Men, telephoned to say that he was making a picture to be called The Wild One, and he wanted Brando, that he needed him badly. Would Bud come out to Hollywood and do this one favor?

Bud went. He has an indomitable sense of loyalty and friendship.

He understood that certain of his pals would get minor parts in The Wild One. They didn't and he resented it deeply. After the film was finished, he said, "I'm getting out of Hollywood and this time I'm really staying out." Once more he flew to New York where he signed to play in summer stock for a friend at $125 a week. Bud has great admiration for Elia Kazan, the talented stage and film director. It was Kazan who gave Brando his first big break by casting him as Stan Kowalski in A Streetcar Named Desire.

In New York, Kazan began to talk with Bud about a script by Budd Schulberg dealing with waterfront scandals.

Brando agreed to make the picture. Most of it was shot in Hoboken, New Jersey. Bud loved making the picture. He reported to work each day in work trousers and leather jacket. He rode the trains and subways home hardly ever being recognized. When he was, he signed autographs until his fingers were numb. Never in his life has he refused an autograph.

In the Waterfront film, for example, Sam Spiegel, the producer, was a bit late in paying some of the featured players their salaries. Marlon raised a fuss about it.

"Sam," he said, "you've got some nerve keeping these people waiting for their money. Where do you come off with that stuff?" Spiegel paid off quickly.

After On The Waterfront was completed, Bud heard from his father Marlon Brando, Sr., that a cattle ranch was to be put up for auction in eastern Colorado.

"I've got about 800 head of cattle out in Nebraska," Brando says, "and I always thought it would be a good idea to have them feed on my own ranch. I'm partners with my father—we have a company called Marsdo, Inc.—and my dad said we needed another $150,000.

"Just about then MCA, my agents, called and said that Fox wanted me for The Egyptian. I could get $150,000 for the picture. That seemed to be the answer."

When Brando arrived in Hollywood early this year, he knew in his heart that he was going to work in The Egyptian for only one reason—money. That realization ate into him. He is a sensitive young man who from time to time has denounced money-mad persons as "unconscionable hucksters."

Howard Hawks is in Egypt, filming Land of the Pharaohs. He hired 3,000 extras for the opening scene. It was at the quarry where the stones for the Pyramids were cut. The preparations began before dawn. At 1:30 P.M., after long hours in the sun, the 3,000 extras finally were in their proper places. Just as Hawks signaled for the cameras to start grinding, his Hungarian aide noticed that an extra's toupee was askew.

He shouted a signal in Hungarian, over the loudspeaker, to another Hungarian who was in charge of that section. In less than a minute, all 3,000 extras had rushed off. Hawks and his aide later learned that the Hungarian word sounded like the Egyptian word for "LUNCH."

Leonard Lyons in
The New York Post

The resulting struggle with himself turned Marlon so sick that he felt he must have the help of a psychiatrist. So he got on a plane before The Egyptian started and flew to New York and the care of psychiatrist Dr. Bela Mittelmann.

Immediately, the studio filed suit and replaced him with young Edmund Purdom.

A few weeks later Brando was told that his mother, Mrs. Dorothy Brando, was ill in Pasadena. He flew back to California at once. When Bud arrived, she was dying.

Bud and his mother had always been very close. Mrs. Brando knew that in Marlon she had something of a maverick. She loved her son and sympathized with him and tried to bring him comfort and hope. Before she died, she said, "Bud, I want you to get along with people, to love them instead of fighting them. Don't fight with the studio, Bud. Don't fight with anyone. Sometimes it's hard but you must get along with people. You must love them. It's the only way."

Marlon said he would do his best.

His mother died on March 31. A few weeks later Brando made his peace with the studio and agreed to report for the role of Napoleon in Desirée.

The studio believed that he would be vindictive and antagonistic.

Instead Bud has been all sweetness and light, and extremely discreet. "I promised my mother that things would be okay."

When Bud was asked about his reported breakup with Movita, instead of blowing his top as he would have done in the old days, he said calmly, "We're still friends and Movita is still a very lovely person. But let's not pursue that subject."

Movita spoke more freely.

"Isn't it possible," she asked, "for a man and woman to have a friendship without its ending in marriage or a quarrel? Bud and I are still good friends. We talk over the phone every few days. But I never had any intention or desire to marry him. Apparently he's not yet ready for marriage.

"Before he settles down to family responsibilities he wants to travel. Marlon is a wonderful person involved in the sometimes painful process of finding himself."

Another young beauty who dated Bud in Hollywood and is convinced that he possesses all the virtues is Rita Moreno.

"I went out with Marlon a few times," Rita said, "and he was a perfect gentleman. He's relatively quiet, but when he speaks he says something worthwhile."

Marlon's explanation of the stories of his alleged weirdness is simple. "The press," he says, "is responsible for spreading all those wacky stories. When I was in Streetcar in New York a woman came backstage to interview Jessica Tandy.

"Jessica was about to introduce her to me but I said quickly, 'I know, Jessica—your mother!' I wasn't trying to be smart or sarcastic or anything. I didn't have my glasses on and I'm nearsighted. But this woman never forgave me and has been giving me the business ever since.

"Then when I came out to Hollywood to do The Men, the publicity guys told me to go around and visit another columnist at home. I didn't have anything to say, and when they told this columnist I wasn't about to go visiting, I became 'naughty, naughty Marlon Brando.'

"Then I was interviewed by some writers and frankly I was shocked by the questions they asked—so intimate, such an out-and-out infringement on a man's privacy."

Marlon admits he wasn't "too diplomatic" years ago. "But I've learned," he says, "and that's why I'm not posing for any pictures in blue jeans and a T-shirt. I've got suits. I've got shirts. I know how to knot a tie. I want to destroy the impression that I'm constantly bumming around."

As a matter of fact, Brando is now pursuing the opposite tack. At a recent Hollywood party, he was the only guest to show up wearing a tie and jacket.

The girls he quietly dated in Hollywood also report that he was dressed formally when he came courting.

When Marlon finished Desirée, he was heading for the Venice Film Festival where Waterfront was to be entered in the contest.

"How about that Mariana girl?" he was asked. "Will you see her in Europe?"

Brando grinned. "I'm trying to be very cooperative with all the press people," he explained. "I'm trying to be nice and helpful. But somehow I don't ever think I can get to the point of discussing girls I know. A man is entitled to his private life even if he is an actor, and attempts to invade it—well, I still consider them outrageous." But he said it good-naturedly.

A year ago he would have grown sullen and morose and stalked off.

There's no doubt about it—it's a new kind of Brando, with love and kindness conquering inhibition and fear. END
